islature, by the adoption of the new revenue law, established more effectual methods than those which theretofore obtained in regard to matters of taxation. It is a fact, within the common knowledge of all, and one of which we may take judicial notice, that formerly so much property escaped taxation as to render the revenue of the state insufficient to pay the expenses incurred in conducting its ordinary business affairs, and we were confronted with a continually increasing state debt. This created a universal demand throughout the state for a new revenue law. In answer to this demand, the legislature, at its session of 1903, adopted our present system. While so much of the present act as designates what property shall be taxed, and what shall be exempt from taxation, is practically the same as those provisions contained in the former revenue law, yet the new act contains such minute directions for listing, valuing, and assessing property for taxation, as to render it extremely difficult for any person or corporation to avoid the payment of taxes upon all of his or its property; and the adoption of the new law has resulted in the taxation of the property of appellant, and other like associations. The power of the state to make such changes, from time to time, in its revenue laws, and adopt such new methods in regard to matters of taxation as may be found necessary to raise an amount of revenue sufficient for its needs, cannot be questioned. The legislature having exercised such power, neither taxing officers of the state, nor the courts, are bound by construction of the former law.

It is further urged that it was the intention of the legislature, in passing the present law, to completely exempt fraternal beneficiary associations from taxation; and our attention is called to the provisions of the act relating to the taxation of what are called old-line insurance companies. It is insisted that, when the legislature provided for taxing such old-line insurance companies upon their gross premiums for the preceding year, and exempted fraternal beneficiary associations and other like societies from that provision, the intention was not to tax such associations at all. It seems to us, however, that excepting such associations from those special provisions constitutes no evidence of an intention not to tax them, but, on the other hand, it shows an intention to tax them the same as all persons, corporations, and other domestic associations are taxed. If the legislature had intended to exempt them from taxation, it certainly would have expressed such intention, and thus put the question beyond all doubt. So we are of the opinion that the property of mutual benefit associations organized under the laws of this state is taxable the same as the property of individuals, corporations, and other domestic associations.

3. Finally, it is contended by the appellant that it is entitled to set off the amount of its outstanding beneficiary certificates, matured and unmatured, against its fidelity or mortuary fund. This is the only remaining question for our determination. It is the settled law of this state that the word "credits," as used in our present revenue law, means "net credits;" that the taxpayer may deduct from his gross credits the amount of his bona fide debts in order to determine the true value of his credits for assessment. State ex rel. Breckenridge v. Fleming, 70 Neb. 523, 97 N. W. 1063; Lancaster County v. McDonald (Neb.) 103 N. W. 78. The state insists that this fund is money loaned and invested, and therefore must be taxed. "Money loaned or invested," within the ordinary meaning of the term, is money or capital laid out with a view of obtaining a profit or income therefrom. The fact that the fund in question has assumed the form of bonds, mortgages, and other securities does not of itself fix its nature or determine its use. It is the use to which it is put that determines its character. That this fund is not "loaned or invested for profit," within the ordinary meaning of the term, seems clear. As above stated, the fidelity or mortuary fund of the association is set apart by its by-laws, and the laws of this state, as a trust fund, for the payment of its beneficiary certificates. This fund must be kept and conserved for that particular purpose. The statute provides how it shall be invested for its preservation, and the manner in which it may be withdrawn from time to time for the purpose of paying the beneficiary certificates of the association as they become due. It is a credit which was created for that particular purpose and no other. A like question was before the supreme court of Alabama in Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. v. Lott, 54 Ala. 499, where it was held that a life insurance company, when its solvent credits are assessed for taxation, is entitled to have deducted therefrom its premium reserve. The same question was before the supreme court of Iowa in Equitable L. Ins. Co. v. Board of Equalization, 74 Iowa, 178, 37 S. W. 141. The court said: "It is plain that the legislature enacted this statute to secure to the policy holders the performance of the obligation to pay the amount secured by the policy. This statute therefore recognizes the existence of a debt from the company to the policy holders, and provides for securing its payment through this reserved fund. To us it seems plain that the plaintiff is indebted to each of its policy holders, and the aggregate amount of such indebtedness equals this reserve fund, which should be deducted from plaintiff's money and credits in listing the same for taxation."

In Michigan Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Detroit, 133 Mich. 408, 95 N. W. 1131, the question of the right of a mutual life insurance company (organized for profit), under a statute practically like our own, to set off its reserve-fund credits against its mortuary debts for the purpose of taxation was before the court, and it was held that it had the right to deduct the amount of its policies from its premium reserve; that the reserve fund of the company represents its indebtedness to its policy holders, and should be exempt from taxation. It is contended by the state, however, that the foregoing decisions furnish no authority for the determination of the question involved in the instant case; that they apply only to old-line life insurance companies, and the reason given for such contention is that the policies of old-line companies have a present surrender value, while the beneficiary certificates of fraternal associations have no such value. It seems to us that this is a distinction without a difference. It is difficult to understand why old-line insurance companies, which are organized for the purpose of gain and profit, should be accorded the privilege of the set-off, and that right denied to beneficiary associations, which are organized solely for the purpose of conserving the interests of their members, and are prohibited by law from being conducted for the purpose of gain. It seems clear to us, therefore, that the beneficiary certificates issued to the members of the appellant association create a debt against it, for the payment of which the fund, or, in other words, the credit, in question is specifically pledged. So we are of opinion that the certificates create a bona fide debt, payable out of the particular credit or fund known as the "fidelity or mortuary fund" of the association, and may, for the purpose of taxation, be set off against credits or securities in such fund. We are also of opinion that all of the property of the association which has not been segregated, set aside, transferred to, and become a part of the securities in its mortuary fund is taxable, under the provisions of our present revenue law. It follows that the trial court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the appellant's petition, and in rendering judgment affirming the order of the board of equalization.

of the District Court is reversed, and the cause is remanded for further proceedings according to law.

Letton, J., concurring:

I concur in the view expressed in the opinion of Mr. Justice Barnes as to fraternal beneficiary associations, such as the Royal Highlanders, not being charitable associations and entitled to exemption from taxation for that reason. I also agree that this court is not bound by any administrative construction of the former revenue law for the reasons set forth in his opinion. With the conclusion reached I also concur, but, since I do so mainly upon grounds not mentioned in his opinion, I deem it proper to briefly state my views.

The question whether or not the securities held in pledge by the Royal Highlanders, or other domestic fraternal beneficiary associations, or whether the reserve held by domestic old-line life insurance companies, are taxable as the property of the respective associations or corporations, is purely one of statutory construction. The controlling question for the court to determine is: What was the intention of the legislature with respect to the subject-matter? To ascertain this intention is the sole duty of the court in the premises, and, when this is determined, the construction must stand until such time as the legislature may determine that the court has incorrectly interpreted the meaning of its language, and enacts a new provision so clear and specific that all may understand. To ascertain the intention of the lawmaker, we must consider the whole statute, its purpose, and object, and the means provided in the act for attaining the desired end. Uniformity in taxation is essential under our Constitution, and it must be presumed that the legislature intended, as nearly as possible, taking into consideration the innumerable phases, conditions, and forms in which property appears, to secure uniformity. In accomplishing this result, it is proper to classify property, individuals, or corporations, and by §§ 58, 59, 60, and 61 of the law under consideration (Laws 1903, pp. 404, 405, chap. 73), this classification has been made so far as concerns insurance companies. These sections have been the subject of consideration in State ex rel. Breckenridge v. Fleming, 70 Neb. 523, 97 N. W. 1063, and in Aachen & M. Ins. Co. v. Omaha (Neb.) 101 N. W. 3, and they were upheld as a proper exercise of the taxing power in that behalf. By § 59 all foreign life and accident insurance companies, except fraternal beneficiary associations and mutual assessment companies, were placed in one class, and by § 61 all domestic life, fire, accident, or surety companies, except fraternal beneficiary associations and mutual assessment companies, were placed in another class. By the provisions of § 59 each foreign company is required to pay into the state treasury 2 per cent of the gross amount of premiums received by it during the preceding calendar year for business done in this state. This is a business tax imposed under the second clause of § 1, art. 9, of the Constitution, and such companies are also liable for taxation upon all their property within the state the same as other corporations or individuals. State ex rel. Breckenridge v. Fleming and Aschen & M. Ins. Co. v. Omaha, supra. Section 61 provides that all domestic companies shall be taxed in each local political subdivision where the agent conducts the business, upon their gross premium receipts for the preceding year, less premiums on canceled policies and reinsurance; such gross receipts less reinsurance and cancellation to be taken as an item of property of that value and be assessed and taxed on the same percentage of such value as other property. This tax also is a business tax, and each of such domestic companies is also liable to be taxed upon its tangible property the same as any other individual or corporation within the state.

No specific provisions are made for taxation of fraternal beneficiary associations, or mutual assessment companies having no capital stock, making no dividends, and whose scheme of insurance does not contemplate the return of any profits to policy holders. The tangible property of such associations and mutual companies, whether domestic or foreign, is to be taxed the same as the property of other persons and corporations, therefore. It is made compulsory upon domestic corporations carrying on the business of life insurance under the old-line plan to accumulate and keep on hand a fund for the purpose of meeting their outstanding obligations to policy holders, and, although not compulsory in the case of domestic fraternal beneficiary associations or mutual assessment companies, it is a matter of common knowledge that a number of such associations or companies, including the Royal Highlanders, voluntarily have accumulated a fund, variously designated as a mortuary, reserve, or emergency fund, for the purpose of meeting liabilities for their certificate holders as they mature, in order to prevent such frequent assessments as experience has shown may be caused by epidemics of disease or wide-spread calamities. Whether held by old-line companies or associations formed upon the assessment plan, these funds are set apart to meet obligations of a certain nature. They are not the property of the company or association for general purposes, but are devoted to a specific end. In the case of foreign life insurance companies, these accumulations are held in other states or countries, and are not within the reach of the taxing officers of this state. In this state, such companies, therefore, merely pay 2 per cent upon the gross amount of premiums received during the preceding year, into the state treasury, as a business tax, and are otherwise assessed only upon their tangible property within this state, which may or may not exist, since its existence is not essential to carrying on business. They are relieved from all local taxation, except upon tangible property, unless taxed by local ordinances upon their business. Domestic companies, however, are taxable in each county, town, city, village, and school district where an agent conducts their business upon their gross receipts, less reinsurance and return premiums, on the same percentage of value as other property, and, in addition thereto, are taxed upon their tangible property.

It will be seen, from a comparison of these provisions with reference to the taxation of foreign and domestic life insurance companies, that, if the law is construed so that the special, reserve, or mortuary funds of domestic companies and of domestic fraternal beneficiary associations, accumulated, reserved, and set apart to meet their liability to their policy and certificate holders, are to be taxed as the property of such companies and associations, a heavy burden is placed upon domestic organizations from which foreign are exempt. The business tax which domestic companies are required to pay may be as great, or greater, as that exacted from foreign companies, depending upon local conditions. It is not to be presumed that the legislature intended to impose a heavy burden upon domestic enterprises of this character from which those organized in other states are free. It would be doing violence to common sense to believe that its intention was to make a hostile discrimination against citizens of this state in favor of citizens of other states. It may be said that foreign companies are taxed in the states or countries of their domicile upon such funds, but, as is pointed out in the opinion of my Brother Barnes, in several states where net credits are the subject of taxation the amount of liabilities to policy holders has been held entitled to be properly offset against gross credits in the form of such securities. It may further be said that the methods of taxation of insurance corporations in other states are so various and diverse that it is almost impossible to say whether or not such accumulations are subject to any portion of the taxes paid by such companies. Many of the states provide for the taxing of insurance corporations, not by the value of their tangible property, but by franchise, business, or license taxes alone; but, so far as I can determine from an examination of statutes, in the main such funds, if taxed at all, are not taxed directly, as is sought to be done in this case. While, in the case of ordinary business, and if considered without relation to the sections of the revenue law relating to the subject of insurance taxation, it may be questioned whether contingent liabilities are such debts as would be entitled to be offset against credits, yet, considering the subject of insurance taxation as a whole, the conclusion reached by my Brother Barnes seems to me to express the legislative intent.

With respect to the taxation of insurance companies and fraternal beneficiary associations, as well as in many other respects, the provisions of the revenue law of 1903 are far from clear and definite, and may be expected to give rise to many controversies. If the construction now placed upon the law fails to evidence the purpose of the lawmakers, the remedy lies with the legislature. The resources of the English language are vast and rich and flexible enough so that it may express its intention in phrase so clear and plain that an ordinary man may understand, and thus relieve the court from liability to a misconstruction of its meaning, and the taxpayers of the state from unnecessary litigation.

ELIZA M. SKIPPER, Resp't.,

v.

SEABOARD AIR LINE RAILWAY, Appt.

Carrier—liability for interstate shipment—validity.

No unconstitutional interference with interstate commerce is effected by statutes requiring a carrier receiving baggage for transportation into another state over connecting lines, in case of loss, to adjust the loss with the shipper, or inform him of the point where loss occurred, or produce a receipt from the carrier to whom it delivered the property, unless it proves that, by the exercise of due diligence, it has been unable to trace the loss, and holding the initial carrier liable to the shipper, permitting it to recover over against the carrier liable for the loss.

(October 8, 1906.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Lancaster County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the value of baggage delivered to it for transportation, and not returned to plaintiff. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Glenn & McFadden and T. Y. Williams for appellant.

Messrs. Ernest Moore and D. R. Williams for respondent.

Pope, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action here was brought against the defendant for $382.20, as damages for the loss of certain contents from a trunk which was delivered to the defendant for transportation beginning at Chester, South Carolina, and ending at Englewood, Illinois, said trunk containing the baggage belonging to three persons traveling on tickets issued by the defendant from said Chester, South Carolina, to Englewood, Illinois. The answer of the defendant admitted that, on the 28th of July, 1904, the tickets were bought and paid for by the plaintiff over the defendant's line of railway from Chester, South Carolina, to Atlanta, Georgia, and thence over other connecting lines of railway to Englewood, Illinois. The defendant also admitted receiving the plaintiff's trunk and the delivery to her of a check therefor, and that the contract was that the defendant would transport said trunk from Chester, South Carolina, to Atlanta, Georgia, and deliver the same to its connecting lines over which the plaintiff was traveling. It further admits that said trunk was in apparent good order. As to

Case Note.—State statutes regulating the liability of carriers with respect to shipments over connecting lines as interference with interstate commerce: — In Missouri a statute providing: "Whenever any property is received by a common carrier to be transferred from one place to another, within or without this state, or when a railroad or other transportation company issues receipts or bills of lading in this state, the common carrier, railroad or transportation company, issuing such bill of lading shall be liable for any loss, damage, or injury to such property, caused by its negligence or the negligence of any other common carrier, railroad or transportation company, to which such property may be delivered, or over whose line such property may pass;

what condition it was in when received by the plaintiff at Englewood, Illinois, the defendant had no knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief. The defendant further alleges that said trunk was in good order when delivered by it to the Western & Atlantic Railway Company. The case came on for trial before special Judge O. W. Buchanan, at Lancaster, South Carolina. Both sides introduced testimony. The plaintiff's witnesses testified as to the number and value of the articles abstracted from the trunk, and that the trunk, when delivered at Englewood, Illinois, had the lock broken, and as to the damages which resulted from the loss of such articles. The defendant's witnesses testified to the condition of the contracts evidenced by the tickets issued to the plaintiff by the defendant, and also to correspondence between the attorneys for plaintiff and railway authorities. After the charge of his Honor, the jury returned the verdict of $363.85 in favor of plaintiff.

After entry of judgment on said verdict, the defendant appealed on ten grounds, but the appellant confines its argument to certain constitutional questions of law. The points raised by the defendant resolve themselves into an attack upon the constitutionality of §§ 1710 and 2176, vol. 1, Code of Laws of 1902, and of act No. 1 of the Laws of 1903 of this state (24 Stat. at Large, p. 1). The contention of defendant is that each of said sections of the Code and said act of 1903 is unconstitutional, null, and and the common carrier, railroad or transportation company, issuing any such receipt, or bill of lading, shall be entitled to recover, in a proper action, the amount of any loss, damage, or injury may be sustained,"—was to the owner of such property, from the common carrier, railroad or transportation company, through whose negligence the loss, damage, or injury may be sustained."—was construed in Dimmitt v. Kansas City St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 103 Mo. 433, 15 S. W. 761, as prescribing as a definite rule of liability for negligence of a common carrier that such carrier, when he receives a parcel to be transported to a place beyond the terminus of his route, is to be held liable as such to the place of destination, in the absence of a specific contract to carry such parcel only to the terminus of his own route, or limiting his liability to loss or damage occurring on his own route; and, as so construed, was held not to be obnoxious to the provisions of the Federal Constitution vesting in Congress the power to regulate interstate commerce. The court said: "The enactment as thus construed becomes a rule of evidence by which to determine what the contract of the carrier is, in the absence of a specific one in a given case, operates with no undue hardship upon the carrier, and is violative of none of its rights, constitutional or otherwise. By its provisions the act of acceptance by a common carrier of property to be transferred to a place beyond the terminus of its route is evidence of a contract to carry such property to the place of its destination. The act of issuing a receipt or bill of lading for property to be transferred to a place beyond the terminus of the route of a common carrier is evidence of a contract by such carrier to carry such property to the place of its destination. This prima facie case the statute makes for the plaintiff on the facts stated. In order to defeat it, the defendant must show that, by specific agreement, it only contracted to carry the property to the terminus of its own line, or, what is equivalent, that there was a specific agreement that it was to be liable only for loss or damage occurring on its own line."

The foregoing decision was reaffirmed in Nines v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 107 Mo. 475, 18 S. W. 26.

It was modified somewhat, however, in McCann v. Eddy, 133 Mo. 59, 35 L.R.A. 110, 33 S. W. 71, in which the dictum in the Dimmitt Case, that an agreement that a carrier shall be liable only for loss or damage occurring on its own line is equivalent to an express contract to carry the property only to the terminus of its own line, was expressly overruled; the court saying that to give such an interpretation to the statute as would permit a carrier to contract for a through shipment, and at the same time exempt himself from liability on account of the negligence of connecting carriers, would, in effect, operate as a repeal of the vital provisions of the law which declare a conclusive liability in such case. By this decision, therefore, the statute was construed as imposing liability on any carrier who should undertake to transport goods beyond the terminus of its own line, irrespective of any stipulation against liability for the negligence of a connecting carrier. An appeal was taken from this decision to the Supreme Court of the United States, which held, in 174 U. S. 580, 43 L. ed. 1093, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 755, that, the restraint imposed by the statute not being a curtailment of the power to limit liability to the line of the carrier accepting the freight, but a regulation of the form in which the contract having that object in view should be drawn, there was not an unlawful regulation of interstate commerce; and that the requirement imposed by the statute as construed by the courts of Missouri as to the form in which the carrier might contract for the limitation of his liability for negligence to his own line was not so unreasonable as to amount in substance to a denial of such right.

The foregoing decisions are reviewed, and the constitutionality of the statute reaffirmed, in Western Sash & Door Co. v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 177 Mo. 641, 76 S. W.

void, because, when applied to interstate carriers or carriers of baggage such as this, each and all of them impose a burden on interstate commerce, and thus violate the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. The following are copies of the sections and act referred to:

"Sec. 1710. When under contract for shipment of freight or express over two or more common carriers, the responsibility of each or any of them shall cease upon delivery to the connecting line 'in good order;' and if such freight or express has been lost, damaged, or destroyed, it shall be the duty of the initial, delivery, or terminal road, upon notice of such loss, damage, or destruction being given to it by the shippers, consignee, or their assigns, to adjust such loss or damage with the owners of said goods within forty days; and, upon failure to discharge such duty within forty days after such notice, or to trace such freight or express, and inform the said party so notifying, when, where, and by which carrier the said freight or express was lost, damaged, or destroyed, within said forty days, then said carrier shall be liable for all such loss, damage, or destruction in the same manner and to the same extent as if such loss, damage, or destruction occurred on its lines: Provided, that, if such initial, terminal, or delivering road can prove that, by the exercise of due diligence, it has been unable to trace the line upon which such loss, damage, or destruction occurred, it shall thereupon be excused from liability under this section."

"Sec. 2176. In case of the loss of or damage to any article or articles delivered to any railroad corporation for transportation over its own and connecting roads, the ini-

998, in which it was held that, under the statute, if a railroad company wishes to escape liability for loss or injury occurring beyond its own line, it must not receive freight under an agreement to transport it beyond its own line; and that it cannot relieve itself by contract stipulation from liability for freight agreed to be transported beyond its own line.

But in Central R. Co. v. Murphey, 196 U. S. 194, 49 L. ed. 444, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 218, Reversing 116 Ga. 863, 60 L.R.A. 817, 43 S. E. 265, it was held that the imposition upon the initial or any connecting carrier, by 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Ga. Code 1895, §§ 2317, 2318, as a condition of availing itself of a valid contract of exemption from liability beyond its own line, of "the duty of tracing the freight, and informing the shipper, in writing, when, where, and how, and by which carrier, the freight was lost, damaged, or destroyed, and of giving the names of the parties and their official position, if any, by whom the truth of the facts set out in the information can be established, is, when applied to interstate commerce, a violation of the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution;" the court saying: "The statute in question prevents the carrier from availing itself of a valid contract, unless such carrier comply with the provisions of the statute by obtaining information which it has no means of compelling another carrier to give; and yet, if the information is not obtained, the carrier is to be held liable for the negligence of another carrier over whose conduct it has no control. This is not a reasonable regulation in aid of interstate commerce, but a direct and immediate burden upon it."

But a statute providing: "When there are several connecting railroads under different companies, and the goods are intended to be transported over more than one railroad, each company shall be responsible only to its own terminus and until delivery to the connecting road; the last company which has received the goods as 'in good order' shall be responsible to the consignee for any damage, open or concealed, done to the goods, and such companies shall settle among themselves the question of ultimate liability,"—was held, in Kavanaugh v. Southern R. Co. 120 Ga. 62, 47 S. E. 526, to impose no burden upon the carrier, nor to require the carrier to accept goods upon specific terms, nor to restrict the right of the parties to contract against liability, but simply to establish a rule of evidence prescribing the probative value of a voluntary admission, and hence is not, as applied to shipments from beyond the state, an unlawful regulation of interstate commerce.

tial corporation, or corporations, first receiving the same shall, in every case, be liable for such loss or damage, but may discharge itself from such liability by the production of a receipt, in writing, for the said article or articles from the corporation to whom it was its duty to deliver such article or articles in the regular course of transportation. In which event the said connecting road or roads shall be severally so liable, but may, in succession and in like manner, discharge themselves respectively therefrom; but, if any such corporation shall wilfully fail or refuse, upon reasonable demand being made to it by any party interested in the production of such receipt, to produce the same, then it shall not be entitled to claim the benefit of such exemption in any action against the said railroad corporation to render it liable for such loss or damage."

Acts of 1903, 24 Stat. at Large, pp. 1, 2: "An Act to Further Define Connecting Lines of Common Carriers and to Fix Their Liabilities.

"Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the state of South Carolina, That all common carriers over whose transportation lines, or parts thereof, any freight, or baggage, or other property received by either of such carriers on a contract for through carriage recognized, acquiesced in, or acted upon, by such carriers, shall, in this state, with the respect to the undertaking and matters of such transportation, be considered and construed to be connecting lines, and be deemed and held to be the agents of each other, each the agent of the others, and all the others the agent of each, and shall be held and deemed to be under a contract with each other and with the shipper, owner, and consignees of such property for the safe and speedy through transportation thereof from one point of shipment to destination; and such contract as to the shipper, owner, or consignee of such property shall be deemed and held to be contract of each of such common carriers; and in any of the courts of this state, any through bill of lading, waybill, receipt, check, or other instrument issued by either of such carriers, or other proof showing that either of them has received such freight, baggage, or other property for such through shipment or transportation, shall continue prima facie evidence of the subsistence of the relations, duties, and liabilities of such carriers as herein defined and described, notwithstanding any stipulation, or attempted stipulations, to the contrary by such carriers, or either of them.

"Sec. 2. For any damages for injury, or damage to, or loss or delay of, any freight, baggage, or other property, sustained anywhere in such through transportation over connecting lines, or either of them, as contemplated and defined in the next preceding section of this act, either of such connecting carriers which the person or persons sustaining such damages may first elect to sue in this state therefor shall be held liable to such person or persons, and such carrier so held liable to such person or persons shall be entitled in a proper action to recover the amount of any loss, damage, or injury it may be required to pay such person or persons from the carrier through whose negligence the loss, damage, or injury was sustained, together with costs of suit."

The subject is not only intensely interesting in its consideration, but it is of great practical importance, for, as was well said by Mr. Justice Woods in Willett v. Southern R. Co. 66 S. C. 477, 479, 45 S. E. 93: "With the immense traffic and the resulting complicated business methods of modern American railroads and the connection of these roads with one another, to impose upon the owner of property passing over connecting lines the burden of making affirmative proof that the loss occurred on a certain one of these lines would be practically relieving of liability railroads handling freight as connecting lines, for the owner could rarely make the required proof, and, when he could make it, in most instances the expense of doing so would be greater than the value of the goods." In considering the power of states to legislate upon the question of interstate commerce, the Supreme Court of the United States has held that an attempt on the part of a state to prohibit a carrier, as to an interstate shipment, from limiting its liability to its own lines, would be a regulation of interstate commerce, and therefore void, in construing §§ 2317, 2318, of the Georgia Code of 1895 in the case of the Central R. Co. v. Murphey, 196 U. S. 194, 49 L. ed. 444, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 218. These two sections of the Georgia Code provide that, if the carrier to which application is made "shall fail to trace said freight and give said information in writing within the time prescribed, then said carrier shall be liable for the value of the freight lost, damaged, or destroyed, in the same manner and to the same extent as if said loss, damage, or destruction occurred on its line." Thus it is seen that the judgment against the initial line was rendered absolute, and must be, therefore, considered as an infringement by the state of Georgia on the commerce clause of Federal Constitution. In the text of this decision, Central R. Co. v. Murphey, supra, the United States Supreme Court has distinctly recognized and upheld its two former decisions in Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Solan, 169 U. S. 133, 42 L. ed. 688, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 289, and Richmond & A. R. Co. v. R. A. Patterson Tobacco Co. 169 U. S. 311, 42 L. ed. 759, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 335. If the two sections of our Code, and the act of 1903, complained of, are violative of the Constitution of the United States, of course they are void. The appellant here sought to obtain from the circuit judge a decision of the unconstitutionality of these provisions of our law. The circuit judge refused to hold them unconstitutional, and he now appeals to us to reverse the judge's decision.

The case of Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Solan, supra, was an action to upset a section of the Code of Iowa, which provided: "No contract, receipt, rule, or regulation shall exempt any corporation engaged in transporting persons or property by railway from liability of a common carrier, or carrier of passengers, which would exist had no contract, receipt, rule, or regulation been made or entered into." The jury found a verdict for $1,000, which was appealed from, but the judgment was affirmed in 95 Iowa, 260, 28 L.R.A. 718, 58 Am. St. Rep. 430, 63 N. W. 692. Justice Gray, in delivering the opinion of the United States Supreme Court on an appeal from the Iowa court, said, page 135 of 169 U. S., page 690 of 42 L. ed., and page 290 of 18 Sup. Ct. Rep.: "By the law of this country as declared by this court, in the absence of any statute controlling the subject, any contract by which a common carrier of goods or passengers undertakes to exempt himself from all responsibility for loss or damage arising from the negligence of himself or his servants is void as against public policy, as attempting to put off the essential duties resting upon every public carrier by virtue of his employment, and as tending to defeat the fundamental principles on which the law of common carriers was established,—to the securing of the utmost care and diligence in the performance of their important duties to the public." Justice Gray further says in his opinion: "The question of the right of a railway corporation to contract for exemption from liability for its own negligence is, indeed, like other questions affecting its liability as a common carrier of goods or passengers, one of those questions, not of merely local law, but of commercial law or general jurisprudence, upon which this court, in the absence of express statute regulating the subject, will exercise its own judgment, uncontrolled by the decisions of the courts of the state in which the cause of action arises. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

But the law to be applied is none the less the law of the state, and may be changed by its legislature, except so far as restrained by the Constitution of the state or by the Constitution or laws of the United States. . . . Railroad corporations, like all other corporations and persons doing business within the territorial jurisdiction of a state, are subject to its law. It is in the law of the state that provisions are to be found concerning the rights and duties of common carriers of persons or of goods, and the measures by which injuries resulting from their failure to perform their obligations may be prevented or redressed. Persons travelling on interstate trains are as much entitled, while within a state, to the protection of the state, as those who travel on domestic trains. A carrier exercising his calling within a particular state, although engaged in the business of interstate commerce, is answerable according to the law of the state for acts of nonfeasance or of misfeasance committed within its limits. If he fails to deliver goods to the proper consignee at the right time and place, or if, by negligence in transportation, he inflicts injury upon the person of a passenger brought from another state, the right of action for the consequent damage is given by the local law. It is equally within the power of the state to prescribe the safeguards and precautions foreseen to be necessary and proper to prevent by anticipation those wrongs and injuries which, after they had been inflicted, the state has the power to redress and to punish. The rules prescribed for the construction of railroads, and for their management and operation, designed to protect persons and property otherwise endangered by their use, are strictly within the scope of the local law. They are not in themselves regulations of interstate commerce, although they control in some degree the conduct and liability of those engaged in such commerce. So long as Congress has not legislated upon the particular subject they are rather to be regarded as legislation in aid of such commerce, and as a rightful exercise of the police power of the state to regulate the relative rights and duties of all persons and corporations within its limits. . . . The statute now in question, so far as it concerns liability for injuries happening within the state of Iowa,—which is the only matter presented for decision in this case,—clearly comes within the same principles. It is in no just sense a regulation of commerce. It does not undertake to impose any tax upon the company, or to restrict the persons or things to be carried, or to regulate the rate of tolls, fares, or freight.

Its whole object and effect are to make it more sure that railroad companies shall perform the duty resting upon them by virtue of their employment as common carriers to use the utmost care and diligence in the transportation of passengers and goods."

So in the case of Richmond & A. R. Co. v. R. A. Patterson Tobacco Co. supra, Mr. Justice White, as the organ of the court, in speaking of a contract, says on page 314 of 169 U. S., page 761 of 42 L. ed., page 335 of 18 Sup. Ct. Rep.: "Evidence thereof is but the instrument by which the fact that the will of the parties did meet is shown. . . . It is, of course, elementary that, where the object of a contract is the transportation of articles of commerce from one state to another, no power is left in the states to burden or forbid it; but this does not imply that, because such want of power obtains, there is also no authority on the part of the several states to create rules of evidence governing the form in which such contracts, when entered into within their borders, may be made,—at least until Congress, by general legislation, has undertaken to govern the subject. . . . Of course, in a latitudinarian sense, any restriction as to the evidence of a contract relating to interstate commerce may be said to be a limitation of the contract itself. But this remote effect resulting from the lawful exercise by a state of its power to determine the form in which contracts may be proved, does not amount to a regulation of interstate commerce." Justice White therein refers to the case we have just quoted from so liberally,—Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Solan.

It will thus be seen that it is perfectly legitimate for our legislature, in absence of any national legislation, to make such rules and regulations as to it may seem proper, provided it does not destroy or seriously hamper the subjects of interstate commerce. In the body of our statutes it will be observed that great care has been taken to leave the way open for the conduct of interstate commerce. We have only provided rules of evidence, and in doing this the decisions of the United States Supreme Court hold us perfectly justified. We therefore overrule all of these objections to the constitutionality of said statutes.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Jones, J., concurring:

I concur. There is a vital distinction between our statute and the Georgia statute, which was condemned in Central R. Co. v. Murphey, 196 U. S. 104, 49 L. ed. 444, 25 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Sup. Ct. Rep. 218, as an unlawful interference with interstate commerce. The Georgia statute made the initial carrier absolutely liable if it failed within thirty days after application to inform the shipper in writing when, where, how, and by what carrier the freight was lost or damaged, together with the names of witnesses to establish such facts; whereas, our statute, § 1710, provides that the carrier shall be excused from liability upon proof that, by the exercise of due diligence, it has been unable to trace the line upon which the loss or damage occurred. The Georgia statute prevented a carrier from availing itself of a valid contract exempting from liability for loss or damage occurring beyond its own line except upon an onerous condition, which in many cases it could not meet; whereas, the South Carolina statute excuses the carrier if the loss did not occur on its own line and it could not, after due diligence, comply with the requirement of the statute. Section 2176 provides that the carrier may discharge itself from liability by the production of a receipt in writing for the articles from the connecting carrier, and the act of 1903 makes the bill of lading, etc., issued by the carrier for the freight, etc., prima facie evidence of liability for loss or damage to the goods in course of transportation.

The effect of these statutes as applied to interstate shipments is not to regulate interstate commerce, or to burden it or materially interfere therewith, but to afford a reasonable protection to the shipper, in view of the great difficulty in the way of his proving where the loss occurred, and the relative ease and effectiveness with which the carrier might with reasonable diligence ascertain the facts and communicate to him.

Woods, J., concurs in both of the above opinions.

A PPEAL by defendant, Murphy, from a decree of the Appellate Court, First District, reversing a decree of the Superior Court for Cook County in his favor in an interpleader proceeding to determine the right to the proceeds of a mutual benefit certificate. Reversed.

Statement by Hand, J.:

The Catholic Order of Foresters, a fraternal insurance society, on the 19th day of April, 1905, filed a bill of interpleader in the superior court of Cook county against Mary A. Riggs, the testatrix of the appellant, and Ruby Belle Riggs Nowak, the appellee, to require said Mary A. Riggs and the appellee to interplead and settle their respective claims to the proceeds of a benefit certificate for $1,000 issued by said Catholic Order of Foresters upon the life of John Riggs, who died January 17, 1905. Answers and replications were filed, and upon a hearing the court decreed that the amount of said certificate, less costs and attorneys' fees, be paid to Mary A. Riggs. From that decree an appeal was prosecuted to the appellate court for the first district by Ruby Belle Riggs Nowak, where the decree of the superior court was reversed, and the cause was remanded, with directions to the superior court to enter a decree finding that said Ruby Belle Riggs Nowak was entitled to said fund; and, Mary A. Riggs having departed this life testate while said cause was pending in the appellate court, the appellant, Thomas Murphy, the executor of said Mary A. Riggs, deceased, was substituted as appellee in her stead in the appellate court, and he has prosecuted an appeal to this court.

The case was tried upon a stipulation as to the facts, from which it appears that the Catholic Order of Foresters was incorporated under the laws of the state of Illinois on May 24, 1883. That the object of its incorporation was declared to be "to establish a widows' and orphans' benefit fund for the benefit of dependents of deceased members." That on January 18, 1884, John Riggs, the husband of Mary A. Riggs, made a written application for membership in said order, in which application he directed that in case of his death all benefits to which he might be entitled should be paid to his wife, Mary A. Riggs, subject to such future disposal of the benefits among his dependents as he might direct, in compliance with the laws of the order, and agreed to conform in all respects to the laws, rules, and usages of the order then in force or which might thereafter be adopted. On the back of the application appeared the following unsigned direction: "Pay to Mrs. Mary A. Riggs, my wife, to be held in trust by her for my adopted daughter, Ruby Belle Riggs." That John Riggs was duly admitted to membership in said order, and to All Saints Court No. 9 thereof, on January 27, 1884. That a certificate bearing date December 18, 1884, was issued by said order to John Riggs, which recited it was made in consideration of the statements made by John Riggs in the application and to the medical examiner, and that the member would comply in the future with the laws, rules, and regulations.

be the only case passing upon this question. In the note to 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 653, many cases are cited on the question, Who are dependents of the insured under rules of a benefit association providing that a person dependent upon him may be a beneficiary? but none of the cases there cited pass upon 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

then governing the order or that might thereafter be enacted, and provided that, upon the compliance with said conditions, the order would pay to "Mary A. Riggs, to be held in trust for his adopted daughter, Ruby Belle Riggs, $1,000" if said member was in good standing and said certificate should remain in full force at the time of his death, which certificate was accepted in writing by John Riggs, as follows: "I accept this certificate on the conditions named. John Riggs." That the following rules and regulations of the said Catholic Order of Foresters went into effect on January 1, 1904, and were in force at the time of the death of said John Riggs: "(82) Benefits may be made payable to the following classes: Class 1: To the member's (1) wife; (2) children, including children by adoption or children of deceased children, such children taking the share of the deceased parents; (3) grandchildren; (4) parents; (5) brothers and sisters of the whole blood; (6) brothers and sisters of the half blood; (7) grandparents; (8) nieces and nephews; (9) cousins in the first degree; (10) uncles and aunts; (11) next of kin who would be distributees of the personal estate of such member upon his death intestate, in either of which cases no proof of dependency shall be required before issuing the benefit certificate. (83) Class 2: (1) To the member's affianced wife; (2) to any person who is dependent upon the member for maintenance, food, clothing, lodging, and education, in which case written evidence of the dependency, within the requirements of the laws of this order, must be furnished to the satisfaction of the high secretary before the benefit certificate can be issued. . . . (85) No benefit shall be payable to any person or persons of class 2, section 83, unless the dependency therein specified to be shown exists at the time of the member's death, in which case proof of such dependency at such time must be furnished in writing to the satisfaction of the high court before payment of the benefit shall be made. If at the time of the death of a member any such dependency shall have ceased, or shall be found not to have existed, or if the designation shall fail for illegality or otherwise, then the benefit shall be payable to the person or persons mentioned in class 1 of section eighty-two (82), if living, in the order of precedence as therein enumerated." That John Riggs, at the time of his death, was a member of said order in good standing, and left, him surviving, said Mary A. Riggs as his widow, Mary O'Brien, his sister, Hector Riggs, his brother, John J. Riggs, a nephew, Anna Woods, a niece, and Ambrose Houser, a nephew, his only heirs at law and next of kin. That the appellee, Ruby Belle Riggs Nowak, was not related by consanguinity or affinity to John Riggs, nor was she his adopted daughter by virtue of a decree of court. That at the age of three years, and in the year 1872, the appellee was taken by John Riggs and Mary A. Riggs from St. Joseph's Orphan Asylum to their home, where she was cared for, educated, and reared, and where she remained until she was about twenty years of age, at which time she went to work, but occasionally returned to the Riggs home up to 1893. That after 1893 she was self-supporting, and so continued to be up to 1904, when she was married. That John Riggs and Mary A. Riggs always treated the appellee as their daughter, held her out to the world as their adopted daughter, and spoke of her as their adopted daughter; and John Riggs often expressed a desire and intention that she should have the benefit, upon his death, of the $1,000 mentioned in said certificate, which expressions were repeated within a few weeks of his death.

Mr. Thomas J. O'Hare, for appellant:

Where the charter of an order provides for the establishment of a widows' and orphans' fund for the benefit of dependents of deceased members, the designation of a person who is neither related to nor dependent upon a member will not deprive the widow of her right to the fund.

Mr. Aaron Heims, with Messrs. M. E. Maher and John A. Swanson, for appellees.

Hand, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is first contended by the appellant that the appellee was not designated, in the application or otherwise, by John Riggs as the beneficiary to whom the amount of the insurance issued upon his life by the Catholic Order of Foresters should be paid, and for that reason the appellate court wrongfully directed the superior court to enter a decree in favor of appellee. The application signed by John Riggs directed that the benefit fund received upon the certificate upon his death should be paid to Mary A. Riggs, his wife, subject to such future disposal among his dependents as Riggs might thereafter direct; and upon the back of the application was indorsed the unsigned direction, "Pay to Mrs. Mary A. Riggs, my wife, to be held in trust by her for my adopted daughter, Ruby Belle Riggs," and when the order issued to John Riggs the said certificate it made the beneficiary fund therein provided to be paid upon his death payable to "Mary A. Riggs, to be held in trust for his adopted daughter, Ruby Belle Riggs," and when the certificate was delivered to John Riggs he accepted it in writing, over his signature, in the following form: "I accept this certificate on the conditions named." The certificate remained in force from 1884 to 1905, during which time John Riggs paid the assessments thereon without objection as to its form, and repeatedly stated while the certificate was in force that the fund provided to be paid, mentioned therein, upon his death would go to the appellee. In the application, while John Riggs directed that the amount of the certificate should be paid to his wife, he provided that the designation of his wife as beneficiary should be subject to such future disposal of the benefit fund among his dependents as he might thereafter direct. Had the direction indorsed upon the application been signed by John Riggs, there can be no question but that such would have been a disposition of the beneficiary fund by Riggs within the terms of the application. Although the direction indorsed upon the application was not signed by Riggs, it was followed by the order in making out the certificate, and the certificate was accepted by Riggs in that form, and retained by him for many years, during which time he recognized the certificate as correctly stating the beneficiary to whom he desired the fund paid at his death. In view of all these facts, we think it clearly appears that the appellate court properly held that the appellee was the equitable beneficiary named in the certificate issued upon the life of John Riggs by said order.

It is next contended that the appellee was not, within the meaning of the law, a dependent upon John Riggs, and that she cannot, therefore, take said beneficiary fund. It appears that the appellee was taken by John Riggs and Mary A. Riggs, his wife, from an orphan asylum when she was about three years of age, and that she remained in their home and was treated by them as a daughter until she attained the age of about twenty years, and until she became self-supporting. As we understand the authorities, especially the case of Alexander v. Parker, 144 Ill. 355, 19 L.R.A. 187, 33 N. E. 183, there can be no reasonable contention made that the appellee was not a dependent upon John Riggs, within the meaning of the law, at the time he applied for membership in said order, and for many years thereafter. In the Alexander Case, 144 Ill. 366, 19 L.R.A. 193, 33 N. E. 184, it was said: "A dependent, as the term is used in reference to these benevolent associations, is one who is sustained by another, or relies for support upon the aid of another." The appellee for many years after the order issued to John Riggs said certificate was supported and sustained by John Riggs, and, as we think, had the moral right to rely, and did rely, upon him for support. He had taken her when but three years of age into his family, and from that time forward he and his wife had treated her as their daughter. Clearly, the relations between the parties were such that the appellee could not have recovered for services rendered them during the years of her minority; neither could they have recovered from the appellee for the support, clothing, and education which they furnished her during her minority, or so long thereafter as they sustained the relation of parent and child towards each other. During that period she was, we think, a dependent upon John Riggs.

It is urged, however, that, even though it be conceded that the appellee was properly designated as the equitable beneficiary in the application and certificate, and although it appears that she was a dependent upon John Riggs at the time the certificate was issued, and remained such dependent for many years thereafter, she was not a dependent of his at the time of his death, and cannot, by reason of that fact, take such fund. It is the settled law of this state that when the statute under which a benefit society similar to the Catholic Order of Foresters is organized, and its charter, adopted in pursuance of such statute, designates certain classes of persons as those for whom a benefit fund is to be accumulated, a person not belonging to either one of such classes is not entitled to take the fund; that the corporation has no authority to create a fund for other persons than the classes specified, nor can a member direct the fund to be paid to a person outside of such classes. Alexander v. Parker, supra; Norwegian Old People's Home Soc. v. Wilson, 176 Ill. 94, 52 N. E. 41. It is also held that the beneficiary named in the certificate of such society acquires no vested right to the benefit to accrue upon the death of the member until such death occurs, and that a member, during his lifetime, may exercise the power to change or substitute a new or different beneficiary from the one named in the certificate at such time and upon such conditions as to him seems proper, subject only to the limitations and restrictions imposed by the organic law of the society, or the rules and regulations adopted in conformity therewith. Martin v. Stubbings, 126 Ill. 387, 9 Am. St. Rep. 620, 18 N. E. 657; Delaney v. Delaney, 175 Ill. 187, 51 N. E. 961. It is also held that upon the death of the member, where the person designated as beneficiary is outside of the classes eligible as beneficiaries, as fixed by the statute or charter of the society, the member's heirs at law who are within the classes are entitled to the insurance. *Supreme Lodge, K. & L. of H. v. Menkhause*n, 209 Ill. 277, 65 L.R.A. 508, 101 Am. St. Rep. 239, 70 N. E. 567. From a consideration of the object for which benefit societies are formed, which is to afford protection to the families and dependents of the members of such societies after the death of the members, we are impressed that a person cannot take as a beneficiary unless he falls within one of the designated classes at the time of the death of the member. This view was taken by the 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

supreme court of Massachusetts in the case of Tyler v. Odd Fellows' Mut. Relief Asso. 145 Mass. 134, 13 N. E. 360. The contest in that case over the fund was between a wife, who was named as beneficiary, but who had been divorced by reason of the fault of her husband, and a son of the deceased husband. The court held that the wife having been divorced, she did not fall within the designation of wife at the date of the member's death, and could not take. On page 136 of 145 Mass., and on page 363 of 13 N. E., it was said: "The principal object of the association manifestly is, as its members die from time to time, to provide for those nearest to them whom they leave behind. Each of the several expressions touching the persons to whom the moneys are to be finally paid has reference to the relation of such persons to the member at the time of his death. The language in the agreement of association, 'to the families of deceased members or their heirs,' the proviso limiting payments upon designations to 'heirs or members of the decedent's family,' and the word 'widow' in the next clause, are inconsistent with any other interpretation. Assuming then, but not deciding, that the validity of a designation is to be determined at the outset with reference to the relation then existing between the member and his beneficiary, we think, to make it available after his death, there must then be a relation to the deceased such as is contemplated by the agreement of association and the by-laws relating to payment. . . . At the time of the death of L. E. Tyler, his former wife, Etta A. Tyler, was not a member of his family nor one of his heirs, but her connection with him had been severed by the divorce. We therefore think she had lost her rights under the designation of her former husband, and was not entitled to anything from the defendant association after his death."

In Order of Railway Conductors v. Koster, 55 Mo. App. 186, the same view was taken by the court of appeals of the state of Missouri. It was there said: "A benefit certificate of this kind has some of the features of an insurance policy, but it also has its point of difference, and in the particular we are now considering it is testamentary in its character. The rule of the law of insurance, that if one has an insurable interest at the date of the policy, the policy is not vitiated by termination of that interest, does not apply in a case like this. This act is testamentary in its character, in the respect that it speaks at the death of the member. As long as the lady . . . filled the description given in the certificate she was under its protection, but when she ceased to fill that description her interest in the certificate ceased. On the death of H. H. Koster the certificate, speaking for the first time, called for his wife, and there was none to answer."

In Supreme Lodge, K. & L. of H. v. Menkhause, supra, the foregoing cases were cited and the doctrine therein announced approved. In that case the husband, who was the beneficiary, had taken the life of his wife, the insured, and it was held by such act he forfeited his right as a beneficiary. The court, on page 283 of 209 Ill., page 511 of 65 L.R.A., page 241 of 101 Am. St. Rep., and on page 568 of 70 N. E., said: "The situation, so far as his rights and those of appellees and appellant are concerned, we think, is precisely the same as though, after the issuance of the certificate, he had been divorced from Elizabeth Menkhause, and she had thereafter died without having any alteration made in the certificate. Under such circumstances, he would have no interest in the certificate. But the proceeds thereof would be payable to the heirs of the insured; nothing to the contrary appearing in the certificate, the constitution and by-laws of the order, or the laws of the state under which it operates. Tyler v. Odd Fellows' Mut. Relief Asso. supra; Schonfield v. Turner, 75 Tex. 324, 7 L.R.A. 189, 12 S. W. 626; Order of Railway Conductors v. Koster, supra.

The Catholic Order of Foresters was organized "to establish a widows' and orphans' benefit fund for the benefit of dependents of deceased members." From this language it would seem clear that the fund was only to be paid to "dependents of deceased members;" that is, to a beneficiary who was dependent upon the member at the time of the death of the member. As said in the Tyler Case, this language "has reference to the relation of such persons to the member at the time of his death." The contract of insurance was made between the order and the member, and the appellee having no vested interest in the beneficiary fund during the lifetime of the member, no contract obligation between the order and appellee, or between the member and the appellee, would be impaired by requiring the appellee to show she was a dependent at the time of the death of the member.

It is urged, however, the statute under which the Catholic Order of Foresters was organized is broader than the charter of that order, and that the appellee can take the fund in controversy under the designation of "devisee," found in the act of 1883, as that act was construed in Martin v. Stubbings and Delaney v. Delaney, supra. We do not think this contention can be sustained. In 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Norwegian Old People's Home Soc. v. Wilson, 176 Ill., on page 96, 52 N. E., on page 42, where the same contention was made, it was said: "There can be no question that the Norwegian Old People's Home Society was incompetent to take under the terms of the certificate of incorporation of the association. It could not in any way be held to be a member of the deceased's immediate family, and only such persons were competent to take. It is no answer to say that the statute of the state under which the association was organized was broad enough to permit such society to take. The incorporators of the association chose to restrict the objects of its benevolence to the immediate family of the member, and the courts must construe the contract as they find it." And again: "The Policemen's Benevolent Association is an Illinois corporation, which has voluntarily chosen to restrict its benevolences to the immediate families of its members, and we must apply the restrictions found in the statement of the object of the association as specified in the certificate of incorporation, and not the statute itself in its broadest scope. It is obvious that there is nothing illegal or against public policy in the action of the association in narrowing the scope of its beneficial action." From what was said in that case, it is clear, in determining the classes who can take as beneficiaries, the court will look alone to the certificate of organization, and not to the statute under which the society is organized, which may be broader in its terms than the certificate of organization of the benefit society organized thereunder. Furthermore, the application signed by John Riggs, and the certificate issued to him by the order, both provided that he would conform in all respects to the laws, rules, and usages of the order then in force or which might thereafter be adopted. The act of 1893 relating to fraternal societies (Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1905, chap. 73, § 258, p. 1222) provides: "Payments of death benefits shall only be paid to the families, heirs, blood relations, affianced husband or affianced wife of, or to persons dependent upon, the member," and the order on January 1, 1904, adopted the by-laws numbered 82, 83, and 85, contained in the statement preceding this opinion, limiting the beneficiaries who might take under its certificates to the persons designated in the act of 1893, and provided by by-law 85 that "no benefit shall be payable to any person or persons of class 2, section 83, unless the dependency therein specified to be shown exists at the time of the member's death." It is not in proof that the Catholic Order of Foresters ever took formal action to bring itself within the provisions of the act of 1893. It does, however, appear from the averments of the bill and admission of appellee's answer that such was the fact. Upon that subject it is averred in the bill that the Catholic Order of Foresters "is organized and doing business for the purpose of paying death benefits to the families, heirs, blood relations, affianced husband or affianced wife of, or to persons dependent upon, its members," and the answer of the appellee to such averment is that it is admitted "complainant is a fraternal beneficiary society existing under the laws of the state of Illinois; that it is organized and doing business for the purpose of paying death benefits to the families, heirs, blood relations, and to dependents of deceased members." If the act of 1893 and section 85 of the by-laws of the order, passed in 1904, apply to the certificate issued to John Riggs, as we think they do, then by the express provision of said by-laws the appellee is excluded from receiving said benefit, as it is conceded the appellee was not dependent upon John Riggs for support at the time of his death.

It is urged, however, that the act of 1893 and the by-law of 1904 ought not to be applied so as to affect the appellee, as to so apply them would be to give them a retrospective operation. Such would doubtless be the rule if John Riggs had not expressly agreed they should be so applied. This he had the right to do, and, having so agreed, the appellee is not in a position to prevent their application. In Baldwin v. Begley, 185 Ill. 180, on page 188, 56 N. E. 1065, on page 1068, it was said: "A party cannot claim the right to have a contract remain unaltered when the contract itself provides that it may be changed. Here, Turner agreed in his application, made in 1885, that he would conform in all respects to the laws, rules, and usages of the order now in force or which may hereafter be adopted by the same." In the certificate issued to him on June 22, 1885, the condition was imposed "that the said member complies in the future with the laws, rules, and regulations now governing the said order, or that may hereafter be enacted by said high court." It thus appears by the terms of Turner's contract with the benefit society that he agreed to comply with such laws, rules, and regulations as might be enacted by the high court of the society in the future. . . . The law or rule of the society which was adopted in August, 1894, and which went into effect on January 1, 1895, and which provided that the payment of death benefits should only be made to the families, blood relations, heirs, affianced wife of, or to persons dependent on, the member, and that such benefit should not be willed, assigned, or transferred to any other person, comes within the terms of the contract made by Turner, and cannot be otherwise regarded than as one of those future laws or rules with which he agreed to comply."

The right of a beneficiary society to amend its by-laws so as to affect contracts already in force, where its contract with a member contains an express provision reserving to the society the right to amend or change its by-laws, which changes, it is provided, shall be binding upon the member, has been recognized by this court in numerous cases. In Fullenwider v. Supreme Council R. L. 180 Ill. 621, on page 625, 72 Am. St. Rep. 239, on page 243, 54 N. E. 485, on page 486, the court said: "The power to enact by-laws for the government of a corporate body is an incident to the existence of a body corporate, and is inherent in it. The power to make such changes as may be deemed advisable is a continuous one. Where the contract contains an express provision reserving the right to amend or change by-laws, it cannot be doubted that the society has the right so to do; and where, in a certificate of membership, it is provided that members shall be bound by the rules and regulations now governing the council and fund, or that may thereafter be enacted for such government, and those conditions are assented to, and the member accepts the certificate under the conditions provided therein, it is a sufficient reservation of the right in the society to amend or change its by-laws. . . . The contract requiring compliance with any by-laws that might be thereafter enacted, and the certificate being accepted with such a clause therein, there is no vested right of having the contract in the certificate remain unchanged, because the recognition of the power to make new by-laws is necessarily a recognition of the right to repeal or amend those theretofore made." In Supreme Lodge K. of P. v. Kutscher, 179 Ill. 340, 70 Am. St. Rep. 115, 53 N. E. 620, we recently held that a by-law forfeiting a claim for the death of a member of a benefit society, where the death of the member resulted from suicide, binds a member joining the society before the passage of such by-law, when his contract requires compliance with by-laws, "now in force or that may hereafter be enacted." And in Supreme Lodge K. of P. v. Trebbe, 179 Ill. 348, 70 Am. St. Rep. 120, 53 N. E. 730, it was held that the enactment of a law by the supreme lodge of a benefit society, which provides for the forfeiture of an endowment certificate upon the death of a member by suicide, binds the member whose contract requires compliance with all laws "now in force or that may hereafter be enacted by the supreme lodge."

From an examination of this record and the authorities which have been cited in the briefs of the respective parties, we have reached the conclusion that the appellee is not entitled to receive the beneficiary fund deposited in court by the Catholic Order of Foresters, on the ground that she did not, at the time of the death of John Riggs, fall within any one of the designated classes for which that order was authorized by its charter to accumulate a beneficiary fund; in other words, that the appellee was not a dependent of John Riggs at the time of his death.

The judgment of the Appellate Court will be reversed, and the decree of the Superior Court affirmed.

PHILIP KISTNER, Appt.,

v.

HETTIE J. PETERS.

(223 Ill. 607, 79 N. E. 311.)

Note—indorsement as maker—effect.

1. The indorsement upon a note by the payee, of a statement that he acknowledges himself a part maker of the note with one of the parties whose names are signed to the note, is not sufficient to render him a joint maker.

Same—change of indorsement.

2. The acknowledgment of liability as maker over the indorsement of a note by the payee may be stricken out as surplusage, and the indorsement treated by a transferee as a blank assignment, over which may be written any words consistent with the contract of indorsement.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, Fourth District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Effingham County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to enforce a promissory note. Affirmed.

Statement by Wilkin, J.:

On March 18, 1895, E. N. Rinehart, Philip Kistner, and Ph. Wiwi executed a promissory note to Rosa M. Rinehart in words and figures following:

March 18, 1895.

One year after date we promise to pay to the order of Rosa M. Rinehart one thousand dollars at Effingham, Illinois, value received, with interest at the rate of six per cent per annum.

E. N. Rinehart.
Philip Kistner.
Ph. Wiwi.

On the same date Rosa M. Rinehart made

Case Note.—Acknowledgment by payee, in indorsement, of liability as maker: —

A thorough search fails to disclose any authority upon this point. The case approaching nearest to KISTNER v. PETERS is Hosford v. Hotchkiss, 23 Blatchf. 479, 27 Fed. 285, where the payee of a promissory note, who was also maker's wife, transferred the note with this indorsement: "Pay to the order of Mrs. Louisa P. Peet. For value received I hereby charge my separate estate with payment of the within note." It was held that payee thereby became liable on the note as indorser only, and as such entitled to notice of dishonor; and that she did not, by such indorsement, become a joint maker with her husband. It is there said: "A promise to pay is doubtless to be inferred; but, whether the promise to be inferred is the promise of an indorser or the promise of a maker, is the question to be decided. My opinion is that the promise of an indorser is the promise to be inferred, and for this reason: The note itself shows that the primary relation of the defendant to the note was that of an indorser. She was the payee of the note; an indorsement by her was therefore contemplated. She wrote an indorsement on the note. If her action had been confined to writing this bare indorsement and signing her name, the 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

indorsement would have created no liability whatever on her part, because of the fact that she was a married woman. . . . What she added to the bare indorsement had the effect to deprive her of her personal immunity from liability that would follow [as a married woman] if nothing was added to the bare indorsement; and I find nothing in what she added indicating an intention to do more. In what she added she assumed a liability, but she did not state whether the liability was the liability of a maker, or the liability of an indorser of the note. Her intention in that respect is disclosed by the relation she then bore to the note, which was that of indorser. If she had intended to change her relation to the note from that of indorser to that of maker, something more would have been said. The indorsement she had written would have created a liability to pay in case of nonpayment by the maker, and due notice to her, but for the fact that she was a married woman; and this was the liability intended to be assumed by her as a married woman when she added what she did. From this a promise to pay must be inferred, but the promise must be coextensive with the liability assumed, and that was liability of an indorser, and not the liability of a maker."

I hereby acknowledge myself a principal maker of this note with E. N. Rinehart and my liability as such principal jointly with him.
Rose M. Rinehart.

The appellee, Hettie J. Peters, subsequently began a suit in attachment in the circuit court of said Effingham county against appellant Philip Kistner, the only surviving maker of the note. The declaration, after reciting the making of the note, payable to Rosa M. Rinehart, and its delivery to her, and the death of the makers other than the defendant, alleged that on the day and date aforesaid the said Rosa M. Rinehart then and there assigned the said note, by indorsement thereon under her hand, to the plaintiff, Hettie J. Peters, by means whereof the makers, including the defendant, Philip Kistner, then and there became liable to pay her the amount of said note, and, being so liable, made default.

The defendant craved oyer of the note and the indorsement thereon, which was allowed by the court, and he thereupon demurred to the declaration upon the ground that there was a variance between the indorsement and the allegations contained in the declaration. The demurrer was overruled and he elected to stand by it. A default was then entered against him and the court proceeded to assess the damages. The plaintiff offered in evidence the note, and asked leave to write, preceding the above indorsement, the words, "For value received I assign the within note to Hettie J. Peters, and" making the whole indorsement read: "For value received I assign the within note to Hettie J. Peters, and I hereby acknowledge myself a principal maker of this note with E. N. Rinehart and my liability as such principal jointly with him.—March 18, 1895.—Rosa M. Rinehart." The defendant objected to the additional words, but the court overruled the objection and permitted the indorsement to be made. Judgment was then entered by default in favor of the plaintiff for the amount of the note and costs. That judgment has been affirmed by the appellate court, and this further appeal is prosecuted.

Messrs. R. C. Harrah and S. F. Gilmore for appellee.

Wilkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant claims that the trial court erred, first, in overruling his demurrer; and, second, in allowing the additional indorsement to be made. As we understand his counsel, his contention is that the allegation of the declaration that the note was assigned to appellee is at variance with the legal effect of the indorsement on the back of the instrument, in that the indorsement was not legally an assignment, but by its terms Rosa M. Rinehart became a joint maker. The decision of this question will turn upon the legal effect, if any, to be given to the writing first indorsed on the note.

It is earnestly contended that by the indorsement Rosa M. Rinehart became a joint maker of the instrument. With this contention we cannot agree. It is undoubtedly true that one may become liable as a joint maker of a promissory note without reference to the position of his signature, whether it be found upon the face or back of the note, if it be shown by satisfactory evidence that the parties signing did so as joint makers. In other words, it is immaterial upon what part of the paper the signature of a party may appear, provided it be shown by satisfactory evidence that in signing it he did so intending to become a joint maker. Lincoln v. Hinzey, 51 Ill. 435, goes to this extent, but no farther. Ordinarily the signatures of parties to negotiable instruments have a well-understood position on the paper. The payee is named in the body of the note, the makers sign it upon its face below the body of the instrument, and the indorser or guarantor signs his or her name upon the back. Under the foregoing rule, however, the position or the names is not of controlling importance if an intention be satisfactorily shown to bind the parties as makers or guarantors. In this case the note was made and signed in conformity with the usual and ordinary custom. It was made payable to Rosa M. Rinehart and signed at the bottom by E. N. Rinehart, Philip Kistner, and Ph. Wiwi. The name of Rosa M. Rinehart was signed upon the back, which made her an indorser in blank unless the words preceding her signature show a different intention, and the person to whom she delivered it, so indorsed, became the legal owner, authorized to maintain an action upon it. Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1903, chap. 98, § 4, p. 1278. "In its most general and literal signification an indorsement is an incidental or subsidiary writing upon the back of a paper or document to the contents of which it relates or pertains." 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 256. It may consist merely of the name, commonly called an indorsement in blank, or it may be limited or specific; but "under the law merchant [its legal effect] includes properly, first, a transfer of the title to the instrument indorsed; and, second [unless otherwise limited], a conditional promise to pay the same." Id. p. 257.

In determining what, if any, legal effect can be given to the words, "I hereby acknowledge myself a principal," etc., it must be borne in mind that Rosa M. Rinehart was at the time of the indorsement the payee of the note, and not a stranger or third party. The contention that she became a joint maker of the note payable to herself, under the well-settled rule, also insisted upon by counsel for appellant, that a note payable to the maker is without legal effect until assigned, renders the whole transaction a nullity, which we cannot presume was intended. An attempt to become the principal maker of a negotiable instrument with one of several makers is an anomaly in the law. Of course, it may be done, but the evidence of that intention must clearly appear, and to give the indorsement in this case that effect would destroy the negotiability of the instrument and do violence to the intention of Mrs. Rinehart. She manifestly intended to assign the note to Hettie J. Peters. What purpose she may have had in the use of the language preceding her signature can only be a matter of conjecture. Probably it was with some idea of enlarging her liability as indorser. But, however this may be, we will not attribute to that language the intention of relieving the makers of all legal liability. The name of the payee upon the back of a negotiable instrument will transfer the legal title to the same, and it makes no difference that there is written about it language enlarging the liability of the indorser, such as a guaranty of the payment of the note. Heaton v. Hulbert, 4 Ill. 489; Herring v. Woodhull, 29 Ill. 92, 81 Am. Dec. 296; Judson v. Gookwin, 37 Ill. 286.

Our conclusion is that the language, "I hereby acknowledge myself a principal maker," etc., may be stricken out as surplusage, without legal meaning or effect, and that under the allegations of the declaration the signature of Rosa M. Rinehart makes her an indorser. In other words, the indorsement, unexplained, does not show an intention other than to assign and transfer the legal title of the instrument to the appellee.

As to the correctness of the ruling of the trial court in permitting the indorsement, "for value received," etc., preceding the writing first placed on the note, little need be said. If the indorsement was, in legal effect, in blank, as we think it was, the assignee had the authority to write any words over the signature consistent with the contract of indorsement, and she might do that at any time before or during the trial of the case. Vansant v. Allmon, 23 Ill. 30; Maxwell v. Vansant, 46 Ill. 58; Boynton v. Pierce, 79 Ill. 145. Furthermore, the defendant, having demurred to the declaration and elected to stand by his demurrer, was in no position to object to that indorsement. He was in no way injured by it.

We concur in the judgment of the Appellate Court, and it will accordingly be affirmed.

Farmer, J., having heard this case in the circuit court, took no part in its decision here.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

NORA O'CONNOR, Appt.,

v.

PATRICK HENDRICK, Trustee, etc., et al.
Respts.

(184 N. Y. 421, 77 N. E. 612.)

Public school—regulation of superintendent—effect.

1. That the teacher is not a party to an appeal to the superintendent of public instruction from the hiring by a school trustee of a teacher wearing a distinctively religious garb does not prevent his decision, which is in fact a regulation of the common schools within his jurisdiction, from being binding on her, although as a mere decision it would not be because she is not a party to the proceeding.

Same—power to make regulations.

2. The power of a superintendent of public instruction to make regulations for the management of the public schools is implied from a provision in a statute permitting him to remove trustees for disobeying any "decision, order, or regulation."

Same—reasonableness of regulation—religious garb.

3. A regulation of the department of public instruction prohibiting teachers in common schools from wearing a distinctively religious garb while engaged in the work of teaching is not unreasonable.

Contract—regulation affecting unlawful impairment.

4. No unlawful interference with existing contracts is effected by the promulgation of a regulation by the department of public instruction forbidding teachers to wear a distinctively religious garb while in the performance of their duties, since all contracts are impliedly subject to the power of the superintendent to make reasonable regulations as to the management of the schools.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of a trial term for Livingston County denying a portion of her claim for wages alleged to be due her as a teacher in a public school. Affirmed.

Statement by Willard Bartlett, J.:

The plaintiff and Elizabeth E. Dowd, being teachers duly licensed to teach in the common schools of this state, entered into contracts with the board of trustees of school district No. 9, in the town of Lima, county of Livingston, in the autumn of 1902, to teach in the public school of said district for a term of thirty-six consecutive weeks at a specified rate of compensation. While so engaged in teaching they wore the distinctive dress or costume of a religious society connected with the Roman Catholic Church, of which they were members, which society is known as the "Order of the Sisterhood of St. Joseph." On May 28, 1903,

Case Note.—Validity of rule forbidding religious garb in school:—The only case on this subject, except O'CONNOR v. HENDRICK, which a careful search has discovered, is Hyson v. School District, 164 Pa. 629, 26 L.R.A. 203, 44 Am. St. Rep. 632, 30 Atl. 482, which is sufficiently set out by the court in its opinion in O'CONNOR v. HENDRICK.

the state superintendent of public instruction promulgated a decision made by him upon an appeal under the consolidated school law (Laws 1894, p. 1278, chap. 556, title 14), in which he declared that the wearing of an unusual dress or garb, worn exclusively by members of one religious denomination for the purpose of indicating membership in that denomination, by the teachers in the public schools during school hours while teaching therein, constitutes a sectarian influence and the teaching of a denominational tenet or doctrine, which ought not to be persisted in. The decision further declared it to be the duty of the school authorities to require such teachers to discontinue the wearing of such dress or garb while in the public schoolroom and in the performance of their duties as teachers therein; and it directed Patrick Hendrick, one of the defendants herein, as sole trustee of school district No. 9, in the town of Lima, Livingston county, to notify the plaintiff and Elizabeth E. Dowd forthwith to discontinue, during the school hours of each school day, the wearing of the distinctive dress of the sisterhood to which they belonged, and commanded him to dismiss them if they refused to comply with this requirement. On May 29, 1903, the said Patrick Hendrick notified the plaintiff and Elizabeth E. Dowd of the contents of the decision. Notwithstanding this notification they continued to teach school wearing the prohibited garb up to June 19, 1903, which was the end of the school year. Mr. Hendrick, the school trustee, does not appear to have made any effort to remove or dismiss them. The present action was brought against him by the plaintiff, in her own behalf and as assignee of the claim of Elizabeth E. Dowd, to recover a balance of $79.20 alleged to be due under their contracts with the school district. Mr. Hendrick defended on the ground that the plaintiff and her assignor had lost all right to recover anything under their contracts by reason of the fact that they had continued to wear the distinctive costume of the religious sisterhood to which they belonged, while engaged in teaching, after they had received notice of the aforesaid decision of the state superintendent of public instruction. The other defendants, who were taxpayers allowed to intervene at their own instance, also interposed an answer setting up a similar defense. The case was tried by consent without a jury before a justice of the supreme court, who held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover $25.20, being the amount of the compensation of the two teachers which had been earned, but not paid, prior to the time when they were notified of the superintendent's decision. He held, however, that the plaintiff and her assignor were not entitled to recover for any services rendered during the three weeks in which they continued to teach after the decision of the superintendent had been brought to their attention. From the judgment rendered at the trial term, the plaintiff appealed to the appellate division, where that judgment has been affirmed by a divided court.

Willard Bartlett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The real question in this case is whether the plaintiff and the plaintiff's assignor lost their right to any further compensation under their contract of service as teachers, by reason of their refusal to comply with a regulation established by the state superintendent of public instruction which in effect prohibited teachers from wearing a distinctive religious garb while engaged in the work of teaching. The order made by the superintendent on the subject was in form the decision of an appeal. The consolidated school law as then in force provided for certain appeals to the state superintendent of public instruction by any person conceiving himself aggrieved in consequence of any decision made by various officers, including a decision by the trustees of any district in paying any teacher. Laws 1894, chap. 556, title 14, § 1, p. 1278. One Alfred K. Bates prosecuted an appeal under the statute to review the action of Patrick Hendrick as school trustee of school district No. 9, in the town of Lima, in employing the plaintiff and Elizabeth E. Dowd as teachers, and allowing them to teach while wearing the distinctive dress of the Roman Catholic religious order known as the "Sisterhood of St. Joseph," and it was upon this appeal that the superintendent promulgated the order prohibiting teachers from wearing the costume in question while engaged in the actual work of teaching. Neither the plaintiff nor Elizabeth E. Dowd was a party to the proceedings thus brought before the superintendent, nor does it appear that they had any knowledge of it while it was pending. It is plain, therefore, that it could have had no effect upon their rights considered as a judicial decision or prior adjudication. It seems to me, however, that it may be and should be viewed in another light, and, if thus regarded, that it constituted a rule of conduct which the plaintiff and her fellow teacher were bound to obey. Although a decision in form, it was in fact a regulation in regard to the management of the common schools which the superintendent had the right to establish, provided, only, that it was reasonable in its character and not in conflict with the laws of the state or public policy.

While it is true that there is no express grant of authority to the state superintendent of public instruction (now the commissioner of education under unification act [Laws 1904, p. 94, chap. 40]) in the consolidated school law to establish regulations as to the management of the common schools, the existence of a general power of supervision on his part over such schools is clearly implied in many parts of the statute. Among other things, he was required, so far as he could consistently with his other duties, to visit such of the common schools as he saw fit, and inquire into their course of instruction, management, and discipline, and advise and encourage the pupils, teachers, and officers thereof. Consolidated School Law, Laws 1894, chap. 556, title 1, § 8, p. 1186. The statute further prescribed that he should submit to the legislature an annual report containing, among other things, "a statement of the condition of the common schools of the state, and of all other schools and institutions under his supervision, and subject to his visitation as superintendent." Laws 1894, chap. 556, title 1, § 9, subd. 1, p. 1186. It also gave him the power to remove any school commissioner or other school officer whenever it should be proved to his satisfaction that any such school commissioner had been guilty of any wilful violation or neglect of duty under the statute, or of "wilfully disobeying any decision, order, or regulation" of the superintendent. Title 1, § 13.

The authority to remove an officer for the wilful disobedience of a regulation of the superintendent necessarily implies a power on the part of the superintendent to make regulations; and, as has already been suggested, if the superintendent possessed the power to establish regulations in regard to the management of the common schools, the courts will not pronounce such regulations invalid unless they are unlawful or unreasonable. In arriving at a determination as to its validity a regulation in reference to the management of the common schools established by an officer under statutory authority is to be tested by rules similar to those which would apply in the case of a municipal ordinance, as to which the rule is that "ordinances passed in virtue of the implied power must be reasonable, consonant with the general powers and purposes of the corporation, and not inconsistent with the laws or policy of the state." 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 319. The rule which seems to be applicable here was enunciated and applied by the supreme court of Illinois in the case of Rulison v. Post, 79 Ill. 567, where the statutory duties of school directors were under consideration, and it was said: "In the performance of their duty in carrying the law into effect, the directors may prescribe proper rules and regulations for the government of the schools of their district, and enforce them. They may, no doubt, classify the scholars, regulate their studies and their deportment, the hours to be taught, besides the performance of other duties necessary to promote the success and secure the well-being of such schools. But all such rules and regulations must be reasonable, and calculated to promote the objects of the law,—the conferring of such an education upon all, free of charge." Another case involving a similar question is School Trustees v. People, 87 Ill. 303, 29 Am. Rep. 55, where it was held that a regulation by school trustees excluding a pupil from a high school because his father did not wish him to study grammar therein was arbitrary and unreasonable and could not be enforced.

We are thus brought to the question whether in this state a regulation is to be deemed unreasonable which prohibits teachers in the common schools from wearing a distinctively religious garb while engaged in the work of teaching. In my opinion it cannot justly be so regarded. "Neither the state," says the Constitution, "nor any subdivision thereof, shall use its property or credit or any public money, or authorize or permit either to be used, directly or indirectly, in aid or maintenance, other than for examination or inspection, of any school or institution of learning wholly or in part under the control or direction of any religious denomination, or in which any denominational tenet or doctrine is taught." Const. art. 9, § 4. Here we have the plainest possible declaration of the public policy of the state as opposed to the prevalence of sectarian influences in the public schools. The regulation established by the state superintendent of public instruction through the agency of his order in the Bates appeal is in accord with the public policy thus evidenced by the fundamental law. There can be little doubt that the effect of the costume worn by these Sisters of St. Joseph at all times in the presence of their pupils would be to inspire respect, if not sympathy, for the religious denomination to which they so manifestly belong. To this extent the influence was sectarian, even if it did not amount to the teaching of denominational doctrine. A different view was taken by the supreme court of Pennsylvania in the case of Hysong v. School District, 164 Pa. 629, 654, 26 L. R.A. 203, 44 Am. St. Rep. 632, 30 Atl. 482, where it was held that school districts might employ as teachers sisters of a religious order of the Roman Catholic Church, and permit them while teaching to wear the garb of their order, provided no religious sectarian instruction should be given, nor any religious sectarian exercises engaged in. There was a dissenting opinion in that case, however, strongly reasoned in support of the conclusion that a school conducted similarly to that in the case at bar was in effect dominated by sectarian influence. The teachers, said Mr. Justice Williams in this dissenting opinion, "come into the schools, not as common school-teachers or as civilians, but as the representatives of a particular order in a particular church, whose lives have been dedicated to religious work under the direction of that church. Now the point of the objection is, not that their religion disqualifies them. It does not. Nor is it thought that church membership disqualifies them. It does not. It is not that holding an ecclesiastical office or position disqualifies them, for it does not. It is the introduction into the schools as teachers of persons who are by their striking and distinctive ecclesiastical robes necessarily and constantly asserting their membership in a particular church, and in a religious order within that church, and the subjection of their lives to the direction and control of its officers."

As to the reasonableness of the regulation prohibiting the use of a distinctive religious garb by teachers in the common schools, some other considerations may be mentioned. It must be conceded that some control over the habiliments of teachers is essential to the proper conduct of such schools. Thus, grotesque vagaries in costume could not be permitted without being destructive of good order and discipline. So, also, it would be manifestly proper to prohibit the wearing of badges calculated on particular occasions to constitute cause of offense to a considerable number of pupils, as, for example, the display of orange ribbons in a public school in a Roman Catholic community on the 12th of July. It is suggested in the brief of the learned counsel for the appellant that, if the state superintendent could order these teachers to refrain from wearing their distinctive religious costumes, he could just as lawfully direct them to don a dress of any other pattern, or to compel a teacher to remove a gown because it was too plain or too gay, or that he might order the principal to cut off his beard or color his moustache. The obvious answer to these suggestions and others of a similar character is that no regulation would be valid which was manifestly unreasonable, because it would then be unauthorized by law.

The views which have already been expressed substantially dispose of all the points argued in behalf of the appellant, as well as those suggested in the dissenting opinion below, except the proposition that the state superintendent had no right to annul a valid contract between a teacher and the school district by which she was employed. The proposition is correct, but it has no application to the present case, because a contract between the trustees and the teacher of a common school is, by implication, subject to the power of the superintendent to make reasonable regulations as to the management of the school. This being the case, the superintendent does not annul a valid contract by insisting that such reasonable regulations shall be observed, for by entering into the contract the teacher assumes the implied obligation to obey such regulations.

It follows that the judgment appealed from should be affirmed, with costs. In reaching this result, however, I do not wish to be understood as acquiescing in that part of the opinion below in which it is asserted that "these sisters should never be permitted to teach in our public schools." There is no reason, either in morals or in law, why they or any other qualified persons should not be allowed thus to teach, whatever may be their religious convictions, provided that they do not by their acts as teacher promote any denominational doctrine or tenet.

Trust—married woman—conveyance.

1. A provision in a deed conveying property to a trustee for the use of a married woman, permitting him to convey upon request of the beneficiary, she joining in the deed, prevents her conveyance without the aid of the trustee.

Same—power to convey—death of trustee.

2. The death of the trustee to whom is conveyed property for a married woman with power to join her in its conveyance without the execution of the power destroys it so that it cannot be subsequently executed.

Same—death of trustee—descent.

3. That the children of a trustee are infants does not prevent the trust estate from descending upon them in case of the death of the trustee charged with the trust.

Trust—same—execution of use.

4. Where an estate is conveyed to a trustee for the use of a married woman for life and to preserve contingent remainders, the statute, upon the death of her husband, does not execute the use in her so as to permit her to convey the estate.

Same—power to convey—real estate.

5. A provision in a deed conveying property to a trustee for the use of a married woman during life with remainder over, that, in case the life tenant should desire any of the property to be conveyed in fee or otherwise, the trustee should have power to convey joining her in the deed, applies to her life estate as well as to the fee, so as to prevent any conveyance by her without joining the trustee.

Same—statute of limitations.

6. Possession taken under a deed by a married woman of property which was conveyed to a trustee for her life and to pre-

Case Note.—Disability of some but not all of the joint tenants as affecting the statute of limitations: —The court in CAMERON v. HICKS, in holding that the running of the statute of limitations against one of several joint tenants will bar an action against all, although the remainder are under disability, bases its decision on the rule that when a joint right of action accrues to several, the right must exist in all at the time when the action is brought, and when the statute begins to run as to one of the parties to such an action, it runs as to all. Many of the authorities dealing with this question are sufficiently set out by the court in CAMERON v. HICKS.

In a case similar to CAMERON v. HICKS, the court held that the fact that some of the serve remainders, with power to convey by joining the life tenant, sets the statute of limitations in operation against not only the trustee, but the life tenant and the remainder-men.

Same—deed by beneficiary.

7. A deed by a married woman, executed in the manner prescribed by law for the conveyance of her estates, is of no effect against a trustee to whom the property was conveyed for her use by a deed providing that it might be conveyed by the trustee joining her in the deed.

Same—infant trustees.

8. The statute of limitations is, during the minority of the trustees, prevented from running upon possession being taken under a deed of a married woman for whose use property was conveyed to a trustee with power to sell by joining her in the deed, if at the time of the conveyance the trustee is dead and the title has descended to his infant heirs.

Same—joint tenants—bar against one.

9. The running of the statute of limitations against one of several joint tenants will operate as a bar against all, although the remainder are under disability.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Wayne County in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate. Reversed.

Statement by Connor, J.:

Edmund Coor, on the 3d day of May, 1870, executed to E. R. Cox, trustee, and his heirs a deed conveying the land in controversy "to the sole and separate use of Amanda M. Cameron, wife of John Cameron, during her life, and after her death to convey the same to such children and their heirs as she, the said Amanda, may leave her surviving, and to the issue and their heirs of such as may be dead, such issue to represent their ancestors and take such part as he or she would have taken if living; and if, during the life of the said Amanda, she should desire any or all of the said property conveyed in fee or otherwise to convey the same according to her wishes, she joining in said conveyance as if she were a feme sole, though her husband be living." Said deed was duly recorded in the office of the register of deeds of Wayne county. The said E. R. Cox, trustee, died June 18, 1875, leaving surviving certain children and grandchildren, all of whom were either infants or married women and so remained to the beginning of this action, August 11, 1902, except one daughter, Florence Virginia Cox, who became twenty-one years of age October 24, 1880, and was married to T. J. Newsome, December 9, 1880. On October 28, 1880, John Cameron and his wife, Amanda Cameron, executed a deed for the land in controversy to the defendant E. F. Hicks, sufficient in form to convey said lands in fee simple with full covenants of warranty. There was evidence tending to show that the said Hicks went into possession of said land, described in said deed, immediately after its execution, and that he and the other defendants claiming under him have remained in possession until the beginning of this action. The deed from Cameron and wife to Hicks recited a consideration of $800. John Cameron died June, 1881. His widow, Amanda, died March, 1901, leaving surviving six children, all of whom, with the exception of A. F. Cameron and J. D. Cameron, the last of whom died since the beginning of this action, are parties plaintiff herein, together with the children of J. D. Cameron. That all the living children and the children of such as are dead of E. R. Cox, trustee, are parties defendant herein, together with the grantees of E. F. Hicks, to whom portions of the said lands were conveyed as aforesaid. The court charged the jury that, if they believed the tenants were infants or femes covert when title to real property accrued to them did not bring their rights within the saving clause of the statute of limitations, where other tenants were under no disability. Simpson v. Shannon, 3 A. K. Marsh. 462. And this was held to be true whether plaintiffs claim title as copartners, as joint tenants, or as tenants in common.

And in Floyd v. Johnson, 2 Litt. (Ky.) 109, 13 Am. Dec. 255, which was an action of ejectment, the court declared that in order to claim the benefit of the saving clause of the statute of limitations, joint tenants must all have been under some disability at the time their right accrued.

The common-law doctrine that joint tenants must sue and be sued jointly was held to have been modified by statute in Virginia, so that the infancy of one joint tenant does not prevent the application of the act of limitations to other joint tenants not under disability. Redford v. Clarke, 100 Va. 115, 40 S. E. 630. A similar decision was rendered in Moore v. Armstrong, 10 Ohio, 11, 36 Am. Dec. 63, where one joint tenant was under disability by reason of coverture.

But it is held to be well settled in South Carolina that the minority of one cotenant will protect the interests of his adult cotenant from the operation of the statute of limitations, and that the rule extends to tenants in common as well as to joint tenants, and applies whether the infant cotenant is joined in an action to try the title or not. Hill v. Sanders, 4 Rich. L. 521, 55 Am. Dec. 696; Boozar v. Teague, 27 S. C. 348, 3 S. E. 551.

evidence, they should answer the issues for the plaintiffs, to wit: "That they were each entitled to one-sixth undivided interest of the land in controversy." Defendants excepted, and assigned the said instruction as error. From a judgment upon the verdict, defendants appealed.

Connor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The record, with the exhaustive and well-considered briefs in this appeal, clearly present the questions upon which the rights of the parties depend.

The plaintiffs suggest that it is not necessary for them to combat the principle decided in Kirby v. Boyette, 118 N. C. 244, 24 S. E. 18. They say that the cases may be distinguished. In Kirby's Case the declaration of the trust was for the separate use of the married woman and her heirs, whereas here it is for "the sole and separate use of Mrs. Cameron for and during her natural life, and at her death to convey to her children, then living, and the issue of such as were dead." This language, it is insisted, brings the case directly within the principle announced in Swann v. Myers, 75 N. C. 585. Chief Justice Pearson was clearly of the opinion, in that case, that "a married woman owning an estate for life, in a trust estate, has jus disponendi . . . unless there be a restraint upon the power of alienation." This, he says, "is laid down in all of the books." No authorities are cited. The trust in that case was for "the separate use and behalf" of Mrs. Swann for her life and then over. It is difficult to reconcile this language with that of Manly, J., in Knox v. Jordan, 58 N. C. (5 Jones, Eq.) 175. In that case the English rule is discussed, the cases decided by this court reviewed, resulting in the conclusion that the feme covert may alien or encumber her separate estate in execution of powers conferred upon her by the terms of the deed, and if not restricted by the terms may, under the authority of Frazier v. Brownlow, 38 N. C. (3 Ired. Eq.) 237, 42 Am. Dec. 165, charge the income or profits, etc. The question in regard to the wife's power to deal with her separate estate was before the court in Withers v. Sparrow, 66 N. C. 129, where it was held that she could, "with the assent of the trustee," charge it. Light is thrown upon the language of Pearson, Ch. J., in Swann v. Myers by referring to his dissenting opinion in Harris v. Harris, 42 N. C. (7 Ired. Eq.) 120, 53 Am. Dec. 393, wherein it was held that a feme covert entitled to a separate personal estate, in the absence of any restraint in the deed, could dispose of it as a feme sole, whether there was or was not a trustee. In that case a slave had been conveyed to a trustee for the separate use of a married woman during her life, with remainder over, etc. The court, by Ruffin, Ch. J., held that, in the absence of any restraint upon her right of alienation, she could sell the slave. The decision is put upon the English authorities, citing, also, Newlin v. Freeman, 39 N. C. (4 Ired. Eq.) 312, and Dick v. Pitchford, 21 N. C. (1 Dev. & B. Eq.) 480. Judge Pearson vigorously dissented from the doctrine of "implied power" in the wife, etc. He says: "As the feme had only a separate use for life in a negro woman . . . of no annual profit, and as, for her maintenance, she had a right to dispose of the profits, and a life estate is only, in fact, a right to the profits, I should have been willing to put this case upon the ground that, in disposing of her life estate, she disposed of the profits only." He sets forth at length his dissent from the doctrine that, in the absence of any express power to sell the separate estate, the wife may do so as a feme sole. Ruffin, J., in Hardy v. Holly, 84 N. C. 661, referring to the question of division of opinion in Harris v. Harris, says: "When the question next arose, in the case of Knox v. Jordan, the court, as then constituted, without division, and without any sort of reservation, repudiated the doctrine of the English courts, and adopted that which prevailed in most of the courts of the states; and, whether this was wisely done or not, that case has been too often approved and doubtless too often acted upon in matters intimately connected with the interest and comfort of families to admit of its correctness being now called into question." Although the learned judge writing the opinion gave to the question, and the authorities, as was his custom, a most careful investigation, the case of Swann v. Myers is not cited, nor do we find that the learned counsel who argued the case for the plaintiff in their exhaustive brief called it to the attention of the court. In Hardy v. Holly, supra, a mode was prescribed in the deed for the disposition of the property.

We have carefully and anxiously examined the authorities, and are unable to find any recognition in those courts, which reject the English doctrine, of a distinction between the power of a feme covert to convey her "equitable life estate" and her equitable estate in fee. Professor Pomeroy says that the American courts, in regard to this question, may be divided into two classes. "In the first class, the courts have accepted the principle of the English doctrine. They regard the wife's jus disponendi as resulting from the fact of an equitable separate estate over which she is, partially at least, a feme sole, and not as resulting from the permissive provisions of the instrument creating such separate estate. It follows, therefore, where the instrument creating the separate estate imposes no express restrictions, that the wife has a general power of disposing or charging it, even though no such authority is, in terms, conferred. This power of disposition, however, does not generally extend to the corpus of the land held for her separate use in fee; it is confined to personal property, the rents and profits of the land, and perhaps to her life estates in lands. In the states composing the second class, the courts have widely departed from the principle of the English doctrine. They regard the wife's power over her separate estate as resulting, not from the existence of an equitable separate estate itself, but from the permissive provisions of the instrument creating such estate. They have accordingly adopted the general rule that a married woman has only those powers of disposing or charging her separate property which are expressly, or by necessary construction, conferred upon her in the instrument conveying the property or creating the trust, and that, in determining the extent of these powers, the terms of the instrument are to be strictly construed." 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. 3d ed. 1105; Bispham, Eq. § 103. Both these writers place North Carolina in the second class. The dissenting opinion of Judge Pearson in Harris v. Harris, supra, strongly maintains this doctrine. As we have seen, this dissenting opinion was adopted in Knox v. Jordan, and it is upon that decision the doctrine of Hardy v. Holly is based. In none of the cases following Hardy v. Holly is there any reference to Swann v. Myers or suggestion that, as to the equitable life estate, the feme covert may convey without the intervention of her trustee, when the deed requires his co-operation. It is not improbable that, in writing the opinion in Swann v. Myers, the chief justice had in mind the English doctrine by which the feme covert was permitted to charge the anticipated income, when not restrained, from her separate equitable estate, which he construes in his dissenting opinion in Harris v. Harris as enabling her to dispose of the entire life estate. However it may be, it would seem clear that, in this state, the distinction cannot be sustained. It will be observed that when the trust is declared "for the sole and separate use," or words equivalent thereto, of a married woman, the courts have uniformly held that, because of the presumed intention of the maker of the instrument the trust is active and the statute does not execute the use. When, as in McKenzie v. Sumner, 114 N. C. 425, 19 S. E. 375, there is a simple declaration of a trust, as pointed out by Shepherd, Ch. J., "there is no reason why the legal title is not vested in the plaintiff by the statute of uses." Whether the rule should have been modified, by reason of our constitutional provision, in regard to the status of married women, as suggested in Perkins v. Brinkley, 133 N. C. 154, 45 S. E. 541, it is useless to discuss. However this may be, the trust declared by the deed from Coor to Cox is active, and the necessity for the separation of the legal from the equitable estate manifest. There were contingent remainders to be preserved and powers to be executed. This question is discussed and so decided, in accordance with all of the authorities, in Swann v. Myers, 75 N. C. 585. It may be that the correct doctrine is to be found by reading the language of Ruffin, J., in Hardy v. Holly, supra, in the light of what is said by Smith, Ch. J., in Norris v. Luther, 101 N. C. 196, 8 S. E. 95, and Clayton v. Rose, 87 N. C. 106. This would seem to lead to the conclusion that, in the absence of any permissive provisions in the deed, the wife could not convey her equitable separate estate, either for life or in fee, as a feme sole, but could do so in the manner prescribed for the conveyance of her statutory separate estate, by joining with her husband and privy examination. However this may be, we are not called upon at this time to enter upon this debatable ground.

There is another view of this case which we think conclusive upon the power of Mrs. Cameron to convey any interest in the land. After declaring the trusts, the grantor directs the trustee "if during the life of the said Amanda she should desire any or all of said property conveyed in fee or otherwise, to convey the same according to her wishes, she joining in said conveyance as if she were a feme sole, though her husband may be living." In Swann v. Myers, supra, the will gave to the trustees the power, and directed them, "in the soundness of their discretion," to join with the cestuis que trust in making any conveyance of the above property." Judge Pearson, writing for the court, construed this language to be a restraint upon the power of alienation as to the fee. This ruling, so far as it refers to the fee, is in harmony with all of our decisions and those of other states, which hold that, when a mode of alienation is prescribed in the instrument, it must be followed. Hardy v. Holly and Norris v. Luther, supra; Towles v. Fisher, 77 N. C. 437; Mayo v. Farrar, 112 N. C. 66, 16 S. E. 910; Monroe v. Trenholm, 112 N. C. 634, 17 S. E. 439. This is the only logical conclusion from the premise stated in the cases in this court, at which it is possible to arrive. It will be observed that, in our case, the mode is expressly prescribed and applies to conveyances "in fee or otherwise." We therefore do not depart from the principle announced in Swann v. Myers in that respect, in holding that there is to be found in the deed of settlement an express mode prescribed for disposing of either the life estate or the fee. That such was the intention of the maker of the deed is, we think, seen in the fact that the husband is not required to join in the conveyance, but the wife is to act in that respect as if she were "a feme sole, though her husband may be living." It was the manifest purpose of Mr. Coor to remove Mrs. Cameron, in respect to the sale of this property, from both the influence and protection of her husband, and vest in the trustee the sole power to convey "in fee or otherwise, according to her wishes, she joining in said conveyance." To permit her and her husband to convey the land thus secured to her, without the intervention of the trustee, would be doing violence to the express language and manifest intention of the maker of the deed of settlement. If the land had been conveyed directly to Mrs. Cameron, the Constitution imposed upon her power of alienation the necessity for the assent of her husband. The deed under which she acquires her equitable estate—the right to the sole and separate use of the land—substitutes the trustee for the husband in respect to the conveyance. Pippen v. Weston, 74 N. C. 437; Scott v. Battle, 85 N. C. 184, 39 Am. Rep. 694.

It is well settled that, upon the death of the trustee, the legal title descended to his heirs with the trust impressed upon it. Clayton v. Rose, supra; Perry, Tr. 341. It seems equally well settled that if the trustee, being clothed with a power as in this case of conveying the legal title by direction and appointment of the cestuis que trust, dies before its execution, the power is gone and cannot be executed. Sugden, Powers, 319. In Barber v. Cary, 11 N. Y. 397, it is said: "But the power could only be executed on the precise conditions prescribed by the terms of its creation, viz., by and with the consent of Hannah Cary and George A. Cary. The first question is whether the death of Hannah Cary, which occurred before the execution of the power, was fatal to the conveyance. The rule of law is well settled that when the consent of third persons is required to the execution of a power, that, like every other condition, must be strictly complied with. . . . If the person whose consent is necessary die before the execution of the power and without having assented, the power is gone, although his death was the act of God." 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1122. It would seem, therefore, that, upon the death of the trustee, the condition upon which Mrs. Cameron could execute the power to direct the conveyance was gone. It may be that as no discretion was vested in the trustee but that he was directed to convey "in fee or otherwise according to her wishes," Mrs. Cameron may have had, either by the clerk under the statute, or by a civil action in the nature of a bill in equity, another trustee appointed, with power to convey as she directed. This was not done, and her deed cannot operate as the exercise of her power of appointment. Towles v. Fisher, supra.

The suggestion that because the heirs of Mr. Cox were infants the legal estate did not descend to them charged with the trusts is met by what is said in Clayton v. Rose, supra: "After the death of the original trustee, and when the legal estate had descended, clothed with the trust, to his infant children," etc. It is suggested that upon the death of Mr. Cameron the statute of uses operated by "legal chemistry" or "parliamentary magic," to execute the use and unite the legal and equitable estates in Mrs. Cameron for life, leaving to the trustee or his heirs the remainder in fee for the purpose of preserving the contingent remainders, and conveying to those who might be entitled upon Mrs. Cameron's death. It is well settled that when there is a conveyance to trustees for the sole and separate use of a married woman and her heirs, and she becomes discovered, the necessity for preserving the separate estate being at an end, the statute executes the use, and she becomes the absolute owner. Monroe v. Trenholm, supra; Stacy v. Rice, 27 Pa. 75, 67 Am. Dec. 447; Perry, Tr. 653. It is equally true that, where an estate is conveyed to trustees to preserve contingent remainders, the statute will not execute the use. The legal title must remain in the trustee, because, as in this record, no one in existence could call for the legal title. It was uncertain who would be entitled upon the death of Mrs. Cameron, and this uncertainty continued until the moment of her death. Latham v. Roanoke R. & Lumber Co. 139 N. C. 9, 51 S. E. 780. In Battle v. Petway, 27 N. C. (5 Ired. L.) 576, 44 Am. Dec. 59, Ruffin, Ch. J., says: "Beyond doubt, equity would not compel nor allow the trustee to convey the legal estate to the tenant for life, but require him to retain it for the security of the remainder-man. And so, in any case of a contingent limitation over, it would be the duty of the trustee to retain the title and the control over the possession of the trust property, and the court of equity will not take it from him." We therefore conclude that the trust declared in the deed from Coor to Cox was active, and that the legal title upon the trusts declared vested in Cox in fee; that the mode of conveying or appointing the legal title, prescribed in the deed, applied to both the life estate and the fee; and that Mrs. Cameron was restricted to that mode, and could not otherwise divest herself of her equitable estate for life or appoint the fee.

The deed executed by Mrs. Cameron and her husband to Hicks was therefore a nullity; conveyed no estate, either legal or equitable. Hicks's entrance upon the land was therefore an ouster of the trustee and put the statute of limitations in operation. At the expiration of the statutory period his possession would have ripened into a perfect title, both as against Cox, if living, and his cestui que trust and her infant children. This rule of law is too well established and has been too often enforced with its variant results to be now called into question. Smith, Ch. J., in Clayton v. Rose, 87 N. C. 106, applying the principle, where it was sought to bar the cestui que trust, said: "Nor do we think the defendants can protect themselves under a seven years' adverse possession with color of title. It is conceded that where the right of entry is barred and the right of action lost by the trustee, or person holding the legal estate, through an adverse occupation, the cestui que trust is also concluded from asserting a claim to the land, . . . and the correlative must be accepted that when the trustee is not barred, neither can the cestui que trust be, since as against strangers they are identified in interest. The alleged hostile possession by the defendant began after the death of the original trustee, and when the legal estate had descended clothed with the trust to his infant children; and this disability prevents the statute from starting to run to their prejudice." In some cases it operates to destroy, and in others to preserve, title. Courts may not shrink from enforcing it and thereby introduce confusion on account of hard cases. Kirkman v. Holland, 139 N. C. 185, 51 S. E. 856; King v. Rhew, 108 N. C. 696, 23 Am. St. Rep. 76, 13 S. E. 174. The doctrine is clearly stated and treated as settled in the opinion from which the plaintiffs seek safety, in Swann v. Myers, 75 N. C. 585.

The resourceful and learned counsel for plaintiffs say that the rule does not militate against their contention in this case, because in King v. Rhew the wife was not, as construed by this court, a party to the deed, while here she was a party, executed it, and submitted to a private examination as provided by the statute. The counsel call to our attention the language of the court in that case: "The deed then can only be regarded as that of the husband, and, as he had no interest which he could have conveyed, the trustee could have maintained an action at any time against the defendants for the possession of the property." The difficulty in the argument, based upon this language, is found in the fact that a deed made by a married woman otherwise than as she is empowered by the law is as much a nullity as if she had not signed at all, or as if she had signed a piece of blank paper. Askew v. Daniel, 40 N. C. (5 Ired. Eq.) 321. Ruffin, J., in Scott v. Battle, 85 N. C. 184, 39 Am. Rep. 694, speaking of the deed of a married woman without compliance with the provisions of the statute, says: "It prescribes the terms, and without their strict observance the act stands as it would at common law,—absolutely null and void." In Green v. Branton, 16 N. C. (1 Dev. Eq.) 500, it is said that her deed, not executed as the law requires, is an absolute nullity under which no equity whatever can be set up. Towles v. Fisher, 77 N. C. 438; Jones v. Cohen, 82 N. C. 75. If the trustee had sued Hicks for the possession, it is manifest that the deed of Mrs. Cameron could not have been used to bar his action. This is the test by which to ascertain the character of Hicks's possession as against the trustee and, thus tested, we are of the opinion that such possession was adverse to the trustee, and the statute of limitations was put into operation against the trustee. The reasoning of the court in Swann v. Myers, as to the effect of the deed made by Mrs. Swann upon the right of the trustee to recover possession, is based upon the theory that her deed conveyed the equitable life estate and is therefore not applicable here. The plaintiffs say that, Cox having died in 1875, the legal title descended to his heirs who were at that time infants and were unable to execute the trusts, convey the legal estate, or protect the possession. This is true, and, as said in Clayton v. Rose, supra, the statute did not run against them; their disability inured to the benefit of the cestuis que trust and protected their estates against the adverse possession of Hicks. The rights of Mrs. Cameron and her children were absolutely secured by the infancy of the trustees, and no act, either of themselves or persons claiming under them, could destroy or affect their estate. Conceding that the power to convey the estate was suspended by the death of Cox during the minority of his heirs, and that no ouster under color or otherwise could ripen into title against them, the plaintiffs have no cause to complain of the law which secured their estate from harm by acts of themselves or strangers.

We are thus brought to a consideration of the last question presented by the exceptions. Are the trustees, heirs at law of Cox, barred of their right of entry? At the date of Hicks's entry, October 28, 1880, they were all, except Florence, under disability, and have so continued until the date of the summons August 11, 1902. Florence reached her majority October 24, 1880, and married December 9, 1880. Hence, for one month and eleven days she was under no disability. The statute ran against her, and it is elementary learning that when the statute begins to run no subsequent disability interferes with it. Hicks and those under him have, therefore, been in the adverse possession twenty-one years and a few months prior to the beginning of this action. If the heirs of Cox, trustee, held the legal estate as tenants in common, they would recover in respect to their separate interests. The defendants insist that they held as joint tenants, and not as tenants in common. This is not controverted by plaintiff, and seems to be sustained by the authorities. "Trust property is generally limited to trustees as joint tenants. . . . Therefore, upon the death of one of the original trustees, the whole estate, whether real or personal, devolves upon the survivors, and so on to the last survivor. If he has made no disposition of the estate by will or otherwise, it devolves upon his heirs, if real estate, and upon his executors or administrators, if it is personal estate." Perry, Tr. 343; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 659; Revisal 1905, § 1580. It seems to be well settled that joint tenants must sue jointly, differing in that respect from tenants in common. Mr. Freeman says: "Whenever the title of the cotenants, as in case of joint tenancy and coparcenary, is joint, the action must also be joint; and whenever, as in tenancy in common, such tenant is deemed to possess a separate and distinct estate, the remedy of each must be distinctly and separately pursued. 'Joint tenants being seised per mie et per tout and deriving but one and the same title, must jointly implead and be impleaded.' If twenty joint tenants be, and they be disseised, they shall have, in all their names, but one assize because they have but one joint title." Cotenancy, 320. To the same effect is Sedgwick & W., Trial of Title to Land, § 302. It was at one time held in this state that two tenants in common could not join in one demise, because there was no unity of title,—one might recover and the other fail. It was afterwards held, for the reason set out by Ruffin, J., in Doe ex dem. Hoyle v. Stowe, 13 N. C. (2 Dev. L.) 318, that they could join in one demise. He says: "It is a universal rule that the title must be [truly] stated in the declaration. A joint demise, therefore, can only be supported by showing a title in each to demise the whole. If one of the lessors has no title, the plaintiff must fail." He says that this is "common learning." An examination of the opinion shows the ground upon which tenants in common are permitted to make a joint demise and recover in respect to their interests. Allred v. Smith, 135 N. C. 443, 65 L.R.A. 924, 47 S. E. 597. The difference is in this: Joint tenants must join in one demise because of the essential unities; tenants in common may join, or, if they prefer, may sue separately because there is no unity of title.

It would seem to follow that joint tenants must recover in respect to their title, and, if they fail in that, they cannot recover at all. This is the doctrine of this court. Riden v. Frion, 7 N. C. (3 Murph.) 577, was an action by three joint owners of a slave. Two of the plaintiffs were barred, the third under disabilities. Taylor, Ch. J., said: "Wherever the statute of limitations is a bar to the recovery of one of the parties, in such action, it operates against the whole, because the disability of one does not save the rights of the others." The case was approved in McRee v. Alexander, 12 N. C. (1 Dev. L.) 321, Henderson, J., saying: "In a joint action brought by several when the defendant avails himself of the bar given to such action by the statute of limitations, all the plaintiffs must bring themselves within some of the savings of the statute; otherwise the bar is not avoided. . . . The decisions on this point are uniform, as far as I know, and I shall not now inquire whether they are founded on the technical reason that the action being joint all or none of the plaintiffs must recover, otherwise the judgment does not pursue the writ and declaration, or whether on the very words of the statute." The learned justice severely criticizes the rule. In that case the lessors of the plaintiffs were tenants in common, and the rule so justly criticized, as applied to tenants in common, no longer obtains, although a joint demise be laid, or, under our Code practice, the several interests be shown, either in the complaint or the evidence, the plaintiffs recover accordingly. This cannot be so when the plaintiffs are joint tenants; they must all recover or none can do so. Montgomery v. Wynns, 20 N. C. 667 (4 Dev. & B. L. 527). In Weare v. Burge, 32 N. C. (10 Ired. L.) 169, the same rule is recognized. The statute (Revisal 1905, § 374) changes the rule in regard to personalty. See Clark's Code, § 173. It does not affect the law as to real property. Expressio unius est exclusio alterius. When we go beyond our own reports we find the same principle enforced. Marsteller v. McClean, 7 Cranch, 156, 3 L. ed. 300, was an action of trespass. Judge Story held, for the court, that, if one of the plaintiffs was barred, all were. That, if they were compelled to join in the action, that result necessarily followed. 1 Rose's Notes, 156. In Hardeman v. Sims, 3 Ala. 747, it is said: "It was contended in argument that the exception in the statute in favor of infants would take the case out of the statute, notwithstanding one of the complainants was barred by the statute. We understand it to be the settled rule that when a joint right of action accrues to several, the right must exist in all at the time of the action brought. When the statute begins to run as to one of several parties to a joint action it runs as to all." The law was so ruled in Perry v. Jackson, 4 T. R. 516. It is true that the contrary doctrine is laid down in 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 182. It will be found that the North Carolina cases cited do not sustain the text as construed by plaintiffs' counsel. In Caldwell v. Black, 27 N. C. (5 Ired. L.) 463, the plaintiffs were tenants in common; and while, under the rule prevailing in this state, they might join in one action, yet when thus joined they recovered in accordance with their several rights. In Carson v. Carson, 122 N. C. 645, 30 S. E. 4 the plaintiffs were tenants in common.

We have given to this subject a most careful consideration, examining the authorities and decided cases from other courts. They are not uniform. In several states it is held that where there is a joint action by tenants in common, if one is barred, the action fails as to all. The true rule would seem to be that, except where the necessity for all parties in interest to join "is founded upon the nature of the interest in the particular property," the plaintiffs recover in accordance with their rights as developed upon the trial; in other cases they must all show a right to recover when the action is brought. Statutes have been enacted in many of the states, permitting any one or more joint tenants and tenants in common to sue. Pom. Code Remedies, 137, note; 11 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 771. The possession of Hicks and those defendants claiming under him has continued for more than twenty-one years, during all of which time the statute has been in operation against Florence Cox, now Mrs. Newsome. She is clearly barred, and the conclusion must follow that her cotrustees are also barred. We think the statute well pleaded. The claim of both plaintiff and defendant is based upon what may be termed "technical rules of the law." If we should adopt the plaintiffs' contention that, in respect to this property, Mrs. Cameron should be treated as a feme sole, there would seem to be no very good reason why we should not find in her deed to Hicks a clear intention to execute the power conferred upon her to convey in fee, and aid its defective execution by adjudging the holders of the legal title trustees for the benefit of the defendants, who appear to be purchasers for value. The plaintiffs were objects of Mr. Coor's bounty, contingent upon Mrs. Cameron's failure to exercise the power of appointment. There is much force in the facts shown by the defendants to sustain an equitable estoppel upon the plaintiffs.

The case is fraught with perplexities. Many of the principles of the common law regarding titles to real property are difficult to sustain upon the "reason of the thing." We find wisdom in the language of Earl, J., in Bertles v. Nunan, 92 N. Y. 152, 44 Am. Rep. 361. To the suggestion that the reason upon which a common-rule law was founded had ceased to exist, he said: "It is impossible now to determine how the rule in the remote past obtained a footing, or upon what reason it was based; and hence it is impossible now to say that the reason, whatever it was, has entirely ceased to exist. There are many rules appertaining to the ownership of real property originating in the feudal ages, for the existence of which the reason does not now exist or is not discernible; and yet on that account courts are not authorized to disregard them. They must remain until the legislature abrogates or changes them, like statutes founded upon no reason, or upon reasons that have ceased to operate." When men undertake to place their property out of the usual and fixed channels of alienation and descent, it frequently happens that their best considered plans fail to be accomplished, or, if accomplished, bring about the results not anticipated. There has been no more prolific source of litigation, with difficult questions to be solved, than the creation of trusts for the benefit of married women, and attempting to control the passing of the property into the possession of posterity.

To the end that the rights of the parties may be adjudged upon the principles herein laid down, there must be a new trial.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

FRANK BURNS

v.

FRANK ROSS

HARRY J. MAKIVER, Appt.

Judgment—record—index—name.

The record of a judgment against one whose Christian name is Francis, if indexed under the name of Frank, charges a prospective purchaser from the judgment debtor's heirs with notice of the existence of the judgment.

APPEAL by the terre-tenant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas No. 2, for Philadelphia County in plaintiff's favor in a suit brought to revive a judgment. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James W. Laws, for appellant:

A purchaser is not bound to take notice of judgments or liens except those entered in the exact name in which his vendor holds title to the land in question.

•Crouse v. Murphy, 140 Pa. 335, 12 L.R.A. 58, 23 Am. St. Rep. 232, 21 Atl. 358; Zimmerman v. Briggans, 5 Watts, 186; Wood v. Reynolds, 7 Watts & S. 406; Heil's Appeal, 40 Pa. 453, 80 Am. Dec. 590; Hutchinson's Appeal, 92 Pa. 186; Delaney v. Becker, 14 Pa. Super. Ct. 392; Rusterholtz v. Brown, 10 Pa. Dist. R. 21; Work v. Darby, 13 Pa. Co. Ct. 269.

Mr. James Alcorn for appellee.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On February 1, 1887, the firm of Thomas Carrick & Company, of which the appellee is the surviving member, entered a judgment against Frank Ross. The note on which it was entered had been given by Francis Ross, who signed his name to it "Frank Ross." At the time the judgment was entered Ross was the owner of the property purchased by the appellant from his heirs on March 14, 1904. He had acquired title to it on February 21, 1868, from Thomas Hodgson, by a deed in which as the grantee he was named "Francis Ross." He died September 23, 1899, on which date the judgment held by the appellee was revived. When the appellant took title from the heirs of Francis Ross, among whom was a son, Frank Ross, he had a search made for liens against the property. This search was for the liens of judgment against the heirs entered after they had acquired title under the interstate laws, and for those which had attached in the lifetime of Francis Ross. From September 23, 1899, to March 14, 1904, search was made for judgments and mortgages given by with respect to Christian names or initials, in order that the record or indices may be sufficient to impart constructive notice, holds the record to be sufficient if it contains enough to lead the inquirer to the information designed to be imparted by it;

Frank Ross, one of the sons, and for five years prior to the death of the father the search was only for mortgages and judgments indexed against Francis Ross; no attention having been paid to the name "Frank Ross." Upon the report of the searcher that there was but one judgment indexed against Francis Ross, the decedent, which was not a lien against the property, and that there were no liens against Frank Ross, the son, the appellant took the title. In June, 1904, the firm of the appellee issued a sci. fa. to revive the judgment against Frank Ross, with notice to the appellant as terre-tenant. He resisted the attempt to revive it against him as the owner of the property, but a verdict was directed against him, upon which judgment was subsequently entered. On this appeal we are asked to say that, as the judgment of Thomas Carrick & Company was indexed against Frank Ross, the appellant had no notice of it as a lien upon the property belonging to Francis Ross when he purchased it from the heirs.

It is undoubtedly true that the first or Christian name of a defendant in a judgment must appear in the judgment index for the protection of an innocent purchaser, who is not bound to look beyond it for judgment liens against his vendor; but this rule must have a reasonable construction. In Crouse v. Murphy, 140 Pa. 335, 12 L.R.A. 58, 23 Am. St. Rep. 232, 21 Atl. 358, the case upon which the appellant seems to place his chief reliance, we held that, under the particular circumstances surrounding that case, a judgment given by Daniel J. Murphy, but signed by him "Daniel Murphy" and so indexed, was not a lien upon property owned and sold by him as "Daniel J. Murphy," as against a purchaser who looked for liens only against "Daniel J.

and for this purpose the inquirer's extraneous knowledge, and every fact which inquiry suggested by the records would have led up to, are taken into consideration.

Thus, in Work v. Darby, 13 Pa. Co. Ct. 269, one who received land as Jane T. sold it as Sarah Jane T. to one who knew that she was generally known as Jane T., and who executed to her a purchase-money mortgage. Judgment had previously been entered against her as Jane T., and it was held that the record of the judgment was notice to the purchaser, but not to a subsequent assignee of the mortgage who did not know that she was known by that name. And in Jenny v. Zehnder, 101 Pa. 296, a judgment indexed against F. Zehnter was held to be sufficient notice of a lien on land standing in the name of John Jacob Frederick Zehnder, where the proof shows that he was generally known as Mr. Zehnder, and, when called by his first name, which was very seldom, he was called Fred, and that he generally signed his name Frederick Zehnder or Fr. Zehnder, but that, in executing legal documents, he signed John Jacob Frederick Zehnder, or J. J. Zehnder, or simply Frederick Zehnder. The substitution of "t" for "d" in the surname was considered not to be a fatal error. So, in Gillespie v. Rogers, 146 Mass. 612, 16 N. E. 711, the record of a deed from J. M. H., in the name of J. H., by which latter name he was as well known as by the former, was held to be sufficient constructive notice to a subsequent purchaser. This case is, however, founded in part on the Massachusetts doctrine that mistakes in the record fall on the purchaser, and it makes no difference if the constructive notice provided by law proves insufficient.

The following authorities also hold that the record was sufficient to impart constructive notice to a subsequent purchaser or encumbrancer: Huston v. Seeley, 27 Iowa, 183, in which a conveyance, executed in the name of J. A. Stringham, was indexed as by A. J. Stringham, and the caption to the instrument as recorded showed it to be from Almira J. Stringham; Miltonvale State Bank v. Kuhnle, 50 Kan. 420, 34 Am. St. Rep. 129, 31 Pac. 1057, where a mortgage by S. M. J. was recorded as by Samuel M. J.; Fincher v. Hanegan, 59 Ark. 151, 24 L.R.A. 543, 26 S. W. 821, in which a mistake was made in the initial letter of the name of a mortgagor; Green v. Meyers, 98 Mo. App. 438, 72 S. W. 128, in which a judgment against Eleanor G. was abstracted by the initials of the Christian name, E. G.; Piney v. Russell & Co. 52 Minn. 443, 54 N. W. 484, in which a judgment was recorded against one whose Christian name was indicated only by initial letters; B. F. Avery & Sons v. Texas Loan Agency (Tex. Civ. App.) 62 S. W. 793, in which an abstract of judgment in favor of B. F. Avery & Sons, a corporation, was indexed under the letter A; Hibberd v. Smith, 50 Cal. 511, in which a judgment was entered omitting the Christian name of the judgment debtor altogether. But, contrary to the last proposition, it was held in Smith's Appeal, 47 Pa. 128, that the entry of a judgment against a partnership, omitting the Christian names of the partners, is ineffectual to impart constructive notice.

But the rule which is applied in Burns v. Ross, to the effect that, where two names are derived from the same source, or where one is an abbreviation or a corruption of the other, but both are taken by common use to be the same though differing in sound, the use of one for the other is not a misnomer, was held to be inapplicable to a judgment indexed against one by the Christian name of Ellen, so as to be notice to one who purchased land of a person of the Christian name of Helen. Thomas v. Desney, 57 Iowa, 58, 10 N. W. 315. And a judgment against Jacob B. was held not to be notice

Murphy." The member of the court who wrote the opinion stated that he had looked into the city directory and found the name of "Daniel Murphy," with various middle letters and without any, occurring twenty times, and that to exhaust the possibilities as to "D. Murphy" would have required searches running into the hundreds. The purchaser was protected because he found no lien indexed "against 'Daniel J. Murphy,' or 'D. J. Murphy.'" By this it was clearly intimated that if a judgment had been indexed "D. J. Murphy," it would have been notice to the purchaser that it might be a lien against property owned by Daniel J. Murphy.

What was reasonably required of this appellant? In answering this we disregard the contention of the appellee, that he ought to have been put on notice by the indexing of other judgments and mortgages in the name of "Frank Ross" given by Francis Ross, who was, according to the testimony produced by the appellee, commonly known to others than the appellant as "Frank Ross." We pass only upon the simple question whether a purchaser from the heirs of Francis Ross was bound to look for liens indexed in his lifetime against "Frank Ross." In Jones's Estate, 27 Pa. 336, the court below was reversed for holding that a judgment docketed against "A. Jones" did not give the holders of it priority of lien over those holding judgments subsequently docketed against "Abel Jones," as whose property the real estate was sold by the sheriff; and, in awarding the fund to those lien creditors whose judgments had been docketed against "A. Jones," it was said by Woodward, J.: "A description of persons by the name by which they are commonly known as sufficient in pleading, either criminal or civil, and as much, I when recorded against John B. Zimmerman v. Briggans, 5 Watts, 186.

The record was held to be insufficient to impart constructive notice, in Bankers' Loan & Invest. Co. v. Blair, 99 Va. 606, 86 Am. St. Rep. 914, 39 S. E. 231, in which a judgment against May M. Simmons was docketed and indexed in the name of Mrs. T. Frank Simmons; in Aultman v. Ward, 50 Neb. 442, 69 N. W. 935, in which a judgment against J. T. Ward was entered against S. T. Ward; and in Johnson v. Wilson, 137 Ala. 468, 97 Am. St. Rep. 52, 34 So. 392, in which a chattel mortgage executed by J. W. Dixon was entered in the name of A. W. Dixon.

A record of a general judgment against William M. is not constructive notice as to one against H. W. M., so as to render it a lien upon real estate after it has come into the possession of a remote grantee who purchased for value without notice, further than that furnished by the record that H. W. M. and William M. were one and the same person. Johnson v. Hess, 126 Ind. 298, 9 L.R.A. 471, 25 N. E. 445.

Nor is the docketing of a judgment against Edward Davis constructive notice that there is an encumbrance against either E. A. Davis or Edward Davis, and does not affect the rights of a person who has no notice of the actual identity of Edward Davis, the judgment debtor. Davis v. Steeps, 87 Wis. 472, 23 L.R.A. 818, 41 Am. St. Rep. 51, 58 N. W. 769. A Wisconsin statute requires an entry to be made of "the name at length of each judgment debtor."

And land conveyed to Mary Allely is not, as against subsequent purchasers, bound by a judgment recorded as against May Alley. Phillips v. McKaig, 36 Neb. 853, 55 N. W. 259.

The Pennsylvania cases have abrogated the common-law rule which holds the middle letter or initial to be no part of a person's name. Thus, it was said in Wood v. Reynolds, 7 Watts & S. 406, that "it is certain 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that an initial standing with a name of baptism is no part of it in pleading, but it follows not that an omission of it is to be disregarded as an index of notice to purchasers. Persons of the same name are individuated by various additions; sometimes by title, profession, residence, or seniority; sometimes by numerals; sometimes by color of the complexion or hair; and sometimes by an initial. The absence of the badge in this instance misled a purchaser;" if a judgment creditor permits the omission from his record of the initial which distinguishes his debtor from others of the same name, he must bear the loss. This case was followed in Hutchinson's Appeal, 92 Pa. 186, in Stott v. Irwin, 2 Chester Co. Rep. 137, and in Crouse v. Murphy, 140 Pa. 335, 12 L.R.A. 58, 23 Am. St. Rep. 232, 21 Atl. 358, in which similar decisions were rendered. The Wood Case and Hutchinson's Appeal, were, however, distinguished in Jenny v. Zehnder, supra, on the ground that the mistakes made in those cases altogether destroyed the identity of the person.

A rule much in harmony with the recording acts, and which would be simple and uniform in all cases of real-estate records, has been adopted in Illinois. In Grundies v. Reid, 107 Ill. 304, it was held that the law protected the purchaser of property by the title which appeared of record, unless there was notice of something to the contrary. Therefore, one who made a loan in reliance on the record title was protected against a prior judgment against the owner by another name, although he was as well known by the latter as by the former.

Some confusion has arisen among the authorities as to whether the rule of idem sonans applies to records. It is said that the law of notice by record is addressed to the eye, and not to the ear, and therefore the rule cannot apply to records. The cases in which this rule is generally sought to be applied are those involving surnames only.

presume, as the act of assembly, prescribing judgment dockets, meant to require. The use of names is to describe the individual of whom we speak, so as to distinguish him from all other persons. They are like definitions in mathematics, though less exact. Where two names, said Judge Washington, in Gordon v. Holiday, 1 Wash. C. C. 289, Fed. Cas. No. 5,610, have the same original derivation, or where one is an abbreviation or corruption of the other, but both are taken promiscuously and according to common use to be the same, though differing in sound, the use of one for the other is not a material misnomer. If in common use the names be the same, the person cannot be misnamed if either be used. In Fenton v. Perkins, 3 Mo. 144, it was held that courts take judicial notice of the abbreviation of a man's Christian name, though a doubt was made about an abbreviation of the family name." Under the authority of this case a judgment indexed "F. Ross" might have been notice to a purchaser looking for liens against "Francis Ross."

The indexing of the name of the defendant in a judgment as he is commonly known is not, as a general rule, sufficient to meet the requirements of the act of April 22, 1856 (P. L. 332), relating to the indexing of judgments; but its requirements are met when the first or Christian name of a defendant is so indexed that a prospective purchaser examining the index ought to know from it of the existence of a lien against the property which he is about to purchase. When it is commonly known that certain first or Christian names are interchangeably used, and the initial and dominant letters of each are identical, indicating to the eye that they are the same and giving the same sound and substance to each, the judgment index must be searched for each. In the absence of a statutory requirement that the Christian name of a defendant in a judgment must be indexed exactly as it is written in the deed under which he holds title, any other rule would offend reason. When the appellant, as a prospective purchaser of the Ross property, was looking for liens against Francis Ross, why should he not have looked for those indexed against "Frank?" The two names are the same, and are used, as is universally known, as being the same. Standard Dictionary in English, vol. 2, p. 2138; Webster's International Dictionary, p. 1902. When looking for liens against "Jacob" a searcher must know that the world knows no difference between "Jacob" and "Jake," and that a judgment indexed against "Jake" may be a lien on the property of "Jacob." As a rule "Mike" is used for the more dignified "Michael," and the bearer of the latter name as the grantee of a title to him is generally known, not only to himself, but to the community in which he lives, as plain "Mike;" and so a stronger illustration is the name "Frank" given to "Francis." It is a matter of common knowledge that seldom is one bearing the Christian name of "Francis" known by any other name than "Frank." These illustrations need be pursued no further. When the appellant was looking for the title to be free from encumbrances cast upon it by Francis Ross, it was his duty to see that the owner had not encumbered it in the name of "Frank Ross."

The assignments of error are overruled, and the judgment is affirmed.

VERMONT SUPREME COURT.

EDMUND C. MOWER, Trustee, etc., of Arthur McCarthy, Bankrupt,

v.

J. D. MCCARTHY et al.

(— Vt. —, 64 Atl. 578.)

Parol mortgage—validity.

1. A parol mortgage to secure a loan for the purchase of a stock of goods, which is to attach not only to the goods already in stock, but to such as might be added thereafter, is valid as between the parties.

Same—rights of creditors.

2. A parol mortgage to one loaning money to purchase a stock of goods upon the stock, and additions to it, is valid; and possession taken under it by the mortgagee will relate to the date of the agreement, so as to preclude creditors of the purchaser from sharing in the proceeds of their sale.

Case Note.—Validity of verbal chattel mortgage:—At common law a mere oral agreement to give and accept a chattel as security for a debt was recognized as valid, and, except for the statute of frauds or a statute requiring the filing of the instrument, a verbal mortgage is still held to be valid, as shown by the following authorities. In most states, however, at present, there are statutes which require chattel mortgages to be filed in order to make them effective as against creditors and bona fide purchasers, unless the property is turned over to the mortgagee. Consequently, when the subject of the validity of a chattel mortgage comes before the court, it generally arises in some contention between the parties to the agreement.

As between the parties themselves, the following cases sustain the validity of a verbal chattel mortgage without change of possession: Morrow v. Turney, 35 Atl. 131; Brooks v. Ruff, 37 Ala. 371; Gafford v. Stearns, 51 Ala. 434; McKeithen v. Pratt, Evidence—statements to show fraud—admissibility.

3. Statements of a mortgagor tending to show intent on his part to defraud his creditors, with which the mortgagee is in no wise connected, are not admissible in an action to recover property from the mortgagee after he has taken possession of it under his mortgage.

Same—mortgagor and mortgagee—privity.

4. The mere relation of mortgagor and mortgagee does not create such a privity of estate as to render the declarations of one with regard to the property admissible in evidence against the other.

Same—declarations against interest.

5. Evidence of a statement by a mortgagor that the mortgagee had loaned him money and had a right to take possession of the property at any time is admissible in an action on behalf of creditors to recover possession of the property from the mortgagee after he has taken possession of it under his mortgage.

It has also been held to be valid as to third parties with notice. Sparks v. Wilson, 22 Neb. 112, 34 N. W. 111; First Nat. Bank v. Taylor, 69 Kan. 28, 76 Pac. 425.

But not as to creditors and subsequent purchasers in good faith. Sparks v. Wilson; Conchman v. Wright; and Reiss v. Argubright,—supra; Ceas v. Bramley, 18 Hun, 187.

A verbal mortgage, without change of possession, was held, in Jackson v. Rutherford, 73 Ala. 155, to create only an equitable lien in the mortgagee, which will not support an action of detinue.

The same decision was rendered in Rees v. Coats, 65 Ala. 256, in which a similar mortgage was given, covering a crop of cotton not yet planted. The court declared erroneous a dictum to the contrary in Brown v. Coats, 56 Ala. 439, in which the same contract was involved.

To be valid, the oral chattel mortgage must contain all the essential elements and features of a written instrument; if there is no agreement that the property, or the title thereto, shall be held until the claim is paid, such a mortgage is invalid. Bank of Highland v. Evans-Snyder-Buell Co. 9 Kan. App. 80, 57 Pac. 1046.

A bill of sale, absolute on its face, but accompanied by a verbal defeasance, was held, in Omaha Book Co. v. Sutherland, 10 Neb. 334, 6 N. W. 367, to be a valid chattel mortgage as between the parties thereto, and as to the others with actual notice; and 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The lien of a mortgagee under a verbal mortgage, who had possession of the mortgaged chattels, was held in Gafford v. Stearns, supra, not to be affected by a subsequent written mortgage executed by the owner of the property.

A verbal mortgage, by which a shipper agreed that, if a certain bank would honor his checks to pay for a shipment of stock, the stock would be considered as the property of the bank, and he would deposit with the bank the proceeds as soon as the sale could be effected, was held to be valid in Carroll Exch. Bank v. First Nat. Bank, supra; and the bank was held to be entitled to maintain an action to recover such proceeds from another bank in which they were deposited, notwithstanding a statute which declares that no mortgage on personal property shall be valid against any other person than the party benefited, unless possession of the mortgaged property be delivered to and retained by the mortgagee, or unless the mortgage be executed, acknowledged, filed, and recorded; since, in this case, the defendant bank received the fund with full knowledge of the oral agreement, and there was no evidence that the defendant had any interest in the funds whatever.

But an agreement between a surety on a note given for the purchase price of a team and the purchaser of the team, that the former shall retain a lien on, or title to, the property until the note is paid, was held to be void in Oyler v. Renfro, 86 Mo. App. 321, even as to a purchaser with notice, under the statute of 1899, § 3401, requiring all such agreements to be in writing and to be recorded.

A verbal mortgage covering a crop to be grown, to secure the rent of land, the hire of a mule, and for future advances, was held to be valid in Thrash v. Bennett, 57 Ala. 156, and entitled the mortgagee to maintain an action against the mortgagor to recover possession of the crop.

Rep. 567.

Tyler, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On August 15, 1901, defendant McCarthy loaned his son Arthur $5,000 with which to purchase stock of goods and establish a clothing business in Burlington, and afterwards loaned him $2,000 and $1,000 for the same purpose and took his promissory notes for the several sums. When the $5,000 was furnished Arthur gave the defendant a verbal mortgage upon the stock that was then to be purchased as security for the repayment of that loan and of all future loans that should be made; and it was understood between them that the mortgage should include the fixtures in the store and all goods that should be subsequently purchased to replenish or increase original stock, and that the defendant might, at any time, take possession of the store and goods under his mortgage. Arthur had no capital; he carried on the business with the money loaned him by the defendant from August, 1901, till April, 1903. The defendant and his wife held a lease of the store during the continuance of the business. Arthur paid most of the rent and managed the business in all respects as if it were his own. On April 3, 1903, the defendant, by Brodie, a deputy sheriff, took possession of the store, fixtures, and goods by virtue of his mortgage and upon a writ that he sued out against his son. All the notes were then due, and nothing had been paid upon them but $321.82 on the $1,000 note. The defendant claimed that he took possession for the purpose of completing his mortgage, and that the property was rightfully in his possession by virtue thereof at the time it was taken from him by the plaintiff in this suit. The plaintiff claimed that the two McCarthys conspired to defraud the merchandise creditors and to obtain all the property for the defendant and thereby for their mutual benefit. A petition in bankruptcy was filed against Arthur on May 15, 1903, and he was adjudged a bankrupt on June 6th following. He was insolvent at the time of the adjudication, and his liabilities were far in excess of his assets. The present action is replevin, in which the plaintiff, as the trustee, in bankruptcy of the estate of Arthur, seeks to recover the property described in the writ as belonging to the estate, while the defendant claims it by virtue of his verbal mortgage. Neither of the McCarthys ever informed any of Arthur's creditors of the verbal mortgage, nor of the existence of any lien upon the goods. The creditors had been pressing Arthur for payment before the defendant took possession, and the evidence tended to show that some steps had been taken towards making a sale of the bankrupt's stock and of a pro rata division of the proceeds among the creditors, and that this was with the defendant's knowledge and sanction. Special verdicts were submitted, and the jury found, in substance, as above stated, that by the agreement relative to the verbal mortgage the defendant was to be secured on the goods, furniture, and fixtures for the money advanced by him, also upon all goods that might be added to the stock until the advancements were repaid; that he was to have a right to take possession of the mortgaged property whenever he saw fit; that he took possession under his mortgage by his agent, Brodie, April 3, 1903; that he was in possession of the mortgaged property when the writ in this suit was served; that $1,000 worth of the original stock was then on hand; that when the defendant took possession he had reasonable cause to believe that his son was insolvent, but that he did not have reasonable cause to believe that his thus taking possession was intended by his son to give him a preference over other creditors.

1. The agreement made by the McCarthys constituted a common-law mortgage, which is defined to be an absolute sale of the property by the mortgagor to the mortgagee, subject to be redeemed according to the terms of the contract. Hutchins v. King, 1 Wall. 53, 17 L. ed. 544; Wood v. Dudley, 8 Vt. 430; Blodgett v. Blodgett, 48 Vt. 32. So it was held in Rice v. Hulett, 63 Vt. 321, 22 Atl. 75, that the giving of security upon chattels, without delivery, is, in effect, a mortgage at common law, and may be valid between the parties, though not in writing. Jones, Chat. Mortg. § 2. An unrecorded mortgage is valid between the parties. Gilbert v. Vail, 60 Vt. 261, 14 Atl. 542. It is also held that where, as in the present case, it is stipulated that the mortgagor may, from time to time, sell portions of the mortgaged property and replace it with other property of similar kind and value, and the mortgagee takes possession of it, it is brought under the operation of the mortgage as of the date thereof. Peabody v. Landon, 61 Vt. 318 15 Am. St. Rep. 903, 17 Atl. 781. And in McLoud v. Wakefield, 70 Vt. 559, 43 Atl. 179, it is held that, if there is no stipulation to the contrary, the mortgagee may, at any time, take possession of the mortgaged property; and that, having taken possession of the goods covered by the mortgage but purchased after its execution and delivery, such goods come under its cover and operation as of its date. Thompson v. Fairbanks, 75 Vt. 361, 104 Am. St. Rep. 899, 56 Atl. 11, goes to the extent of holding that a chattel mortgage on after-acquired property, under which the mortgagee has taken possession of such property with the mortgagor's consent, is valid against the mortgagor's trustee in bankruptcy, in the absence of an express finding that such possession was taken for the purpose of affording a preference, though possession was so acquired within four months prior to the date of the mortgagor's petition in bankruptcy, and with knowledge that the mortgagor was insolvent and contemplating bankruptcy proceedings. This judgment was affirmed in 196 U. S. 516, 49 L. ed. 577, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 306. This was the holding in Chase v. Denny, 130 Mass. 566. These decisions go upon the ground that the mortgagee's title to the after-acquired property relates to the date of the mortgage, and that his taking possession is not the acceptance of a preference, but the assertion of a previously acquired right. After the condition of this mortgage had been broken and the mortgagee had taken possession of the mortgaged property, the mortgagor had no interest in the property other than a right to redeem it, and the trustee in bankruptcy had no greater interest therein than the mortgagor. It must therefore be held that, unless the present case is distinguishable from the recent cases decided by this court, the judgment of the trial court must be affirmed.

The rule of law that one cannot convey property that is not in existence at the time of the conveyance, like fish to be caught in the sea (Low v. Pew, 108 Mass. 347, 11 Am. Rep. 357), does not apply here. The findings of the jury were that it was understood between the father and son that the former was to be secured on the goods for the money advanced by him, and that this included whatever goods were in the store at the time of the $5 000 loan and all goods that might thereafter be added to the stock; so 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) it is not made clear whether or not all or any part of the original purchase had then arrived. But, assuming that none had arrived when the first loan was made, it was the intent of the parties that the mortgage should attach to the goods when they were placed in the store, and in this respect the goods originally and subsequently purchased stood precisely alike as being subject to the mortgage. It was held in Bryan v. Lewis, Ryan & M. 386, that a sale of goods to be delivered at a future day, when the seller has not the goods nor any contract for them, but expects to go into the market and buy them, is not a valid contract. But this has been overruled in England, and in this country it is the rule that a person may sell chattels of which he is not, at the time, possessor. 2 Kent, Com. 13th ed. 468; 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1043, and notes. A chattel that has ceased to exist, or that never had an existence, is not the subject of a sale, though an article that has a potential existence, like the natural product or expected increase of property belonging to the seller, may be the subject of an executory contract of sale. But no question is raised in the present case as to the nonexistence of the goods at the time the mortgage was given, for the reason that the mortgagee, by virtue of the agreement and the nonpayment of the notes, took actual possession of the property and was in possession thereof when the petition in bankruptcy was filed. Peabody v. Landon, 61 Vt. 329, 15 Am. St. Rep. 903, 17 Atl. 781; Forsyth Mfg. Co. v. Castlen, 81 Am. St. Rep. 28, and note, 112 Ga. 199, 37 S. E. 485. Mathews v. Hardt, 79 App. Div. 570, 9 Am. Bankr. Rep. 373, 80 N. Y. Supp. 462, is not an authority for the plaintiff, for in that case there was nothing but an agreement to give a lien on the property, the parties so treated the transaction, and the lien was not to be enforced until advances to a certain amount had been made. See Re Hunt, 14 Am. Bankr. Rep. 416, 139 Fed. 238. The plaintiff argues that there is nothing in the case to indicate that Arthur could not have sold the entire stock at any time if he had so chosen, and that the case is therefore brought within the rule recognized in Wilson v. Wallace, 67 Vt. 646, 32 Atl. 501, that an absolute right in the mortgagor to dispose of the property in one transaction for his own benefit vitiates the mortgage. The exceptions do not show such an agreement between the parties to this mortgage, and from what does appear we think the fair inference is that they intended that Arthur should begin and carry on a retail business in the usual manner, keeping up the stock; and he did so conduct the business for a year and a half from August 3, 1901.

2. The plaintiff further contends that, notwithstanding the finding by the jury, that the defendant did not have reasonable cause to believe that his taking possession was intended by his son to give him a preference over the other creditors, the transaction was voidable under the bankruptcy act. Peabody v. Landon is reported in 15 Am. St. Rep. 908, with full notes by Mr. Freeman, wherein he speaks of the wide difference in judicial opinions upon this subject, and gives his own opinion that the weight of reason is with those who maintain that such a mortgage as the one here under consideration, with like agreements contemporaneously made, is fraudulent and void as to subsequent purchasers or creditors of the mortgagor; but he says that it is for each state to adopt that line of decisions which best accords with its own views of public policy and seems to its judges to be best sustained by reason and authority. See Humphrey v. Tatman, 198 U. S. 91, 49 L. ed. 956, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 567, 184 Mass. 361, 63 L.R.A. 738, 100 Am. St. Rep. 562, 68 N. E. 844. The writer cites numerous authorities in support of his view, and a "respectable number" which decide that it cannot be held, as matter of law, by the court that such a mortgage is fraudulent and void, but that it is for the jury to determine as a question of fact. He cites, among other cases, Lister v. Simpson, 38 N. J. Eq. 438, where the court closed an able opinion by saying that the mere fact that a mortgagor retains possession and uses the mortgaged chattels has never been accepted in that state as conclusive and unanswerable evidence of fraud. The plaintiff cites many cases from the American Bankruptcy Reports, which hold that, where a debtor is insolvent within the meaning of the bankruptcy act, and the creditor has knowledge of the insolvency, or has such information as would put a prudent person upon inquiry, and receives a payment, it follows, as a necessary inference, that he had reasonable cause to believe that it was intended as a preference. Pepperdine v. National Exch. Bank, 84 Mo. App. 234, 2 N. B. N. Rep. 675, Missouri court of appeals, which states this rule with much force. The New Hampshire cases cited by the plaintiff disfavor such agreements, calling them secret trusts. Tatman v. Humphrey, 184 Mass. 361, 63 L.R.A. 738, 100 Am. St. Rep. 562, 68 N. E. 844, is an authority for the plaintiff, for it is there held that the preference created by a mortgagee taking possession of the mortgaged property under an unrecorded mortgage, within the four-months period, dates from the acquisition of possession under the mortgage. Knowlton, Ch. J., remarked in his opinion that "the reason for the enactment, as it is interpreted, is well illustrated by the fact that the mortgagor in this case, less than four months before the proceedings in bankruptcy, made a statement to certain of his creditors and to commercial agencies that there was no encumbrance on his stock or fixtures,—a statement which was literally true if we look only to the state of the title as against creditors, but wickedly false in its understood meaning, if the mortgagee, on the eve of the debtor's bankruptcy, could take all of the debtor's property, and leave nothing for the other creditors who had trusted him because of his possessions." Clayton v. Exchange Bank, 10 Am. Bankr. Rep. 183, 57 C. C. A. 656, 121 Fed. 630, is like the Massachusetts case in its facts and in the statement of the law by the court. But Humphrey v. Tatman was reversed in 198 U. S. 91, 49 L. ed. 956, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 567.

3. The plaintiff also contends that the case falls within the amendment of 1905 to § 60a (act Feb. 5, 1903, chap. 487, § 13, 32 Stat. at L. 799, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1905, p. 689), which is: "Where the preference consists in a transfer, such period of four months shall not expire until four months after the date of the recording or registering of the transfer, if by law such recording or registering is required;" but this obviously relates to written chattel mortgages, which are required by law to be recorded; therefore the amendment does not control here. In this case, upon the findings of the jury, there was no actual fraud. All the money that went into the purchase of these goods was the defendant's. Upon the failure of his son to repay the loans, the defendant had the right to take possession of the goods and preclude the creditors from sharing in the proceeds of their sale, and his taking possession related to the time of the agreement. This has been the holding of this court in former cases, and we find no occasion to depart from it, although the courts in many of the states maintain a different doctrine, as has been shown.

4. The plaintiff contends that there was error in the admission and exclusion of evidence. The plaintiff claimed in the court below, and claims here, that the original agreement between the McCarthys was fraudulent; that they conspired to defraud the jobbers, who sold goods to Arthur, by obtaining them for the mutual benefit of the father and son. The conceded facts show that the agreement was, in effect, a common-law mortgage, yet the plaintiff might show by competent evidence that the business was carried by Arthur with a purpose to obtain all the goods he could without paying for them and then have his father take possession of them upon his mortgage. It was in this view that the false statements made by Arthur to his creditors were offered. Those statements, and the fact that Arthur, after his father took possession, removed $2,500 worth of goods from the store in the nighttime and stored them in another town, show his intention to defraud his creditors. If the action were against him, these statements would have been admissible in proof of his fraud; but the action is against his father, and there was no evidence offered that tended to connect the defendant with these statements. Indeed, the court said, in ruling them out, that, if any evidence should afterwards be offered tending to connect the defendant with them, the offer of them in evidence might be renewed. As such evidence was not produced, the statements could not have affected the defendant's liability any more than the evidence of Arthur's removing a part of the goods from the store without the defendant's knowledge. It is also a well-settled rule, where an attempt is made to show conspiracy, that a foundation must first be laid by proof sufficient in the opinion of the trial court to establish prima facie the fact of the conspiracy between the parties, or proper to be laid before the jury, as tending to establish such conspiracy, before admissions of an alleged coconspirator can be admitted. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 111. The exceptions show that the necessary foundation was not laid in this case.

5. The mere relation of mortgagor and mortgagee, in the absence of evidence of collusion between them to defraud the creditors of the former, did not create such a privity of estate as entitled the plaintiff to use the declarations of one against the other. There was nothing suspicious or unusual in the conduct of the defendant. He had loaned his son $8,000 upon his notes secured by what we hold was a valid mortgage. He learned that his son was in debt and insolvent, and, by virtue of the agreement, he took possession of the goods and fixtures. He does not claim under a right acquired subsequent to his son's declarations, but under a prior right, and, when he exercised that right by taking possession, his title dated back to the time of making the mortgage. It must be seen that, if the statements had been received in evidence, the jury could have made no legitimate use of them as affecting the defendant's liability, for no relation was shown to exist between him and his son that made the declarations of the latter evidence against him.

6. The testimony of Donlin was that he was told by Arthur, soon after the business was undertaken, that the defendant had loaned him $5,000 or $6,000 to go into business with, and that the defendant was to have the right, at any time, to take possession of the property. This evidence was admissible for the reason that the plaintiff, as trustee, was successor to all rights of property that Arthur possessed, and that he must recover through Arthur's title. It was held, in Alger v. Andrews, 47 Vt. 238, that the declarations of one against his title to property, made while in his possession and before he assigned it to the defendants, were admissible against the defendants. See Bucklin v. Beals, 38 Vt. 653; Davis v. Windsor Sav. Bank, 48 Vt. 532. This admission stands upon opposite ground from that upon which Arthur's statements to his creditors were offered in evidence. They were in support of the plaintiff's claim of title, while this admission makes against that claim and against the plaintiff's interest.

There was no error in the rulings. Judgment affirmed.

JOHN C. HAYES, Respt.,
v.

CITY OF SEATTLE, Impleaded, etc., Appt.

Municipal corporation—unsafe sidewalk—liability.

A municipal corporation which permits the maintenance in a prominent thoroughfare in constant use by pedestrians of an aperture covered with iron doors of such character that one may be opened without any guard to protect the hole is liable for an injury caused to a pedestrian who fell

Case Note.—Liability of municipal corporation for injury from opening maintained in sidewalk by abutting owner:—From a review of the authorities bearing upon this question in the note in 61 L.R.A. 583, the conclusion was there drawn that municipalities are liable for injuries to travelers caused by such openings, when, with actual or constructive notice to the city, they are permitted to be constructed, maintained, or used in a defective, negligent, or unsafe manner. This conclusion finds support in the subsequent cases.

Thus, in Drake v. Kansas City, 190 Mo. 370, 109 Am. St. Rep. 759, 88 S. W. 689, it was held that coal holes maintained in sidewalks by abutting owners call for greater care and closer inspection by the city and its officers than ordinary sidewalks demand where no such conditions exist. It was also held that a defect in the APPEAL by the defendant city from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Scott Calhoun, Elmer E. Todd, and F. R. Conway, for appellant:

The city is not liable in the absence of knowledge on its part that the street is being used negligently.

cover to a coal hole is not latent, so as to relieve the city from liability to a pedestrian, where it could be discovered from an examination or inspection made from the surface of the sidewalk.

In Parks v. New York, 111 App. Div. 836, 98 N. Y. Supp. 94, it was held that, where the city issued a permit to the owner of land abutting upon the street to excavate beneath the sidewalk, which necessitated the removal of the sidewalk itself and the erection of a temporary bridge in place thereof, an absolute duty was imposed upon the city to see to it that the portion of the street interfered with by reason of the permit was kept reasonably safe, or that the person using it was seasonably warned that he could not rely upon the presumption that it was safe for use.

In Link v. New York, 82 App. Div. 486, 81 N. Y. Supp. 577, the plaintiff was injured by a fall into an open cellar way, over a coping which was not of sufficient height to guard the cellar way. The cellar projected onto the sidewalk over 4 feet, and had been maintained in the same condition for twenty-three years. The city was held liable for the accident.

In Payne v. Cleveland, 25 Ohio C. C. 457, it was held that the city was liable for its failure to repair a coal hole in the sidewalk, constructed and maintained by the abutting owner under permission granted by the city, when, prior to the accident, knowledge of its dangerous condition was brought home to a policeman, whose duty it was, by rule of the police department, to communicate such knowledge to the officers having authority to remedy the matter; and evidence was admissible to show these facts, and also to show that the owner then told the policeman that he could not fasten or secure the cover to the hole because the fastening was broken.

In Parks v. New York, supra, it was held that notice to a policeman of a defect in a 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

It does not rest with any municipal corporation to deny to the owner of property abutting on a street his right to make and use an excavation under the sidewalk on such street, and to gain access to such excavation through an opening in such sidewalk.

Messrs. McCafferty & Bell for respondent.

Per Curiam:

The respondent fell into an opening in a temporary bridge over an excavation under the sidewalk was notice to the city.

In Drake v. Kansas City, supra, it was held that, if the construction of a coal hole, put in by permission of a city, was such that it was improper and unsafe, and the cover was liable to be displaced, the city was not entitled to actual notice, for it had constructive notice from the beginning.

In McClammy v. Spokane, 36 Wash. 339, 78 Pac. 912, it was held that the granting of a permit to repair the sidewalk, in which there was a trap door, and therein limiting the time for doing the work to fifteen days, was notice to the city that the work was in progress, and charged the city with the duty to see that it was properly conducted.

In Earl v. Cedar Rapids, 126 Iowa, 361, 106 Am. St. Rep. 361, 102 N. W. 140, it appeared that a cellar or area way 3 feet wide and 6 feet long extended into the sidewalk at least 1 foot; that the trap door, when closed, was on a level with the street; that, when opened, it rested against the side of the building; that there were no barriers or railings around the areaway, and nothing to warn travelers of the danger of falling into the opening; and that the trap door for a considerable period had been open at least once, and sometimes twice, a day. It was held to be immaterial that plaintiff did not approach the opening or cellar way in the sidewalk from the street, but from abutting property; that when he got upon the street, or what from the nature of the construction appeared to be part of the street, he was entitled to the protecting care of the city; and that whether or not the city was negligent was a question for the jury.

In McClammy v. Spokane, supra, it was held that the court should not decide, as a matter of law, that no negligence appeared on the part of the city, where there was a dispute as to whether any or sufficient barriers were maintained.

sidewalk on one of the streets of the city of Seattle and was injured. He brought this action to recover damages for his injuries, and was awarded a judgment in the sum of $755 from which the city appeals.

The opening in question was in a sidewalk on one of the principal streets of Seattle, along which a large number of people were constantly passing. It was some 5 feet long by 4 feet wide, and, when not being used, was covered with iron doors laid lengthwise of the opening. These doors were hinged to the side, and raised up from the middle. When open they formed a kind of barrier which guarded the main opening from the approach of pedestrians. At the time of the accident to the respondent but one of the doors was open. He approached from the opposite way and walked over the first door, and into the opening without discovering that the second had been raised up. How long the door had been open the evidence does not make very clear, but it could have been only a few moments at the longest, and it is probable that it had been open only an instant before the accident. The city contends that it is not negligence in itself to permit an opening to be made in a sidewalk and used for the purposes for which this opening was used, and that, because it is not such negligence, it is not liable for any negligent use made of the opening unless it has knowledge, in time to correct it, of the fact that it is being negligently used; further contending that in this case there is no evidence that it had such knowledge. But we think these contentions inapplicable to the facts as shown in the record. This opening was upon a prominent thoroughfare, in constant use by pedestrians. The opening was not guarded in any way, and to open it at all was a menace to every person who happened at that time to be passing. These facts the city knew or ought to have known, and we think the court rightly held it responsible for the injury.

The judgment is affirmed.

Am. Dec. 550, an action by attorneys against a client to recover for legal services, it was held that the former might testify fully as to their employment by, the nature of the services rendered for, and the counsel given to, the latter. The court referred to the general rule excluding confidential communications between attorney and client, saying: "But the claims of justice dictate some exceptions to this rule. It would be a manifest injustice to allow the client to take advantage of it to the prejudice of his attorney, or that it should be carried to the extent of depriving the attorney of the means of obtaining or defending his own rights. It is therefore held that in such cases he is exempted from the obligations of secrecy. . . . He should not, however, disclose more than is necessary for his own protection."

In Keck v. Bode, 23 Ohio C. C. 413, an action by an attorney against a client to recover for professional services, it was held that the attorney could testify as to confidential communications between himself and client. The court said: The client cannot use the protection "thus guaranteed to him as a means of defrauding the attorney. When a controversy arises between client and attorney the facts of which are evidenced by communications between them, the very necessities of the case require an exception to the general rule. . . . In states where the privilege protecting communications with attorneys is still regulated by the common law, as well as in those where it is prescribed by statute, the weight of authority favors the competency of an attorney as a witness to such communications when the suit is between himself and client. . . . It will be observed, however, that the same necessity which creates the exception limits also its scope and effect, and, if the communication is not essential to preserve the rights of the attorney, it continues to be privileged."

In Nave v. Baird, 12 Ind. 318, which was an action by an attorney on a promissory note given by a client for professional services, where the client, by counterclaim, sought to recover damages for the attorney's alleged mismanagement of the suit and disobedience of the client's instructions, it was held that the attorney could testify fully as to consultations with the client, in which it was alleged certain instructions were given which were disobeyed by the attorney, as such communications ceased to be privileged when the client charged the attorney with such misconduct.

In Minard v. Stillman, 31 Or. 164, 65 Am. St. Rep. 815, 49 Pac. 976, where an attorney was sued by a client for money collected by him, which the attorney claimed to have paid to different persons by plaintiff's direction, it was held that the attorney could divulge the names of the persons to whom he made payments, that not being a privileged communication. The court said: "In a controversy between one of the parties and the attorney the communication would be a matter of common knowledge between parties to that controversy; and the reason assigned why it is not privileged as between the parties to the settlement is equally as strong, and has like application as between one of the parties and the attorney."

In Rochester City Bank v. Suydam, 5 How. Pr. 254, an action against attorney and client as indorsers of negotiable paper, it was held that communications between them were not privileged and might be disclosed by the attorney. The court said: "Where the attorney or counsel has an interest in the facts communicated to him, and when their disclosure becomes necessary to protect his own personal rights, he must of necessity and in reason be exempted from the obligation of secrecy. . . . Here the attorney has a large amount of property in his hands, which has accumulated during a seven years' employment, the nature and extent of which is shown by his correspondence with his clients. Under these circumstances, he is induced by them to assume heavy responsibilities upon the faith and security of this property. Is he to be deprived of what may very likely be his only means of showing in what this property consists, by producing his clients' letters in

Mr. Frank G. Tompkins for respondent.

Jones, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff brought this action March 8, 1902, to recover damages for injuries received by him while working as an employee on a picker machine in defendant's mills, on November 15, 1901, as the result of defendant's alleged negligence in providing unsafe machinery without adequate guards over exposed cogwheels, and in not warning plaintiff of the danger of the machine, of which he was ignorant. The defendant, by amended answer, pleaded general denial, assumption of risk, and contributory negligence. Plaintiff recovered judgment on verdict for $1,500, entered November 21, 1903, but, on appeal therefrom by defendant, judgment was reversed and new trial granted; the remittitur from this court being filed December 16, 1904. 70 S. C. 211, 49 S. E. 478. In the meantime, in April, 1904, pending said appeal in this court, defendant was adjudged a bankrupt by the United States district court for South Carolina, under the bankrupt act of Congress, and on June 6, 1904, was discharged, the creditors having agreed upon a composition. By supplemental answer this discharge was set up in bar on the second trial. The plaintiff again recovered a verdict for $1,500, and from the judgment thereon comes this appeal.

1. The first question raised is whether the court erred in refusing to grant a nonsuit; it being contended by appellant that the evidence for plaintiff failed to show any negligence on the part of defendant, and having shown that the injury was due solely to the negligence of plaintiff in not avoiding a manifest danger. The plaintiff, while adjusting a lap on the picker machine, had his sleeve caught by the cogwheel and his relation to it? I think no such construction has ever been put upon the rule in question. His clients, by giving him a direct interest in the facts from time to time communicated to him, and by dealing with him upon the footing of those facts, have, as it strikes me, voluntarily waived their right to concealment as between themselves and the attorney."

In Re Postlethwaite, L. R. 35 Ch. Div. 722, an action for accounting, to which the solicitor was a party, charging fraud on his part, it was held that communications by letter between the solicitor, who was a trustee of certain property, and his cotrustee, were not privileged, even though it was claimed that such communications were made to the solicitor as the personal adviser of his cotrustee, because the solicitor and his client were here charged with fraud.

But in Chant v. Brown, 7 Hare, 79, it was held that confidential communications between solicitor and client do not cease to be privileged where the solicitor subsequently becomes interested in the property, as a devisee, to the title of which such communications related.

On the point that an agreement between an attorney and client, by which the attorney is to receive a portion of the sum recovered, is not a privileged communication, the authorities are in harmony with STRICKLAND V. CAPITAL CITY MILLS, although the question has more frequently arisen as bearing on the attorney's bias, credibility, or interest in the result of the litigation when a witness for his client. In Moats v. Ry- mer, 18 W. Va. 642, 41 Am. Rep. 703, a trial for malicious prosecution, plaintiff's attorney submitted himself as a witness for his client, and it was held that he could not refuse to disclose a written contract between himself and client whereby he was to have half the recovery in the case, such matters not falling within the protection of privileged communications. Also in Smithwick v. Evans, 24 Ga. 461, where an attorney was a witness to a will, it was held that he could be questioned as to the amount of his fee and terms of payment. The court said: "It was not a matter of confidential communication from his client that he was interrogated to; nor was it as to a matter or thing which he acquired from his client, or during the existence or by reason of the relationship of client and attorney. It was in regard to a matter which must have been necessarily agreed upon before the relation of client and attorney could exist. It was, prima facie, relevant to the matter in issue." In Eastman v. Kelly, 49 Hun, 607, 16 N. Y. S. R. 894, 1 N. Y. Supp. 866, it was also held that, where plaintiff's attorney offers himself as a witness for his client, he must divulge whether he is interested in the result of the action to the extent of a share of the proceeds of the recovery; such a disclosure not divulging any confidential communication between attorney and client.

In Williams v. Young, 46 Iowa, 140, a garnishment proceeding against an attorney, it was held that the attorney must disclose arm pulled under the cogs, lacerated, and injured. The cogwheel was unguarded, and there was some testimony in behalf of plaintiff that in cotton-mill machinery the general rule with the best manufacturers is to have all parts with which an operative will come in contact covered with casing, including cogwheels. The plaintiff testified that he had only been operating a picker machine for two days previous to the day he was injured; that he had received no caution or warning concerning the danger of operating the machine, of which he was ignorant; that, while he could have seen the cogwheels if he had looked, as a matter of fact he had not noticed them. It appears from the testimony offered in behalf of the defendant, which may be considered in determining whether there should be a reversal of nonsuit, that the cogwheel is located on the side of the picker machine, is about 2 inches in diameter, its cogs meshing in with the cogs of a larger covered wheel below, and thus driving it; that it is located behind the gear casing, is not in a position of danger to a person in the usual position of feeding the machine, but, according to the testimony of E. W. Thomas, general manager of the Granby and Olympia Mills at Columbia,

South Carolina (at folio 235), and the testimony of W. P. Hamrick, superintendent of the Capital City Mills (at folio 251), the duty of the operative would at times require him to go all around the machine. Moreover, it appears that, on motion of appellant's counsel and with consent of plaintiff's counsel, the jury were permitted to view the premises and inspect the machinery in question. We cannot say as a matter of law that there should be a reversal in this case for failure to nonsuit. It was for the jury to say whether the defendant discharged its duty to supply its operatives with reasonably safe machinery. If the defendant was negligent in not properly guarding the machinery with which the operative would probably come in contact in the discharge of his duties, and in not warning him in his inexperience, then whether the plaintiff, after knowledge, voluntarily assumed the risk in this case, or whether by his own want of care he proximately contributed to bring about his injury, were, we think, under the circumstances of this case, properly referred to the jury. This case is distinguishable from the case of Wofford v. Clifton Cotton Mills, 72 S. C. 346, 51 S. E. 918. In that case plainwith whom he had deposited the client's money and the conditions upon which it was to be paid out, such disclosure not violating any confidential communication. Also in Jeanes v. Fridenberg, 3 Clark (Pa.) 199, in a similar proceeding, it was held that an attorney could not refuse to divulge whether he had received a certain sum of money from his client in trust to pay a certain percentage thereof to such of the client's creditors as would receive the same in full satisfaction of their claims. The court refers to the general rule excluding confidential communication between attorney and client, and holds that this case falls within the exception to the rule, saying: "But there is a class which stands upon higher, and still clearer and more unequivocal ground, where the line is distinctly and broadly marked, and that is where the attorney is himself a party to the transaction or agreement which he is called upon to disclose. . . . If the privilege were suffered to be applied to such cases, a wide door would be opened for the successful perpetration of fraud and crime." This case involves a simple trust only, and not a privileged communication between attorney and client. Also in Shanghnessy v. Fogg, 15 La. Ann. 330, the same rule was applied.

In Olmstead v. Webb, 5 App. D. C. 38, in an action to which an attorney was not a party, where his former client charged him with shameful misconduct and treachery, which, if undenied, would tend greatly to prejudice appellant's case, it was held that the attorney might testify in denial thereof. The court said: "The object of the rule" of confidential communications "ceases, and the attorney is no longer bound by his obligation, when the client or his representatives charge him, either directly or indirectly, with fraud or other improper or unprofessional conduct."

In State v. Madigan, 66 Minn. 10, 68 N. W. 179, respondent in a criminal case, in his moving papers for a new trial, charged his attorney with fraud practised upon the trial court and upon respondent. It was held that the attorney's counter affidavit, denying these charges, was admissible, not being a violation of confidential communications between attorney and client. The court said: "This privilege [of confidential communication] may be waived either by the conduct or consent of the client. Such communications are not privileged to the extent of depriving the attorney of the means of obtaining or defending his right. . . . And, . . . if the client voluntarily breaks the seal of privileged silence by a vicious and defamatory attack upon his attorney upon matters otherwise privileged, and makes them a part of the public judicial records of the state, the court, in the interest of justice, ought to permit the opposite party the use of the attorney's denial by counter affidavit. If the client does not wish a repulse, he should not attack."

And see note in 6 L.R.A. 481, for a collection of cases upon the general rule, but not this exception, of privileged communications between attorney and client.

tiff received injury by having his hand caught in the cogwheel of a speeder frame while cleaning the floor beneath. The cogwheels were covered on top, but this covering did not extend to the floor. The plaintiff in that case had been working in the mill two years, saw the machine put up, and it was his duty and habit to take the covering off and clean the cogs. The court considered that the evidence admitted of no other conclusion than that the plaintiff in that case not only knew the nature of the machine, but fully comprehended the danger of putting his hands under the moving cogs to clean the floor.

2. The next question is raised by the second and third exceptions, which assign error in refusing to allow F. G. Tompkins, Esq., attorney of record for plaintiff, to testify whether he had any assignment, contract, or agreement, whereby he owned an interest in the claim of Henry Strickland against Capital City Mills between April 1, 1904, and July 1, 1904, and in ruling out as a privileged communication a written paper, signed by plaintiff and produced by F. G. Tompkins, assigning to said F. G. Tompkins an interest in the judgment in this case entered November 5, 1903. The written instrument in question was dated November 5, 1903, was signed by Henry Strickland, and purported to assign to Frank G. Tompkins a specified per cent of Strickland's interest in the judgment against Capital City Mills for legal services rendered therein. The court ruled this evidence out as a privileged communication between attorney and client. This, we think, would be error in a case where such testimony is material to some issue therein. The general rule excludes from evidence all confidential communications of a professional nature between attorney and client, unless the client, for whose benefit the rule is established, waives the privilege. This is based upon a wise public policy which considers that the interests of society are best promoted by inviting the utmost confidence on the part of the client in disclosing his secrets to his professional adviser, under the pledge of the law that such confidence shall not be abused by permitting a disclosure of such communications. This rule, however, is subject to limitations, and should not be extended beyond its legitimate scope and purposes. We see no reason why the contract between the client and attorney as to the fee to be paid for professional services, and the assignment of an interest in a judgment recovered in payment of services rendered, should fall within the rule of privileged communications. This is knowledge which is not communicated by the client to the attorney, but is knowledge of the attorney derived from his own act in creating the fact sought to be disclosed, and not from a revelation of any secret of the client. The fee contract, whether regarded as made preliminary to the relation of attorney and client, or at the close of such relation in compensation for services rendered, or whether made during the existence of such relation, is really collateral to the professional relation, is not strictly a part of it, and has no bearing upon the merits of the matter, upon which professional aid was invoked. As to such a contract the parties ordinarily stand in adversary relation. In 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 74, the doctrine is stated that there is no privilege as to the amount of the attorney's fee or the terms of payment, citing Smithwick v. Evans, 24 Ga. 462; Moats v. Rymer, 18 W. Va. 642, 41 Am. Rep. 703; and, at page 76, this same work states that there is no privilege where the attorney is himself a party to the transaction or agreement which he is called upon to disclose. See also note in O'Brien v. Spalding (Ga.) 66 Am. St. Rep. 213, for a comprehensive statement of the general rule on this subject and its limitations, and especially on pages 231 and 232. Then, in this case, the nature of the fact sought to be disclosed must be considered. The assignment was of an interest in a matter of record, which necessarily involved the right of the assignee to place it with the judgment record as a protection to his interest therein, and this must be deemed to have been within the contemplation of the client. Furthermore, the assignment was made in the presence of a witness, A. F. Spigner. It appears that Mr. Spigner was also an attorney in the case associated with Mr. Tompkins. The fact that one of the attorneys was a witness to the instrument would undoubtedly render such attorney competent to testify as to its execution, consideration, and the circumstances attending its execution in his presence. Moffatt v. Hardin, 22 S. C. 26; Brazel v. Fair, 26 S. C. 385, 2 S. E. 293; Monaghan Bay Co. v. Dickson, 39 S. C. 148, 39 Am. St. Rep. 704, 17 S. E. 696. The same reason would render admissible the testimony of the attorney to whom and in whose presence the instrument was executed. In the case of Stoney v. McNeil, Harp. L. 557, 18 Am. Dec. 666, an attorney was compelled to answer as to facts falling within his own knowledge derived from the acts of the client in his presence. The testimony sought to be excluded as a privileged communication in that case was that the bond in suit was delivered by the client to the attorney for suit indorsed in blank, and that such blank indorsement was filled out in the presence and by the advice of the attorney with an assignment from Henry to Stoney, the plaintiff. The issue was as to whether the bond was assigned to Stoney, plaintiff, by Henry, or whether Henry had assigned the bond to Brown, who had discharged the defendant. But, granting that the testimony could not be regarded as being a privileged communication, the court's ruling could not be deemed reversible error, unless it appears that the testimony was relevant and material to some issue in the case. The object of defendant in seeking to introduce such testimony was to show that the attorney was part owner of the judgment, and that notice to him of the bankruptcy proceedings would be notice to the plaintiff, joint owner of the judgment, so as to make the discharge in bankruptcy a bar to plaintiff's action. It is admitted as a fact that F. G. Tompkins had actual knowledge of the bankruptcy proceedings, but the evidence was that Henry Strickland had no notice or actual knowledge thereof. Our inquiry for the present does not involve the question whether notice to Tompkins as attorney was notice to the plaintiff, his client; but the question is whether notice to Tompkins as owner of an interest in the judgment was notice to the plaintiff as co-owner. We do not think it was. The relation between the parties as owners of the judgment was not like that of partners, joint contractors, and the like, wherein notice to one may be deemed notice to the associates on the principle of agency. "In the absence of proof of partnership or agency, it appears to be a settled rule that notice to one of several purchasers taking title as joint tenants or tenants in common will not, by mere force of their relationship, operate as notice to the others." 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 516; 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 587; Parker v. Kane, 4 Wis. 1, 65 Am. Dec. 283; Babcock v. Wells, 25 R. I. 23, 105 Am. St. Rep. 853, 54 Atl. 596. This last case holds that notice to one of two mortgagees that the title of a mortgagor is subject to an outstanding equity is not notice to the other. Under this view, the testimony was not material.

3. The remaining exceptions to the charge and refusals to charge raise the question whether notice to F. G. Tompkins, attorney of record for the plaintiff throughout the litigation, of the adjudication in bankruptcy, was notice to plaintiff. Notwithstanding the fact that the original suit in this case was upon an unliquidated claim for damages for tort by negligence, and that the judgment rendered on the former trial was set aside and the claim restored to its original status on the appeal and motion of the 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) bankrupt, made presumably with approval of the Federal court, it is conceded for the purposes of this appeal that plaintiff's former judgment in this case was provable in bankruptcy. The question then is whether the defendant's discharge in bankruptcy is a bar to the present claim, assuming that the claim was a "provable debt." Section 17 of the United States bankruptcy statute of July 1, 1898, chap. 541, 30 Stat. at L. 550, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3428, provides: "A discharge in bankruptcy shall release a bankrupt from all of his provable debts except such as (1) are due as a tax levied by the United States, the state, county, district, or municipality in which he resides; (2) are judgments in actions for frauds or obtaining property by false pretenses or false representations, or for wilful and malicious injuries to the person or property of another, [or for alimony due, or to become due, or for maintenance or support of wife or child, or for seduction of an unmarried female, or for criminal conversation]; (3) have not been duly scheduled in time for proof and allowance with the name of the creditor, if known to the bankrupt, unless such creditor had notice or actual knowledge of the proceedings in bankruptcy; or (4) were created by his fraud, embezzlement, misappropriation, or defalcation while acting as an officer or in any fiduciary capacity." The controversy is upon the question whether the case falls within the third exception above stated. It is an undisputed fact that plaintiff's claim was intentionally omitted from the schedule, under the belief that it was not a fixed liability, and that no notice was ever served upon Henry Strickland, and that he had no actual knowledge of the bankruptcy proceedings until after the bankrupt's discharge. It appears, however, that F. G. Tompkins, who acted as Strickland's attorney throughout the litigation, was informed of the bankruptcy proceedings and was present at the first meeting of the bankrupt creditors. Mr. Tompkins, however, testified that he was present merely as a spectator, did not in any way participate in the meeting, and had no authority to represent Henry Strickland in the bankruptcy court. Henry Strickland also testified that he had not employed Mr. Tompkins to represent him in the bankruptcy proceedings. No power of attorney was ever made or filed authorizing Mr. Tompkins to represent Mr. Strickland in this matter, as is the usual procedure in Federal courts, and it does not even appear that Mr. Tompkins is authorized to practise in the Federal circuit or district courts. Rule 4, adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States as a general order in bankruptcy proceedings, provides: "Every party may appear and conduct the proceedings by attorney who shall be an attorney or counselor authorized to practise in the circuit or district court. The name of the attorney or counselor with his place of business shall be entered upon the docket with the date of the entry. All papers or proceedings offered by an attorney to be filed shall be indorsed as above required, and orders granted on motion shall contain the name of the party or attorney making the motion. Notices and orders which are not by the act or by these general orders required to be served on the party personally may be served upon his attorney." Section 1 of said bankruptcy act (30 Stat. at L. 544, chap. 541, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3418), giving the meaning of terms used therein, declares that "creditor" shall include anyone who owns a demand or claim provable in bankruptcy, and may include his duly authorized agent, attorney, or proxy. We conclude from the foregoing that an attorney at law cannot represent a creditor in bankruptcy proceedings, unless he is duly authorized so to do; and there was no evidence that Mr. Tompkins had or assumed to exercise any such authority.

Then it remains to consider whether an attorney employed to represent the creditor in a suit on a claim in the state court, by virtue of that relation, so represents the creditor with respect to that claim as that notice to him of the bankruptcy proceedings is notice to a duly authorized attorney in the sense of the bankruptcy statute so as to bind the creditor. We think not. Ordinarily the authority of the attorney ends when judgment is obtained, and he can do no more than receive the money and acknowledge satisfaction. The Treasurers v. McDowell, 1 Hill, L. 184, 26 Am. Dec. 166. He cannot after judgment, without special authority, compromise his client's claim and enter into composition with the judgment debtor. Tompkins's employment to represent Strickland in the appeal taken by the defendant company authorized him to do anything necessary or incidental to the conduct of said appeal in the state court; but such employment gave Tompkins no authority to represent Strickland in the bankruptcy proceedings in the Federal court. There is no doubt that the general rule is that notice to the attorney is notice to the client, but the knowledge of the attorney must be acquired while acting for the principal, and the information must relate to a matter within the scope of his agency; the theory of the law being that the agent is presumed to have communicated to his principal knowledge which it was his duty to have communicated and which it is reasonable to suppose he did actually communicate. Akers v. Rowan, 33 S. C. 453, 10 L.R.A. 706, 12 S. E. 165; Rapley v. Klugh, 40 S. C. 137, 18 S. E. 680; Knobelock v. Germania Sav. Bank, 50 S. C. 290, 27 S. E. 902; Peebles v. Warren, 51 S. C. 561, 29 S. C. 659; Steinmeyer v. Steinmeyer, 55 S. C. 29, 33 S. E. 15. It cannot be said that the bankruptcy proceedings were within the scope of Tompkins's agency, nor can it be said that it was the duty of Tompkins to inform Strickland of such proceedings, especially when it appears that the attorney for the petitioning creditors and the referee in bankruptcy, with knowledge of the pending appeal from the former judgment in this case, took no steps to have Strickland's name placed upon the schedule of creditors, or to give him the notice which § 58 of the bankruptcy act (30 Stat. at L. 561, chap. 541, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3444) requires to be given to creditors. But, furthermore, we construe the provision in the act under consideration as including only cases where there was personal notice or actual knowledge of the bankruptcy proceedings on the part of the creditor, as distinguished from mere imputed or constructive notice or knowledge. It is not denied that, if Tompkins had been duly authorized to represent Strickland in the bankruptcy proceedings, notice to Tompkins would be notice to Strickland, since by the terms of the statute a duly authorized attorney or proxy represents the creditor. But it is different when actual notice or actual knowledge is sought to be imputed to the creditor merely because of the knowledge of an attorney who represents the creditor's claim in another court. What the statute requires is actual notice or actual knowledge either by the creditor or his duly authorized agent in the bankruptcy proceedings. Collier, Bankruptcy, 172. Neither of these conditions exists in this case, as it is conceded that Strickland had no actual knowledge of the bankruptcy proceedings, and the finding of the jury under the charge given establishes that Tompkins had no authority to prove or collect the claim in question in the bankruptcy court. In Birkett v. Columbia Bank, 195 U. S. 345, 350, 49 L. ed. 231, 232, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 38, 40, the court said: "Actual knowledge of the proceedings contemplated by the section is a knowledge in time to avail a creditor of the benefits of the law,—in time to give him an equal opportunity with other creditors,—not a knowledge that may come so late as to deprive him of participation in the administration of the affairs of the estate, or to deprive him of dividends."

The exceptions are overruled, and the judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

JAMES H. McCREARY et al., Respts.,
v.

A. C. COGGESHALL et al., Appts.

Will—contingent remainder—aspect.

1. A contingent remainder with a double aspect, and not an executory devise, is created by a devise to one for life and then to the issue of her body then living, their heirs and assigns, but, in case of want of issue, then to another, his heirs and assigns forever.

Remainder—life estate—merger.

2. The acquisition of the life estate by the reversioner will merge the fee in him and cut out an intermediate contingent remainder, unless an intention that it shall not do so appears.

Vested rights—impairment.

3. The rights of a reversioner who has cut out an intermediate contingent remainder by the purchase of the life estate cannot be affected by a subsequent statute enacted to preserve the rights of remaindermen.

Merger—particular fee.

4. Merger will not take place, even at law, upon the uniting of a particular estate and the fee in the same person, if opposed to the intention of the parties affirmatively appearing or to be implied from the fact that merger would be opposed to the interest of the party in whom the different estates or interests become united.

Case Note.—Effect of union of life estate and remote remainder or reversion in the same person upon intermediate contingent remainder: —The small number of decisions bearing upon the question of the extinguishment of a contingent remainder by the merger of the particular estate upon which it was limited is attributable to two things, first, the invention of the scheme of introducing trustees to preserve contingent remainders, whose legal estate would support the remainder irrespective of any acts of the tenant of the particular estate, and, second, the enactment of statutes, both in England and in most, if not all, of the United States, expressly or in effect providing that a contingent remainder shall not be defeated or barred by any destruction of the precedent estate by disseisin, forfeiture, surrender, merger, or otherwise.

The rule, however, that destruction of the particular estate by merger with a greater estate, or otherwise, would also destroy the remainder, originating in feudal polity, was indisputably established as a part of the common law, and as such has been recognized by the courts of this country.

The union of the particular estate with the remainder or reversion may obviously be effected in several ways, either by the life tenant's acquisition of the ultimate fee by devise or descent directly or mediately, or by purchase, or by the acquisition of the particular estate by the reversioner or remainder-man, or by the acquisition by purchase of both estates by a third party. The modes thus enumerated, being each somewhat affected by particular considerations, will be hereinafter discussed separately.

Where the particular estate and the remainder or reversion are created by the same instrument and vest in the same person, or are devised to the same person, or are acquired by immediate descent from the creator of the particular estate, there is no merger of the particular in the greater estate which will destroy a contingent remainder dependent thereon, since to permit such a result would be to make the instrument or devise defeat itself.

In Archer's Case, 1 Coke, 66b, it was held that, where a devisee of a life estate, with contingent remainder to his heirs, at the same time inherited the reversion, the estate for life was not merged in the descent of the reversion.

And in Plunkett v. Holmes, 1 Lev. 11, T. Raym. 28, Sid. pt. 1, p. 47, it was held that, where testator devised lands to his eldest son for life, and, if such son should die without issue living at his death, then to another of testator's sons in fee, but, if the eldest son should have issue living at his death, then to the right heirs of such son forever, the eldest son took an estate for life with remainder to his heirs, not executed, and, though he himself inherit the reversion from the testator, "that shall not drown the estate for life contrary to the express devise and intent of the will, but shall leave an opening . . . for the interposing of the remainders."

In Egerton v. Massey, 3 C. B. N. S. 338, where lands were devised to a person for life with remainder to her children, and in default of children to another person in fee, and the life tenant was also the residuary devisee, it was held that the reversion passed by the residuary devise, but that there was no merger of the life estate in the reversion while the property was owned by the devisee.

In Bowles's Case, 11 Coke, 80a, a case of a settlement upon a husband and wife which had the effect to vest in them both a life estate and the reversion, with a contingent remainder to their issue, it was held that until issue were born the husband and wife was seised of an estate tail executed sub modo, namely, until the birth of issue, when by operation of law the life estate and reversion were divided.

The rule that there is no merger where the particular estate and the reversion are created by the same instrument is also recognized as law in the leading case of Purefoy v. Rogers, 2 Wms.' Saund. 386, and in Adverse possession—agent.

5. When one is shown to have taken possession of land as agent of another, his subsequent holding will be regarded as permissive in the absence of proof to the contrary.

Merger—life estate—adverse possession.

6. An intermediate remainder will not be cut out by the acquisition by the ultimate remainder-man of the life estate under adverse possession claimed against the life tenant alone, with the admission that the intermediate remainder is unclaimed and unaffected.

Adverse possession—married woman.

7. Title by adverse possession cannot be acquired against a married woman pending coverture.

Evidence—ancient document.

proper custody, is an ancient document which proves itself.

Same—documents for comparison.

9. Upon the question of the genuineness of a letter seventy years old, the public records kept by the alleged writer as the incumbent of the office to which they belonged are admissible in evidence.

Evidence—record—probate.

10. The record of a deed is not inadmissible in evidence because the letters U. Q., following the name of the one taking the probate, did not indicate any officer authorized to take a probate, where it appears that the person designated was clerk of the court, of which fact the court could take judicial notice, and ex officio one of the quorum who by statute had authority to take probates, so that the letters doubtless signified unum quorum.

Craig v. Warner, 5 Mackey, 460, 60 Am. Rep. 381.

In Crisfield v. Storr, 36 Md. 129, 11 Am. Rep. 480, and Bennett v. Morris, 5 Rawle, 9, it is held that, where a fee descends upon the life tenant from the same person by whose will the life estate was created, there is no merger of the life estate in the fee which will destroy an intervening contingent remainder.

In Dennett v. Dennett, 40 N. H. 498, it was held that though, by virtue of the rule in Shelley's Case, the devisee of a life estate might be considered the owner of the fee, yet, where a contingent remainder is interposed between the life estate and the limitation to the heirs of the life tenant, there is no merger of the life estate which will destroy the contingent remainder.

Although there is no merger of the particular estate while the two estates are united in the ways above mentioned in the life tenant, there is such a merger where the estates are conveyed to a third party, and the contingent remainder is thereby destroyed. Egerton v. Massey and Craig v. Warner, supra.

So, also, in Bennett v. Morris, supra, it was held that, though a life estate devised was not merged in the reversion inherited by the devisee from the testator, so as to destroy a contingent remainder, yet that such merger and destruction of the remainder would take place upon a conveyance to a third party; the court saying that, notwithstanding the distinction made where the reversion is inherited by the life tenant may be right in order to give effect to the will according to the intention of the testator, it does not change the nature of the particular estate limited by the will, nor render it in any respect different from what it would have been had it been created by any other means, but that it remains liable, in the same manner, to the operation of all acts of the tenant for life at least, if not to all future accidents by which such an estate is generally destroyed, such as forfeiture, merger, etc. Continuing, the court says: "I do not consider it a sufficient objection to this conclusion that the intention of the testator, as regards the contingent remainder, may be thus indirectly frustrated by it; because it must be presumed that he was acquainted with the law on this subject, as he was bound to know it; and that, unless he introduced trustees into his will for the purpose of preserving the contingent remainder, he left it in the power of the devisee of the particular estate to defeat the contingent remainder by destroying the particular estate."

It does not satisfactorily appear from the foregoing cases that the destruction of the contingent remainder should be attributed wholly to the merger of the particular estate in the reversion, as the same result may be reached by regarding the particular estate as having been destroyed by the conveyance of the life tenant, which, under the common law, was a result of any conveyance made by a life tenant except under the statute of uses. Some support is given to this theory by the case of Dennett v. Dennett, supra, in which it was held that, though the life tenant was also vested with the ultimate fee, a contingent remainder for life to his youngest son surviving him being interposed, a conveyance by him which had simply the effect to convey only what he might rightfully convey would not operate to destroy the contingent remainder.

The foregoing exception to the rule that, where a greater and a lesser estate are united in the same person, no vested estate intervening, the lesser estate will be merged in the greater so as to destroy intervening contingent remainders, is discussed in Fearne on Contingent Remainders, vol. 1, p. 343, as follows: "Wherever a testator limits a contingent remainder, it is agreed that the inheritance descends to the heir only till the contingency happens; if so, nothing can be more absurd than to make such descent destroy the contingency. The will does not operate till the testator's death; the descent takes effect at the same

Ejectment—recovery—unlitigated title.

11. Permitting a recovery in ejectment against one of the defendants who was not shown to be connected with the main title in the controversy is not erroneous where such title was good against all except plaintiff, by reason of adverse possession.

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Darlington County in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate. Affirmed.

A decision was reached and an opinion handed down in this case on October 21, 1905, but, a petition for rehearing having been filed, the following order was entered November 2, 1905:

time; so that, under such a construction, the particular estate given to the heir by the will arises and is destroyed in one and the same instant. And how is it destroyed? By the descent which that very same will permitted. This would be making a will and no will at the same time, and would, in effect, be saying that a limitation of a particular estate in a will to a testator's heir at law, with a contingent remainder over, without any ulterior vested remainder, must be void in its creation. For it is evident that, under such a construction, the particular estate never can take effect at all, its existence and destruction commencing together; and that, being destroyed, the contingent remainder over is also gone, before it has even a moment's chance for existence. Now this would be making the will, in this respect, ipso facto, void."

It is suggested in Craig v. Warner, 5 Mackey, 460, 60 Am. Rep. 381, that this exception is not by judicial legislation reaching after a reasonable result, but is required by the statute of wills. "The legislature itself, by that act, abolished so much of the common law as stood in the way of a disposition of lands by will, and of course excluded, pari ratione, any application of the still remaining common-law rule of merger which would have the effect of nullifying the devising power by making a will inoperative ab initio. The result is necessarily the very doctrine which has been settled in the cases of immediate descent. The reversion descends to the life tenant as heir, but shall not unite with his life estate so as to make the will no will."

But the rule is otherwise where the life tenant acquires the reversion other than by direct descent or the same will or instrument.

In Fearne on Contingent Remainders, vol. 1, p. 345, it is further said: "But where the descent of the inheritance on the particular estate is only mediate from the person whose will created the particular estate and remainder; or where the descent of the inheritance is otherwise clear

PER CURIAM:

Since the hearing and decision in this cause, Mr. Justice Woods has recalled the fact, which he had entirely overlooked, that the question of the effect of § 109 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1902 on the rights of remainder-men was involved in a cause pending in the court of common pleas in which he had been one of counsel. The views of the court on this point are not questioned in the petition for rehearing, but, at the request of Mr. Justice Woods, made for the reason above stated, the cause is opened so that argument on this point may be heard by the court without his participation. As the cause is to be reopened, counsel will be heard, also, on the issues referred to in the petition for rehearing.

It is therefore ordered that the cause be of the first-mentioned circumstances,—there can be no such inconsistency in supposing the contingency to be destroyed by the descent; for in all such cases the particular estate is created, and takes effect, with a capacity of being afterwards destroyed by those accidents to which the nature of such an estate is generally subject, such as forfeiture, merger, etc.; its immediate destruction is not necessarily involved in the mode of its creation, as it must be in the former case under the same construction. There can be no necessity, therefore, to exempt the particular estate, in these cases, from the operation of merger by the descent, in order to give such particular estate any existence, as there is in the former case. In the first case we observed the limitations could never possibly take effect, if the descent of the inheritance were allowed to merge the particular estate; in the latter cases they may take effect, though the descent of the fee be allowed its full force and operation; and when the particular estate has once taken effect there is no more reason why it should be exempt from those accidental modes of destruction to which the law subjects estates of the same nature in general than there is in any other case, where the particular estate is merged, and a contingent remainder destroyed, by the accession of the inheritance. Therefore in the latter cases the descent may well be allowed its full and usual operation."

And in Crump ex dem. Woolley v. Norwood, 7 Taunt. 362, it was held that, where a testator gave a life estate to his three nephews, followed by a contingent remainder, and the ultimate remainder to testator's right heirs, one of whom was the father of the life tenants, from whom, upon his decease, they inherited a moiety of the reversion, the intervening contingent remainder was destroyed pro tanto by the merger of the life estates in the reversion.

Next in order of consideration are the cases where the reversion has been acquired by the life tenant in some other way than by descent, or by the same will or instruset down for rehearing at the November term, 1905, of this court, upon the call of the fourth circuit.

At the reargument the question upon which Mr. Justice Woods deemed himself incompetent to sit was withdrawn from consideration, and, upon request of all counsel in the case, he retained his seat upon the bench.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Dargan & Coggeshall, for appellants:

At common law contingent remainders were defeated by any destruction or determination of the particular estate upon which they depended before the contingency happened whereby they became vested.

1 Fearn, Contingent Remainders, 316; 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 410; 2 Washb. Real Prop. *638; Purefoy v. Rogers, 2 Wms' Saund. 380; 2 Bl. Com. 171; Williams, Real Prop. 233; Bouknight v. Brown, 16 S. C. 170; People's Loan & Exch. Bank v. Garlington, 54 S. C. 426, 71 Am. St. Rep. 800, 32 S. E. 513.

Contingent remainders may be destroyed by the particular estate and the inheritance becoming united by conveyance or act of the parties.

ment by which the life estate was created, among which is the much-cited case of Purefoy v. Rogers, 2 Wms' Saund. 380, in which it was held that, where the reversion of property in which a wife had a life interest was purchased by the husband and wife, there was a merger of the life estate in the reversion which would destroy the contingent remainder limited thereon.

In Craig v. Warner, supra, it was held that, where property was devised to a mother and son for life as joint tenants, with contingent remainder in fee to the descendants of the son in being at the death of the survivor of the life tenants, but, in default of such descendants, then to testator's right heirs, who were the mother and her sister, so that the son upon the death of his mother became possessed of the entire life estate and of a moiety of the reversion by inheritance from her, and acquired the other moiety by purchase from the other reversioner, there was a merger of the life estate which would defeat the contingent remainder.

And in Jordan v. McClure, 85 Pa. 495, it was held that, where a life estate was created by a deed of conveyance, with a contingent remainder to grantees' children for life, with reversion to grantor's lawful heirs, and the grantor thereafter devised the reversion to the grantees, the life estate thereupon merged in the reversion, and the contingent remainder was destroyed.

But in Stewart v. Neely, 139 Pa. 309, 20 Atl. 1002, it was held that, where property was devised for life, remainder in fee to such child or children as the life tenant may leave surviving her, and, if the life tenant should die without leaving any children surviving, then to testator's brother; and the tenant for life purchased and had conveyed to her by deed the contingent interest of the brother,—there was no merger of the life estate which would destroy the intermediate contingent remainders, although at the time the life tenant purchased the contingent interest she had no children. The decision in the lower court appears to be grounded upon an unwillingness to give effect to a rule originating in feudal tenure for the purpose of defeating a valid contin-gent interest, and in the brief per curiam opinion rendered by the supreme court it was merely said: "The idea of a life estate being merged into a contingent remainder is a novel proposition. Aside from this, a contingent remainder can only be conveyed by a devise; a deed purporting to convey it operates only as an estoppel, unless the conveyance is after the contingency happens."

And in Moore v. Tate, 102 Ala. 320, 14 So. 635, it was held in equity, that where a father created by deed a life interest in certain property for a son, remainder to the child, children, or issue of such son, and, in default thereof, the property to revert to the grantor and his right heirs; and the son, by agreement with the grantor's heirs, acquired the reversionary interest in the property,—the remainder created by the deed in favor of the son's child, children, or issue continued wholly unaffected by the agreement, and the deed of the father to a third party carried only a life-estate interest coupled with a reversionary interest, subject to be defeated by his death leaving a child, children, or issue.

MCCREARY v. COGGESHALL seems to be the only instance, in the United States at least, in which the effect of the acquisition of the life estate by the version on an intervening contingent remainder has been considered. It should be noted that the decision is harmonized with the case of Stewart v. Neely, supra, by the fact that the remote contingent remainder-man was, by virtue of the residuary devise, also the owner of the reversion, while in the Pennsylvania case the remote remainder-man had no reversionary interest. Another element in the case is the effect of the deed of the life tenant to destroy the particular estate on which the contingent remainder was limited, irrespective of any question of merger.

The effect of the acquisition of the life estate and the reversion by a third party was considered in Archer v. Jacobs, 125 Iowa, 467, 101 N. W. 195, in which it was held that, where the life estate, the remainder, and the reversion were united in a common grantee, contingent remainders limited to persons not in being were merged and destroyed.

In this case the life estate merged in the fee and destroyed the intermediate remainder.

On rehearing.

The rules governing merger at law and in equity are entirely different. The rule at law is that, when a greater and lesser estate meet in the same person, the lesser is immediately merged in the greater by operation of law, it matters not what the intention of the parties might have been.

Mr. Hunter H. McClelland, for respondents:

An intervening contingent remainder prevents merger. Attempts to defeat contingent remainders were viewed with disfavor.

Mr. E. C. Dennis also for respondents.

Woods, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A judgment was recovered by the plaintiffs for the possession of a tract of land containing 630 acres, and defendants appeal.

As it is necessary at every point of the discussion to have in view the precise terms of certain portions of the will of Thomas Hunter, under which both parties claim title, they are here set out in full:

"Item. I lend to my granddaughter, Mary Ann Coleman, for and during the term of her natural life and no longer, all my lands situate, lying and being on Belly Ache, including George King's old place, and also Henry King's supposed to contain nine hundred acres, and also four negroes, Carolina, Sarah and her two children, and the future issue and increase of the females. It is my will and desire that my executors retain and manage the said land and negroes for the benefit of my granddaughter until she arrives at the age of twenty-one or marriage, and then to be delivered over to her; and in case my said granddaughter, Mary Ann Coleman, should die leaving issue of her body then living, then to him or her, or them so living, and to their heirs and assigns forever; but in case the said Mary Ann Coleman should die leaving no issue of her body living at the time of her death, then I give, devise and bequeath all the aforesaid land and negroes to my son, Morris W. Hunter, his heirs and assigns forever.

"Item. I give, devise, and bequeath unto my son, Morris W. Hunter, his heirs and assigns forever, all the rest and residue of my real and personal estate of what kind or nature soever, and wheresoever situate or being, and also, after the death of my wife, Margaret Hunter, I give, devise and bequeath all the real and personal estate hereinbefore loaned to her, to him the said M. W. Hunter, his heirs and assigns forever.

"Lastly. I do hereby nominate my son, Morris W. Hunter, and my friends, Samuel Bacot and James R. Ervin, executors of this my last will and testament."

2. We have italicized the portions requiring special attention. Thomas Hunter died about 1831, leaving surviving him his children, William, Morris, and Rachael, and his grandchild, Mary Ann Coleman. Mary Ann Coleman married Samuel McCreary, and died in 1902, at the age of ninety years, leaving surviving her children, the plaintiffs, J. H. McCreary, J. A. McCreary, Susan Hawthorne, Mary McClelland, and Mattie Massey, who now claim the land in dispute as "issue of her body living" at the time of her death, under the second item of the will. We first consider the case on the assumption that there was evidence to the effect that Morris W. Hunter, one of the heirs and the residuary devisee of Thomas Hunter, acquired title to the life estate of Mary Ann McCreary, née Coleman, and that the defendants, or at least one of them, derived title of the land and possession of it through him. The defendants, taking the position that the plaintiffs took under the will a remainder contingent on surviving their mother, the life tenant, the fee being in Morris W. Hunter, the residuary devisee, pending the contingency upon which plaintiffs should take, contended, if Morris W. Hunter, owner of the fee, did acquire the life estate of Mary Ann Coleman, it became immediately merged in the fee, which he already held, and the contingent remainder, being thus left without any particular estate to support it, would be defeated. The circuit judge refused to so charge, but, on the contrary, instructed the jury the contingent remainder intervening between the life estate and the fee prevented a merger.

There can be no doubt that the limitation to the issue of Mary Ann Coleman, and, in default of such issue, to Morris W. Hunter, created a contingent remainder with a double aspect, and not an executory devise. It is said in Fearn on Contingent Remainders, vol. 1, 393-395: "Lord Mansfield, in the voice of the court, said it was perfectly clear and settled that, where an estate can take effect as a remainder, it shall never be construed an executory devise or springing use. . . . And Lord Kenyon, chief justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, said, if ever there existed a rule respecting executory devises which had uniformly prevailed without any exception to the contrary, it was that which was laid down by Lord Hale, in the case of Purefoy v. Rogers, 2 Wms' Saund. 380. that, where a contingency is limited to depend on an estate of freehold which is capable of supporting a remainder, it shall never be construed to be an executory devise, but a contingent remainder only, and not otherwise.

. . . From the last-noticed case, and that of Hopkins v. Hopkins, Cas. t. Talb. 44, therein referred to, it appears that where the contingent estate may, in the nature of its original limitation, take effect during, or by the time of the determination of, the particular estate (supposing that particular estate to take place), the possibility or probability of its not doing so, in the common course of things, or from its relation to other limitations, interposed by the testator, will not take it out of the general rule that denies the construction of an executory devise to a limitation that may take effect as a remainder." This is conclusive against the contention of the respondent. A reading of the will shows that the limitation of the children of Mary Ann Coleman who survived her, would take effect, if at all, at her death. Mary Ann Coleman's life estate was the particular estate to support the remainder, which could take effect immediately on its determination. Hence, under the rule stated by Mr. Fearne, it could not be an executory devise. McElwee v. Wheeler, 10 S. C. N. S. 392; Faber v. Police, 10 S. C. N. S. 376; Fearne, Contingent Remainders, 373; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 625. The residuary devise to Morris W. Hunter vested in him the fee after the life estate, with the contingent remainders limited thereon. Hopkins v. Mazyck, Rich. Eq. Cas. 263; Williams v. Kibler, 10 S. C. N. S. 414.

The general rule that a life estate is drowned or merged in the fee, when acquired by the owner of the fee, to the destruction of an intervening contingent remainder, is too deeply imbedded in the common law to be now judicially questioned. Whenever this application of the doctrine of merger has been under discussion by writers on the common law the leading case of Purefoy v. Rogers, decided in 1672, and reported in 2 Wms' Saund. 380, in which the doctrine is laid down, has been followed. The rule is thus comprehensively stated in 2 Washburn on Real Property, 6th ed. p. 552, § 1597: "At common law there were various ways in which a contingent remainder might be defeated, by destroying the particular estate on which the remainder depended before it vested. It might be done by a feoffment or forfeiture, . . . or by the inheritance descending upon the tenant and merging his particular estate in itself, or by the particular estate and the inheritance becoming united by conveyance or act of the parties, since the outstanding of a contingent remainder would not prevent the merging of the two, it not being an intervening estate." It is remarkable that a somewhat careful search has disclosed very few cases in American courts in which the precise point was involved. In a text-book of high rank our own case of Mangum v. Piester, 16 S. C. 316, is cited as authority for the proposition that "where the particular estate merges in inheritance either by the act of the particular tenant or by the descent to him of the inheritance after the particular estate has taken effect, intermediate contingent remainders are destroyed." 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

It is true the court held in that case a life estate became merged in the remainder when it was purchased by the remainderman, but the remainder there under discussion was held to be vested, and the limitation over an executory devise, and not a contingent remainder. The subject of the barring of intervening contingent remainders by merger could not therefore arise, and was neither discussed nor decided. Nor was the precise point here under consideration necessarily involved in Bouknight v. Brown, 16 S. C. 155, 170, as will be found on examination of the facts of the case; but in the course of the discussion the court uses this language: "A contingent remainder may be destroyed at common law by fine or recovery, by merger of the particular estate, or by any displacement thereof, and this is the great and essential difference between a contingent remainder and executory devise." Redfern v. Middleton, Rice, L. 459, decided that alienation by the life tenant by deed of feoffment with livery of seisin operated as a forfeiture of the life estate, resulting in the destruction of the contingent remainder depending upon the life estate as the particular estate supporting it. To the same effect are Faber v. Police and McElwee v. Wheeler, supra; and Snelling v. Lamar, 32 S. C. 72, 17 Am. St. Rep. 835, 10 S. E. 825. While the possibility of destroying contingent remainders by merger was not involved in those cases, yet forfeiture by deed of feoffment, with livery of seisin, and merger, have equal common-law sanction as methods of barring contingent remainders, and the remarks of Chief Justice McIver, in People's Loan & Exch. Bank v. Garlington, 54 S. C. 413, 426, 71 Am. St. Rep. 800, 32 S. E. 513, as to the former, apply also to the latter: "There is no doubt that, under the common law of England, a tenant for life could bar contingent remainders by executing a deed of feoffment, with livery of seisin, and there is as little doubt that this portion of the common law became a part of the law of this state by virtue of the act of 1712, incorporated in Gen. Stat. 1882, § 2738." The act of 1883 (18 Stat. at L. p. 430; 1 Civ. Code 1902, § 2465) provides that "no estate in remainder, whether vested or contingent, shall be defeated by any deed of feoffment with livery of seisin." However unfortunate it may be regarded that our statute was not modeled after the English statute 8 & 9 Vict. chap. 106, and thus made comprehensive enough to prevent the unjust destruction of the rights of contingent remaindermen by merger and other artificial means, the court cannot extend the statute beyond its plain meaning. But, even if the statute had expressly provided against the destruction of contingent remainders by merger, it could have no effect to defeat a right acquired by merger before the enactment of the statute. Here, if Morris W. Hunter acquired the preceding life estate and thus defeated the contingent remainder, this was accomplished, and his rights and the rights of those claiming under him were vested, long before the act was passed. The possibility of defeating it might have been taken away by statute, but after it had been actually destroyed, and the entire unlimited title acquired by Hunter, his title could not be altered by statute. People's Loan & Exch. Bank v. Garlington, 54 S. C. 429, 71 Am. St. Rep. 800, 32 S. E. 513. The circuit judge was therefore in error in saying to the jury that the life estate could not merge in the fee because of the intervening contingent remainder, but the unsoundness of the reason given manifestly could not avail appellants, if merger was prevented by any other circumstance appearing from the undisputed evidence. This brings us to the difficult inquiry as to the effect of the intention of the parties.

Inasmuch as there seems to be considerable doubt as to the state of the law on this subject in South Carolina, a statement of the rule obtaining elsewhere and a brief review of our decisions seems desirable. The view generally held is that merger is not favored in the courts of law or equity, and in equity, at least, it will not take place if opposed to the intention of the parties either actually proved or implied from the fact that merger would be against the interest of the party in whom the several estates or interests have united. This doctrine is sustained by an unbroken current of authority in the other states of the Union and in England. Forbes v. Moffatt, 18 Ves. Jr. 384; Factors' & T. Ins. Co. v. Murphy, 111 U. S. 738, 28 L. ed. 582, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 679; Welch v. Phillips, 54 Ala. 309, 25 Am. Rep. 679; Jackson v. Relf, 26 Fla. 465, 8 So. 184; Knowles v. Lawton, 18 Ga. 476, 63 Am. Dec. 465; Watson v. Dundee Mortg. & Trust Invest. Co. 12 Or. 474, 8 Pac. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

548; Bryar's Appeal, 111 Pa. 81, 2 Atl. 344; Dodge v. Hogan, 19 R. I. 4, 31 Atl. 268, 1059; C. M. Hapgood Shoe Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 506, 56 S. W. 995; Carpenter v. Gleason, 58 Vt. 244, 4 Atl. 706; Rorer v. Ferguson, 96 Va. 411, 31 S. E. 817; Stewart v. Eaton, 20 Wash. 378, 55 Pac. 314. It is argued, however, that the rule is different in this state, and that something more than even actual proof of the intention, as a part of the principal contract from which merger would usually result, is necessary to prevent it; that an express contract separate and distinct must be proved. It cannot be denied our cases are in some confusion, and it is therefore desirable to reconcile them as far as possible and state the true rule.

In none of our earlier cases on the subject of merger is the effect of intention considered, and we therefore commence with the case of Agnew v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. 24 S. C. 18, 58 Am. Rep. 237. In this case it was not necessary to go further than to hold that an express separate agreement incorporated in the deed made to the mortgagee that the mortgage should remain open for his protection prevented merger; but effect was given to this paper, not because it was incorporated in the deed or was in writing, but as the expression of an intention that the mortgage should not merge. The court says, quoting from 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 791: "If this intention has been expressed, it controls," etc. In his dissenting opinion Mr. Justice McIver says: "But, in addition to this, the fact that the intention which, according to the authorities relied on, determines the question of merger, is expressed in writing, cannot be decisive. It may facilitate proof of its existence, but it cannot give it an effect which it would not otherwise have. According to those authorities, if the intention that there shall be no merger is ascertained, whether by express proof or implied from the circumstances, it controls. I do not see how it is possible that the mode in which it is ascertained can affect its nature or effects. It is true that there are some things which are required to be in writing, as, for example, a contract for the sale of land, which have no efficacy unless so expressed; but this is not of that class." In Navassa Guano Co. v. Richardson, 26 S. C. 401, 2 S. E. 307, the mortgage was held to be merged by the acceptance of the mortgagee of the mortgagor's interest, on the ground that there was not only no proof of an express agreement against merger, as in Agnew v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. supra, but not a word of evidence tending to show any intention against it.

While in this case the statement of the controlling influence of intention, quoted from Jones on Mortgages and Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, seems to be recognized, it is held to have no application to the case of a mortgagee taking a conveyance of the land as a satisfaction of his mortgage, for the reason that the mortgagee in this state has no estate in the land, but a lien upon it, and anything he takes in satisfaction is payment, though it may prove afterwards valueless in his hands. The case therefore rests on the absence of proof of intention that the mortgage should not be satisfied, and on the nature of a mortgage under our statute law. In Bleckeley v. Branyan, 26 S. C. 424, 429, 2 S. E. 319, referring to the satisfaction of a mortgage by merger, the court says: "On account of this seeming hardship, it has been held that the mortgagee, thus purchasing the equity of redemption, may set up the prior mortgage against subsequent encumbrances, if the parties at the time of the transfer intended and covenanted to prevent merger and to keep the mortgage open. See Agnew v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. supra, and authorities. So that the real question in this case is whether the facts as to the intention of the parties bring it within the principle announced in the case of Agnew v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. supra." It is then held that there was not only no evidence of intention to keep the mortgage open, but that the facts led to a contrary conclusion. It is true in this case the court said: "We cannot venture to go further in relieving a mortgagee who purchases the mortgaged property than was indicated in the case of Agnew v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. supra." But this clearly did not mean that there must be present the precise facts of Agnew v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. in order to prevent merger, for what was indicated in that case was the principle that merger would be prevented by an intention that it should not occur, either expressed or implied, because the interest of the mortgagee required it. In Agnew v. Renwick, 27 S. C. 562, 573, 4 S. E. 223, Mr. Justice McIver uses this language: "Where parties have taken the precaution to protect themselves against the operation of the general rule, by an express covenant to that effect, they then bring themselves under the exception recognized in Agnew's Case, beyond which this court has said it will not venture to go; but where no such precaution has been taken, then the case must fall under the operation of the general rule." This cannot be regarded as having the force of stare decisis, for the reason that it is stated in the opinion it would be difficult, if not impossible, to find any evidence of intention to keep the mortgage open, and for the further convincing reason that a reference to the case will show the conclusion might well be sustained on other grounds, and the majority of the court concurred in the result only.

Up to this point, therefore, it cannot fairly be said the court ever adjudged that the intention would not control, unless evidenced by an express agreement in writing. On the contrary, the tendency was to regard the fact of the intention controlling in whatever way it might be indicated. But in the second appeal, in Bleckeley v. Branyan, 28 S. C. 445, 6 S. E. 291, the court was unanimous, and it is there said to be settled in this state that "a mortgagee who buys the estate under mortgage not under process of foreclosure of his lien extinguishes the debt or claim, with lien on the land," and that the only exception to this rule is the one recognized in Agnew v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. 24 S. C. 18, 58 Am. Rep. 237, whereby the mortgagee may, by express agreement in writing, protect himself from such a result." There is a dictum to the same effect in Parker v. Parker, 52 S. C. 382, 29 S. E. 805, but, so far from the result of the case resting on that ground, it was decided that the mortgage remained open. While the case of Michalson v. Myrick, 47 S. C. 297, 25 S. E. 162, rests mainly on the ground that merger did not take place because the deed from which it was claimed to result was held to be absolutely void for fraud, yet the court, by a dictum, gives sanction to the controlling effect in equity of intention, either expressed or implied. The precise question was involved, however, in Lipscomb v. Goode, 57 S. C. 182, 35 S. E. 493, and an intention to keep the mortgage open was implied, because it was to the interest of the mortgagees that it should not be satisfied, and it was held there was no merger. Powell v. Patrick, 64 S. C. 190, 41 S. E. 894, is to the same effect. In Glenn v. Rudd, 68 S. C. 102, 102 Am. St. Rep. 659, 46 S. E. 555, the difficulty is pointed out of reconciling the cases in this state which intimate that to prevent merger an express contract against it is necessary, and those which hold the contract against it is sufficiently shown by proving the intention, and that the intention will be implied when the interests of the party against whom the merger is claimed require it. But the single point decided was that an agreement to keep the mortgage open after conveyance of the property to the mortgagee need not be in writing and incorporated in the deed of conveyance.

From this review we think it clear the later cases in this state establish the proposition, which, as we have seen, is in accord with the doctrine universally recognized in other jurisdictions, that in equity at least merger will not take place if opposed to the intention of the parties, affirmatively proved, or to be implied from the fact that merger would be opposed to the interest of the person in whom the different estates or interests became united. It is argued, however, that, though in equity an intention that it shall not take place may prevent merger, at law, whenever the greater and lesser estate coincide in the same person without any intermediate estate, the rule that merger takes place is inflexible, and entirely unaffected by the intention; that is to say, that if in this case Mrs. McCreary had made, and Hunter had accepted, a deed to the life estate, accompanying the execution with the most explicit expression of an intention on the part of both of them that merger should not result to the destruction of the contingent remainder, the life estate nevertheless would have been merged and the contingent remainder destroyed. It will hardly be thought that any such difference "at law" and "in equity" can be rested on a difference between the jurisdiction and practice of courts of law and courts of equity. If this supposed distinction ever had such a foundation, it has been taken away by the adoption of the reformed procedure. Pom. Code Remedies, §§ 94-103. The court on its law side will recognize and enforce equitable rights wherever they are necessarily involved in the decision of a legal issue. For example, if A, in a suit against B to recover possession of land, proves his own title, and B shows a deed from A for the land in dispute, this would be a complete bar to A's recovery; but, if A then proves the deed to B was intended as a mortgage and the debt had been paid, he would still have the right to recover possession, and it makes no difference whatever whether we call his right legal or equitable. So if, in an action to recover possession of land, the title of the plaintiff depends upon an alleged merger, if the merger could be held by a court of equity not to have taken place because contrary to the intention, the plaintiff could not recover.

If it is contended the supposed distinction is founded on the difference between equitable and legal estates and interests, we can find no authority which compels us to recognize it. Indeed the doctrine that merger at law will take place without respect to the intention seems rather to have been taken for granted by the courts of equity than established by the decisions of the courts of law. The statement that at law the intention of the parties can have no effect seems to be founded on Compton v. Oxenden, 2 Ves. Jr. 261, and Forbes v. Moffatt, 18 Ves. Jr. 384; the lord chancellor in the former case using this language: "It is a clear principle, both at law and in equity, that, where there is a confusion of rights, where debtor and creditor become the same person, there can be no right put into exertion; but there is an immediate merger. But it is true in equity, though there may be that which, if all was reduced to a legal right, would of necessity operate as a merger, this court, acting upon the trust, will, on the intent, express or implied, preserve them distinct, and that confusion of rights will not take place." Similar expressions will be found in Smith v. Roberts, 91 N. Y. 470; Bassett v. O'Brien, 149 Mo. 381, 51 S. W. 107, and our own cases of Agnew v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co.; Michalson v. Myrick; and Lipscomb v. Goode,—supra, and other modern cases. But these expressions have the weight of dicta and nothing more, for in all the cases in which they are found the rule of equity, and not the rule of law, was involved and under discussion; and we have been able to find no law case in which it was adjudged that merger had taken place or would take place at law though opposed to the intention of the parties as established by the evidence. There is high authority against the existence of such rigidity in the rule of merger at law as is stated in the equity cases to which we have referred. "The intention is considered in merger at law, but it is not the governing principle of the rule, as it is in equity; and the rule sometimes takes place without regard to the intention, as in the instance mentioned by Lord Coke." 4 Kent, Com. *102. So far as we can discover, there is no reference to Coke on Littleton, where the general doctrine of merger is laid down, as to the effect of intention. In Fink's Appeal, 130 Pa. 256, 18 Atl. 621, it was held where a widow holds dower, which is a legal interest, in lands, the fee to which descends to her by the death of her son, merger of the two estates becomes a question of intent, and cannot take place against the wishes of the widow, and will not be presumed against her interest. To the same effect is McLeery v. McLeery, 65 Me. 172, 20 Am. Rep. 683, where it is said the tendency in the courts has been to admit and apply the same principle in law and in equity. It is true, in Youmans v. Wagener, 30 S. C. 302, 3 L.R.A. 447, 9 S. E. 106, it was held that the widow's dower was merged when she acquired the fee, but there was no proof of a contrary intention, and no reference to the effect of intention. In Flanigan v. Sable, 44 Minn. 417, 40 N. W. 854, the action was on prom-issory notes, and on the question of merger the court says: "The distinction in practice between law and equity having been abolished, and both legal and equitable remedies being now administered by the same court, and in the same action, there is no reason why the rule at law, which was merely technical, should obtain in any case; but the equity rule should always be applied, regardless of the form of action." It is said in 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 590: "This distinction appears of waning importance, as now in the main the equitable doctrines of merger have superseded the legal doctrines even in courts of law." Id. 591, 595; note to James v. Morey, 3 Sharswood & B. Am. Law of Real Prop. 236.

From the inception of the rule that merger would take place and the contingent remainder thereby defeated when the owner of the fee acquired the preceding particular estate, an exception was allowed when the will itself gave the particular estate and the fee to the same person, for the reason that to apply the rule in that case would defeat the intention of the testator. Fearne, Contingent Remainders, 340-344; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 638, 639. The same exception was applied to a deed to avoid defeating the intention of the grantor in Burton v. Barclay, 7 Bing. 745. Since the law holds it to be practically possible for one person to be the owner of a separate life estate and of the fee at the same time, though this is technically impossible, in order to save the contingent remainder and thus give effect to the intention of the testator or grantor, as expressed in the will or the deed, it would be difficult to find any sound reason against giving a like effect to the common intention of the separate owners of the life estate and of the fee simple, when the owner of the fee acquires the life estate. The whole doctrine of merger is founded on the reasoning that it is technically impossible for a man to hold a valid charge on property which he himself owns, or a life estate in lands to which he has a fee-simple title. If the technical argument may be overcome for the sake of the intention in one case, it would be difficult to find just reason to disregard the intention in the other. To do so without reason would be a reproach to the administration of justice. Obviously nothing but precedent from which there is no escape would justify the establishment of one rule as to merger as equitable and another as legal. The tendency of the law is to conform to equity. "Since the doctrines of equity began to react upon the law, and especially since the impulse given by the brilliant career of Lord Mansfield, the common-law courts have consciously adopted and applied, as far as possible, purely equitable notions—not so much the technical equity of the court of chancery, but the principles of natural justice—in their decision of new cases, and in the development of the law, until a large part of its rules are as truly equitable and righteous in their nature as those administered by the chancellor." 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 69.

We conclude there is no controlling authority that the intention is not to be regarded in an issue of law or as to legal estates; but, on the contrary, the tendency of modern authority is to regard the intention controlling at law as well as in equity. There is certainly no reason to be found for any distinction. It is not necessary in this case to decide whether "in law" the intention against merger is to be implied from the fact that it would be contrary to the interest of the party in whom two estates are united for one to be merged in the other, for, assuming that the burden is on the plaintiffs to affirmatively prove the intention against it, we think such intention is clearly established by the evidence, and nothing was offered to disprove it.

No deed from Mrs. McCreary to Morris Hunter was offered in evidence; defendant's claim that he acquired the life estate of Mrs. McCreary being based entirely on proof of possession. Mr. Peter A. Brunson, a witness of the highest respectability, testified that Morris Hunter was in possession of the land in 1835 claiming it as his own. It is impossible, however, that he was making any such claim against Mrs. McCreary at that time, for he writes to her on February 20, 1836, about the land, referring to it as "your land." In addition to this, the will directed him and the other executors to "retain and manage" the land for Mrs. McCreary, then Miss Coleman, until "she arrives at the age of twenty-one years or marriage," and there was no proof of any notice to her of adverse holding. Floyd v. Mintsey, 7 Rich. L. 181. When Hunter went into possession, therefore, in 1835, he held it for Mrs. McCreary, and his subsequent holding would be regarded permissive without proof to the contrary. The witnesses, James G. Hutchinson and Albert Sawyer, say they knew of his possession, but testify nothing of the claim under which he held. The defendants' claim of adverse possession by Morris Hunter against Mrs. McCreary therefore rests on the evidence of Henry Perkins and H. L. Poston, and they cannot take the benefit of this evidence without its qualification. Both these witnesses say Hunter was in possession claiming only the life interest of Mrs. McCreary, saying the "heirs were out west," clearly referring to the children of Mrs. McCreary, plaintiffs in this action. The proof was plenary and undisputed of declarations to the same effect made by Thomas P. Lide, who was afterwards in possession under a sheriff's deed purporting to convey the interest of Hunter; and as late as 1885 the defendant A. C. Coggeshall wrote Mrs. McCreary, saying: "I own a part of your lifetime interest in a tract of land in this county, which was sold to Mr. Thos. P. Lide in 1858 by the sheriff to satisfy a claim of Mr. Hopkins P. Charles against Maurice W. Hunter, Esq. I would like to either buy the interest of your heirs or sell them mine. . . . I would like for them to make me an offer to either buy or sell." Even if there had been testimony which left something to go to the jury as to the intention of Morris Hunter, this could not help defendants, because the claim of title in him acquired by possession adverse to Mrs. McCreary is without support, and therefore the life estate did not merge in the fee while he held the fee. His possession could not have begun to be adverse until after his letter to Mrs. McCreary, dated February 20, 1836, in which he acknowledges her title and right. Before this date, on December 30, 1835, Mrs. McCreary, née Coleman, was married and remained under the disability of coverture until 1861, four years after the death of Morris Hunter. The law will not presume a deed from her while under this disability. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 316. Nor could title be acquired against her by adverse possession. Jones v. Reeves, 6 Rich. L. 132. If Thomas P. Lide acquired the fee by his purchase of Morris Hunter's interest at sheriff's sale, and he and his successors in possession acquired the life estate of Mrs. McCreary by adverse possession or presumption of a deed from her, this possession was accompanied and qualified by the statement that the contingent remainder of the plaintiffs was unclaimed and unaffected. If Hunter or any of his successors who had acquired his fee in the land had claimed under a deed from Mrs. McCreary, expressly stipulating the contingent remainder should not be destroyed by its execution, this beyond doubt would be an expression of intention against merger, because by merger the remainder would necessarily have been destroyed; and, when the claim to the life estate is based on adverse possession accompanied by a declaration that the contingent remainder was unaffected, the result cannot be different.

The charge that merger did not take place and the contingent remainder was not defeated, was right, not for the reason stated 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

by the circuit judge, but because it was the understanding and intention of all parties concerned that there was no merger, and that the contingent remainder-men should have the land upon the death of the life tenant. Before ending the discussion of this point, it may be well to say that, if any of the grantees claiming under Morris W. Hunter had acquired the land without knowledge of the intention that there should be no merger, and relying upon the rule that ordinarily in such conditions the life estate is merged and the contingent remainder destroyed, a very different question would have been presented.

3. The defendants objected to the introduction of a letter from Morris W. Hunter to Mary A. McCreary, dated 20th February, 1836, offered as an admission by him that he had not acquired her life estate, on the ground that the genuineness was not proved. The letter was an ancient document and required no proof. 1 Elliott, Ev. § 421. It was found among the papers of Mrs. McCreary, the addressee, nearly seventy years after it was written, and to solve any doubt of its genuineness it was competent to introduce for the purpose of comparison the records of the ordinary's office, presumably written by Hunter, the incumbent of that office. It is said in Cantey v. Platt, 2 M'Cord, L. 261: "When a writing is offered in evidence, so antiquated as to render it difficult, if not impossible, to produce a witness who had ever seen the person write, whose signature is attached to the writing, justice would be defeated if a comparison of handwriting were not permitted. In the case of Allesbrook v. Roach, 1 Esp. 351, the jury were allowed to examine papers admitted to be the party's handwriting to compare them with the writing in question, and to draw their own conclusions. And in the case of Roe ex dem. Brune v. Rawlings, 7 East, 279, the signature in an entry made by a person long since dead was allowed to be compared with another signature of the same person in a deed of settlement. So, also, where a parson's books were produced to prove a modus, the parson having been long dead, a witness who had examined the parish books, in which the same parson's name was written, was permitted to swear to the similitude of the handwriting. Bull. N. P. 236."

4. Objection was made also to the introduction of the record of a deed from Morris Hunter to Thomas Hunter, dated February 18, 1820, purporting to be probated before "George Bruce, U. Q.," on the ground that the letters "U. Q." did not indicate the official designation of any officer authorized at that time to take a probate. The statute of 1804 (5 Stat. at L. p. 479) enacted: "Clerks of the several courts of record of this state . . . shall be and they are hereby declared to be ex officio justices of the quorum." The letters here used no doubt signified unum quorum. The probate of deeds taken not long before and just after the execution of this deed purport to have been made before "George Bruce, Clerk of the Court and one of the Quorum ex officio." Aside from any proof on the subject, the court of common pleas could take judicial notice that George Bruce was its clerk, and ex officio justice of the quorum. A justice of the quorum was a magistrate and therefore authorized to take probates under the act of 1788 (7 Stat. at L. p. 247). The omission of his official title did not affect the validity of the probate. Carolina Sav. Bank v. McMahon, 37 S. C. 309, 16 S. E. 31.

5. The letter of A. C. Coggeshall to the life tenant, taken in connection with the several deeds, the parol evidence of successive possessions, and the admissions of those who successively held the land, was certainly evidence sufficient to justify the circuit judge in refusing to grant a motion for nonsuit made on the ground of a total failure to prove the locus in quo.

6. The motion for a new trial on "the ground that the verdict of the jury was against W. D. Coggeshall as well as A. C. Coggeshall, notwithstanding the plaintiffs proved that the said W. D. Coggeshall derived his title from one Thomas Rogers, a different source of title altogether from the title of A. C. Coggeshall, which might have been superior to the title of Mary Ann Coleman or these plaintiffs, and in no way connected therewith," was properly refused. There was evidence that Thomas Hunter and those who claimed under his will, subject to the rights of the plaintiffs, were in possession of the land for a much longer period than was necessary to establish the presumption of a good title against all the world. The right of the plaintiffs to recover possession against A. C. Coggeshall, the last of these successive holders under the will, necessarily embraced the right to recover against W. D. Coggeshall because any independent title he or his grantors may have held was acquired by the life tenant and those who held under her by the long stretch of successive possessions adverse to all the world except the plaintiffs, the contingent remainder-men.

The sixth exception was abandoned, and as to it no opinion is expressed.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

I. Generally.

The rule in equity is that this court will not take cognizance of a suit where the complainant has a plain and adequate remedy at law, unless in certain prescribed cases in matters pertaining to which courts of equity have always claimed jurisdiction, as fraud in the sale of real estate, suits for rescission, etc. There has attached to the jurisdiction of the courts of equity another line of cases growing out of the insolvency of the vendor, where the remedy at law would be fruitless. This unquestionably gives a court of equity jurisdiction to issue an injunction to restrain proceedings at law for purchase money where the title is defective; and, while the rule is well recog-spect such defect exists, or facts which establish nothing more than that the title is doubtful or unmarketable, will not support the application for an injunction.

Same—eviction of vendee.

3. Where a vendee has entered into possession of land under deed with covenants of general warranty, and, in an action of ejectment, a stranger asserts title to and recovers the land, and the vendee is evicted, equity will enjoin the collection of the purchase money due the vendor therefor, upon proper bill filed for that purpose.

Same—remedy at law.

4. At common law, the defense of failure of consideration could not be interposed, nor damages for a breach of warranty of title claimed by way of recoupment, against a sealed instrument. But while, under our statute, these defenses can nized, and is the solution of many of the cases, still many cases have stumbled over the decision of Johnson v. Gere, 2 Johns. Ch. 546, which held that, where an action of ejectment was brought against the vendee having a warranty deed, claiming adverse paramount title, the vendee was held entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money until the question of title was determined. In the same volume, at page 519, 7 Am. Dec. 554, is the case of Abbott v. Allen, which holds that, in the absence of fraud, insolvency, or eviction, the purchaser must look to his covenants in the deed. The Johnson Case has been criticized, and efforts have been made to explain it, in Banks v. Walker, 3 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 343, on the ground that the bill must have shown an absolute failure of title in the vendor. On the other hand, it is suggested in Miller v. Avery, 2 Barb. Ch. 582, that the reporter is mistaken in the statement of the case, or that the chancellor overlooked the fact that it was not alleged in the bill that the complainants even believed their title to the land was defective. Be that as it may, the case of Johnson v. Gere does not refer to Abbott v. Allen, supra, holding that, where there was no eviction or fraud, there would not be ground for an injunction; and courts have sometimes followed one, and sometimes cited the other. But it will be found that, except in a few cases, the jurisdiction has attached to equity by reason of the fact of fraud, insolvency, or nonresidence of the vendor.

A point emphasized in the Johnson v. Gere Case is that a suit in ejectment is held equivalent to an eviction. So, disturbance of the possession is held essential in some cases, and the term is often used, "purchaser in possession" will not be entitled to an injunction. This was the case in Harding v. Commercial Loan Co. 84 Ill. 251, where the grantee of a purchaser in possession was held not entitled to an injunction against the collection of a purchase-money trust deed given by his grantor, on the ground that the title of his grantor was defective in that one of the grantors therein was an in-

be made at law, yet where, but for the statute, equity would have jurisdiction, such equitable remedy is not taken away, because the remedy at law is given by statute.

A PPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Cabell County in favor of defendants in a suit to enjoin the enforcement of a bond for purchase money. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Wyatt & Graham for appellant.

Messrs. Simms & Enslow for appellees.

Sanders, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 21st day of June, 1883, M. B.

fant. The court said that, if suit had been threatened by the supposed claimant, it would be different. This case does not apply the rule laid down in Virginia to sales under deeds of trust.

In Virginia and West Virginia some cases, which must be considered as exceptional to the weight of authority elsewhere, follow the rule laid down in Johnson v. Gere, supra, that an injunction will be granted against the collection of purchase money on land where the purchaser is in possession under conveyance of general warranty deed, where the title is threatened by suit; and where it is clearly shown to be defective. This was held in HARVEY v. RYAN. But in that case, as in several other cases in those states, the vendor was insolvent, which in the HARVEY CASE was said to be "an additional reason for equitable interference."

In Heavner v. Morgan, 30 W. Va. 335, 8 Am. St. Rep. 55, 4 S. E. 406, which was an action for specific performance, the case of Johnson v. Gere, supra, was approved.

In Morgan v. Glendy, 92 Va. 86, 22 S. E. 854, the purchaser filed a bill for an injunction against collection of the purchase money on the ground of defective title, in that the property had been sold to the grantor by a purchaser under a deed of trust, and it did not appear that the interests of the cestui que trust had been canceled. The grantor in this case was insolvent. It was held that the lapse of twenty years had so cured the title that it was not shown to be so defective as to entitle the purchaser to an injunction. This case approved the doctrine "that a vendee in possession of land, under a conveyance with general warranty, may enjoin the collection of the purchase money on the ground of defect of title, if the title is questioned by a suit, either prosecuted or threatened, or if the purchaser can show clearly that the title is defective."

In Womensdorf v. O'Connor, 53 W. Va. 314, 44 S. E. 191, the deed to the grantor was set aside on account of his fraud in procuring the same. There was an eviction of the grantee. The grantor was insolvent, and the bill in equity by the purchaser for

Ryan, by deed with covenants of general warranty of title, conveyed to Robert T. Harvey a certain lot in the city of Huntington, in consideration of which Harvey executed his bond for $450, payable to Ryan. Ryan's grantor was one Andrew Griffith, who bought the lot of the Central Land Company. Harvey placed a dwelling upon this lot shortly after his purchase, and on the 23d day of December, 1885, John B. Laidley, claimant of the lot, instituted, in the circuit court of Cabell county, an action of ejectment for the recovery thereof, against Harvey's tenant, and, by an order of court, Harvey was substituted as defendant in the action. After the institution of the action of ejectment, Griffith, as assignee of Ryan, brought an action of assumpsit in the circuit court of Cabell county, on the note executed by Harvey to Ryan, whereupon Harvey filed his bill, setting up the facts of the purchase, the execution of the note, the pendency of the action of ejectment, and further alleging that, some time in the year 1882, John B. Laidley instituted an action of ejectment against the Central Land Company to recover possession of a certain tract of land in the city of Huntington, within which tract was included the whole of the lot in question, and that in said action the supreme court of this state decided that the acknowledgment of the grantor, in the deed to the Central Land Company, was defective, and that, in all probability, Laidley would be adjudged the lawful owner of the an injunction proceeded upon the theory that the grantor was insolvent, and on the fraud of the vendor in procuring his title. An injunction was granted, the court saying: "It is clearly settled law that, even where it is not the case of unpaid purchase money under an executory contract for the sale of land, but where a deed has been made, the purchaser will not be compelled to pay purchase money remaining in his hands, and looks to his warranty, where the grantor is insolvent and title defective."

In Thompson v. Catlett, 24 W. Va. 524, which was an action to foreclose a vendor's lien, and which held that the defendant was entitled to an abatement of the price on account of defective title, it was said: "Neither can it now be doubted that, if the title of the vendor to the whole or any part of the land sold be shown to be clearly defective, a court of chancery will, even after conveyance, with covenant of general warranty executed, and accepted by the vendee, who is in possession of the land thereby granted, grant relief to the vendee by enjoining the collection of the unpaid purchase money to the extent of the loss caused by such defect of title; but in such a case the burden of proof rests upon the vendee to show that the title derived from his vendor was clearly defective."

Among the exceptional cases is Renick v. Renick, 5 W. Va. 285, where a purchaser under a deed of general warranty from his father and mother held the land nine years. His mother had died, and he brought a suit alleging that his father had only a life estate, and that the title was in the wife and had descended to many infant heirs, and that the deed, through defective acknowledgment and certificate, was void as to her. No fraud, concealment, or insolvency was charged. It was held that the purchaser was entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase-money bonds in the hands of an assignee. The court said: "Under the peculiar circumstances of this case, I think it would be unreasonable to restrict the vendee to his covenant of general warranty, and compel him, with the admitted defect and failure of title, to discharge the whole of his purchase money, and to risk the hazard of the solvency of his vendor's estate after his decease."

So, holding that failure to get possession, or interference with the possession, is the material question, it was held, in Williams v. Williams, 94 Ga. 627, 20 S. E. 108, where the vendor's wife was in possession of the land under a decree of divorce, that the purchaser was entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money. In this case the vendor had assigned to the purchaser a bond for reconveyance on assuming a prior loan made to the vendor, and the purchaser had received a quitclaim deed from the lender on paying the loan.

In Virginia injunctions against sales of land under deeds of trust are also treated as peculiarly within the jurisdiction of a court of equity.

A vendee in a warranty deed made a deed of trust to secure the purchase money. It was held that where the title was doubtful an injunction would be granted against the sale of the land, or such part as to which the title was in doubt. Miller v. Argyle, 5 Leigh, 460. The court said: "The case, it must be observed, is not that of an injunction to a judgment at law. It is an injunction to a sale under a deed of trust, on the ground of defect of title. Now, a distinction has always been strongly drawn between these cases, for it never can be equitable to permit a sacrifice by sale under a doubtful title, though it may be but just that the vendor should be suffered to enforce a judgment for his purchase money, where the vendee is in possession, since the doubt about the title may eventually turn out to be frivolous and groundless. Accordingly, it has been decided that, if there is a cloud hanging over the title, or if the amount to be raised is uncertain, the sale should be enjoined. Lane v. Tidball, Gilmer (Va.) 130; Gay v. Hancock, 1 Rand. (Va.) 72. In this case the bill distinctly alleged the loss of 16½ acres of the land on the trial of a writ of right, and it also alleged a defect of title as to the 100 acres."

So, it was held that a sale under a deed lot in question. The bill, after alleging that Ryan and Griffith were nonresidents, and insolvent, prayed that an injunction might be awarded, restraining the prosecution of the action of assumpsit until the matter respecting the title to the lot was adjudicated, which injunction was granted. The action of ejectment brought by Laidley against Harvey was determined in September, 1900, it being ascertained by the final judgment entered therein that the plaintiff had an estate in fee simple in the lot, and that the value thereof, without improvements, was $450, and the value of the improvements made thereon by Harvey was $1,000. Laidley elected to relinquish his estate in the lot to Harvey, at the value ascertained. The parties to this suit having all departed this life, the same was revived in the name of and against the personal representatives of such respective deceased parties. On the 23d day of July, 1904, the executor of R. T. Harvey, deceased, filed an amended and supplemental bill, which, after adopting the allegations of the original bill, and stating the result of the determination of the action of ejectment, alleged that Ryan and Griffith, though often requested, had failed and refused to protect Harvey's title to the lot, and especially the improvements thereon, and that Harvey was compelled to and did pay the judgment, interest, and costs, which exceeded any sum which might be due on the purchase-money note; that Harvey paid said purchase money, interest, and costs through his

of trust given for the purchase money would be enjoined, in Gay v. Hancock, supra. In this case land was sold with a warranty, and a suit was then pending against the title, of which the purchaser had no knowledge at the time of purchase.

While many cases speak of the necessity of showing ouster or interference with possession, as giving equity jurisdiction, it will be found generally that in those cases that refused to entertain jurisdiction, the complainant did not allege either fraud, insolvency, or nonresidence of the vendor.

The general rule may be stated, that to restrain the collection of the notes given for the purchase money of lands, or to rescind the contract, by one in undisturbed possession under the contract of purchase, requires a very strong case. To authorize equitable interference, there must be fraud to mislead the party; or there must be insolvency in the vendor and a clear case of unquestioned outstanding paramount title exhibited to the court, which will be enforced; or the complainant must show nonresidence, so that the vendor is out of the jurisdiction of the court, or something analogous, which has been discovered since the contract, of equal dignity which will show that it would be inequitable to enforce the contract.

II. Fraud or concealment.

There appears to be no question but that in cases of defective title fraudulent misrepresentations as to the title, or the concealment of material facts by the vendor, where relied upon by the vendee, will be sufficient ground for an injunction against the collection of the purchase money. In most of these cases the vendor was insolvent. This is an additional ground for the exercise of equitable jurisdiction. In some of the cases a rescission of the contract of purchase was sought.

So, fraudulent misrepresentations as to title, quantity, and quality of land, made by the vendor, were held sufficient ground to enjoin a judgment at law for the purchase money, in Boyce v. Grundy, 3 Pet. 210, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

7 L. ed. 655. The court said: "It is not enough that there is a remedy at law; it must be plain and adequate, or, in other words, as practical and as efficient to the ends of justice and its prompt administration as the remedy in equity."

So, the fraud of a vendor in falsely representing that he had title when he had none was held sufficient for an injunction against the collection of the purchase money, and for the equitable jurisdiction of a suit for rescission, in Greenlee v. Gaines, 13 Ala. 198, 48 Am. Dec. 49. In this case the purchaser held by title bond, and the vendor's estate was insolvent.

And, false representation as to the use of the well was held sufficient ground for enjoining the collection of the purchase money to the extent of the cost of sinking a well on plaintiff's lot, in Elder v. Sabin, 66 Ill. 126.

In Fitch v. Polke, 7 Blackf. 564, the purchaser was held entitled to an injunction against a judgment for the purchase money, where the grantor was insolvent and had deceived the purchaser by false representations as to the title.

So, an answer making a cross petition for an injunction was held to be a good defense in an action for purchase-money notes, where it alleged that the vendor was insolvent and had fraudulently induced the purchase by representing that he had title, when he had none. Hinkle v. Margerum, 50 Ind. 240.

Fraud and false representations knowingly made as to the title, where the vendor was insolvent and nonresident, were held sufficient to sustain a cross petition, in an answer in a suit on purchase-money notes. Reed v. Tioga Mfg. Co. 66 Ind. 21.

And an injunction was held to be the proper remedy where the purchaser was induced to make the purchase by the fraudulent representations of the vendor as to title. Warren v. Carey, 5 Ind. 319. In this case the seller represented that the grantor had full title, when he had only three fifths, and the grantor had left the state.

False representations by the agent, in the presence of the vendor, as to the size of a attorney, Z. T. Vinson, who procured an assignment of the judgment from Laidley to himself; that after the death of Harvey, without the knowledge of his executor, the lot was advertised for sale under the order of sale entered in the action of ejectment, and sold, and purchased by Rufus Switzer, to whom Vinson had transferred the assignment from Laidley; that the Central Land Company, through its attorneys, had promised to save harmless all of its grantees in the property claimed by Laidley, but, the company failing to do so as to this lot, the executor of Harvey, at the March term, 1904, of the circuit court, procured an order to be entered showing that the judgment and costs in the action of ejectment had been paid, and the sale was thereupon set aside and the action dismissed. The amended and supplemental bill averred that Ryan and Griffith were both nonresidents, and died, insolvent, in the state of Ohio, and prayed that the injunction awarded R. T. Harvey be made perpetual, that the action of assumpsit be ordered dismissed, the bond canceled and surrendered, and for general relief. The administrator of Griffith and Ryan appeared and demurred to the original and amended and supplemental bills, and moved to dissolve the injunction and dismiss the suit, which motions the court sustained, and entered an order to that effect. From this order the executor has appealed.

The single question presented by the bill is whether or not equity has jurisdiction to lot agreed to be conveyed, affecting one half of the lot, were held sufficient for an injunction in favor of the purchaser against the collection of the purchase money. Lee v. Vaughan, Sneed (Ky.) 238.

And fraudulent misrepresentations of title, where the vendor had none, were held sufficient to authorize an injunction against the collection of purchase money, in Gill v. Corbin, 4 J. J. Marsh, 392.

And fraudulent representation by the vendor that he held by title bond, when he had none, was held sufficient ground for rescission by the purchaser, and for an injunction against the collection of the purchase money. Brannum v. Ellison, 58 N. C. (5 Jones, Eq.) 435. The purchaser was required to surrender possession.

Concealment of a material fact as to the title gives the court of equity jurisdiction, the same as fraudulent misrepresentation.

So, the suppression of the fact that the land had been sold for taxes was held to be sufficient cause for an injunction against a suit for the purchase money, where the purchaser held under a quitclaim deed. Houston v. Hurley, 2 Del. Ch. 247. This was on the ground of fraud.

The concealment from the purchaser, by the vendor, that he had no title to five sixths of the land, and the insolvency of the vendor, and his retaining possession, were held sufficient to authorize a rescission and an injunction against the enforcement of a mortgage given to secure the purchase money, in Liddell v. Sims, 9 Smedes & M. 596. In this case the purchaser was an ignorant man, and relied on the honesty of the vendor.

So, the knowledge by the vendor of a fact which made his title invalid, and the concealment of the same from his vendee, were held sufficient for an injunction against the collection of the purchase money, in Johnson v. Pryor, 5 Hayw. (Tenn.) 243.

A vendor concealed the fact that he had no title when he gave a title bond. The purchaser was held entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money on the ground of fraud. It was further held that he was entitled to a rescission, although the vendor offered to perfect the title at the time of the decree. Topp v. White, 12 Heisk. 165.

The giving of a title bond by a vendor without disclosing that his title was also by title bond, and that $1,000 was unpaid, was held a fraud on the purchaser, and entitled him to an injunction against a judgment for purchase money, where the vendor was insolvent. Ingram v. Morgan, 4 Humph. 66, 40 Am. Dec. 626.

III. Where purchaser held by title bond.

The rights of a purchaser holding by title bond are generally recognized as different from those holding under a deed. So, it is held that a purchaser having a bond for title will not be required to pay the purchase money if the vendor is unable to make a good title. The question of the solvency of the vendor does not seem to be material; and relief by injunction is generally granted to the holder of a bond for title where the title is defective, and where the purchaser has not assumed all risk as to the title. The exceptional cases are where tender by the purchaser is required, and where the contracts of the vendor and vendee are held to be independent of each other.

A vendor gave a title bond for a deed, and the purchaser gave a bond for the purchase money. It was held that the purchaser was entitled to an injunction against a judgment for the purchase money on a bill charging that the vendor could not make any title. Brittain v. McLain, 41 N. C. (6 Ired. Eq.) 165. The court said: "A court of equity will not compel a purchaser to take a doubtful title. He has a right to have the title brought into court, and a reference to the clerk, if he so chooses, to examine and report upon it. This the defendant has not done, and we do not consider him entitled to force the purchase money from the plaintiff, and to throw him upon the uncertain security of his bond to make a conveyance. He is not compellable, grant the relief sought, or whether the plaintiff should be relegated to his remedy at law. To determine this question it will be necessary to know when equity will enjoin the collection of purchase money due the vendor, when the contract has been fully executed by a conveyance to the vendee, with covenants of general warranty of title. When we have determined this question, the facts will be found to be of easy application. The authorities in the different states are clearly at variance as to when a court of equity will intervene and grant such relief. "It is exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, by any process of generalization, to deduce from the decided cases principles of general application which shall serve as rules for the guidance of courts and practitioners." 1 High, Inj. § 382. While such conflict exists, yet it is the well-established, if not the universal, rule, that a court of equity will grant such relief in cases of fraud or mutual mistake, or where the covenantor is insolvent, or a nonresident, or where to permit the collection of the purchase money will result in irreparable injury to the vendee. In this state, and in Virginia, injunctions have been granted against proceedings to collect purchase money, when there is a complete failure of title, though the vendee is in the undisturbed possession of the property, and the vendor is neither insolvent nor a nonresident, and though no suit by the real owner against the vendee has been prosecuted or threatened. Maupin on Marketable in equity, to part with his money, until the vendor has conveyed or offered to convey the land. This the defendant has not yet done."

Impossibility of performance was held to be sufficient cause for an injunction against a judgment for purchase money where the vendor had given a title bond, and his wife, in whom the title was vested, had died, and the vendor was insolvent. Williams v. Smith, 2 Root, 464.

And the purchaser, holding by title bond from an insolvent vendor, was held entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money where the vendor was unable to make title. Puckett v. Draper, 2 Baxt. 395.

So, where the vendor had no title, the purchaser was held entitled to a rescission and an injunction against the collection of the money due on the title bond. Johnson v. Siesfiell, 6 Baxt. 41. In this case the vendor sold to the purchaser 5,000 acres for $400, in 1870. The vendor's title rested upon the deed of the revenue collector for Washington county, who had reported the land for taxes and charges, $6, and sold by collector's deed July 1st, 1871, but stated in the deed as 8th June, 1871. The vendor was in embarrassed circumstances.

The failure on the part of the vendor, in a title bond, to secure the purchaser in the possession of the whole tract within the time agreed upon, was held sufficient to authorize an injunction against the collection of a judgment for the purchase money until the complainant should be allowed compensation for the part for which possession should not be given. Hillary v. Crow, 1 Harr. & J. 542. No question as to solvency appears to have been made, or reference to remedy at law.

So, where the vendor stipulated in his contract for deed that he would exonerate the land from the payment of legacies charged upon it, it was held that judgments obtained upon the bond for title should be enjoined until the title was perfected. Dorsey v. Smith, 7 Harr. & J. 345. The only question involved seems to have been the right of the purchaser to extinguish the legacy claims by purchase, and have a credit on his bond.

The vendor of a title bond mortgaged the property to other persons, and the mortgage was foreclosed and a deed made. The vendor obtained judgment on the title bond, and on this judgment obtained a decree in another state, attaching land. The purchaser brought a suit for a rescission, and an injunction was granted, and it was held that equity, having jurisdiction of the person of the complainants in the decree in the other state, would enjoin the enforcement of that decree. Buchanan v. Lorman, 3 Gill, 51.

And the purchaser was held entitled to an injunction against an action for the purchase money where the contract was an executory one, and the vendor had no title. Dorsey v. Hobbs, 10 Md. 412. The court said: "A vendee of an estate, in an unexecuted contract, is entitled to have that for which he contracts, before he can be compelled to part with the consideration he agreed to pay."

So, inability to remove encumbrances, and insolvency on the part of the vendor, where possession was not given to the purchaser, were held sufficient to entitle the latter to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money. Barton v. Rector, 7 Mo. 524. In this case the purchaser held under title bond; and the court makes a distinction between executory and executed contracts.

And, where the vendor in a title bond had no title, it was held that a judgment for the purchase money, for the use of an assignee, should be enjoined, in Welch v. Watkins, 2 N. C. (1 Hayw.) 369. The court said: "Had the prayer of this bill extended far enough, we would have made Pickett refund the money he has received."

And where the pleadings in an injunction suit showed that the vendor had not a good title as required by a title bond, it was held that the injunction should stand continued, although he proposed to obtain such title as the court might direct. Moore v. Cook, 4 Hayw. (Tenn.) 84. In this case the vendor had title to only one half of the lot sold, and offered a deed from the holder

Title to Real Estate, 795, says: "The doctrine that the covenantee may retain the purchase money . . . without suit prosecuted or threatened by the real owner, and with a solvent covenantor to make good the damages when a substantial breach of the covenants has occurred, has received little, if any, recognition without the states of Virginia and West Virginia, where it prevails. It is there rested upon the ground that the covenantee has no remedy at law, there being no right of action on the covenant affirmatively or negatively by way of recoupment or equitable set-off, until an eviction occurs. Hence, it appears that in those states there may be a condition of the title which would justify an injunction against the collection of the purchase money, and yet would not support the defense of recoupment or set-off at law." The doctrine is now well settled, both in this state and in Virginia, by a long line of well-considered decisions, beginning early in the jurisprudence of this state of Virginia, and followed in this state, that the collection of the purchase money will be enjoined when the vendee is in possession under deed with covenants of general warranty of title, and when the title is questioned by suit, prosecuted or threatened, or where the title is clearly shown to be defective; but this doctrine has been extended farther in these states than in any other jurisdiction. It is said by Judge Green, in Ralston v. Miller, 3 Rand. (Va.) 49, 15 Am. Dec. 704:

of the other half to the purchaser; but it was held that he was entitled to a warranty with covenants from his vendor.

In Buchanan v. Alwell, 8 Humph. 516, a purchaser holding under a title bond was held to have a right in equity to resist the payment of the purchase money, or to a rescission, on the ground of defect of title in the vendor. This was held without regard to the right on the ground of fraudulent concealment, which existed in this case, and although there had been no threatened suit or eviction.

A devisee under a will sold his land by title bond. The widow renounced the will and claimed dower, and an after-born child came in for his share, thus affecting the title. It was held that the purchaser was entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money until the estate was determined. Price v. Browning, 4 Gratt. 68.

And where an injunction was prayed against the collection of a judgment on a title bond for the purchase money, on the ground of no title in the vendor; and the defendant answered that he had perfect title,—it was held that the defendant should set out his title, so that the court could determine whether he could make title or not. Moredock v. Williams, 1 Overt. 325.

So, in a bill for injunction against judgments for purchase money, where the purchaser holding a title bond alleged that the vendors had no title, and called on the defendants to disclose their title in their answer, it was held that the defendants must show a good title, otherwise the plaintiff would be entitled to the relief prayed. Vititoe v. Jones, 6 J. J. Marsh, 516. The court said that there is a difference between a suggestion that the title is defective and an allegation that the vendor has no title.

The inability of the vendor to convey title to land that he had contracted to sell was held sufficient cause for an injunction against a judgment at law, to be continued until title should be perfected, in Fishback v. Williams, 3 Bibb, 342.

But the failure of the purchaser to make an unconditional tender of the purchase money was held sufficient ground to refuse an injunction, in Morris v. Continental Ins. Co. 116 Ga. 53, 42 S. E. 474. In this case the purchaser demanded a deed in accordance with his title bond, and, on failure to receive the same, applied for an injunction.

In Coleman v. Rowe, 5 How. (Miss.) 460, 37 Am. Dec. 164, the purchaser's contract to pay was independent of the covenant of the vendor in a bond to make title. It was held that the purchaser was not entitled to an injunction against a judgment for purchase money, where his possession was undisturbed, and no eviction had occurred, and there was no fraud and no proof of an outstanding title. In this case the vendor was solvent.

IV. Insolvency or nonresidence of vendor.

The insolvency or nonresidence of the vendor is held to be sufficient ground, in equity, for an injunction in favor of the purchaser, where the title is defective, and where the purchaser did not assume all risk. In some cases a rescission was decreed, in others an abatement of the purchase price.

So, in Jones v. Waggoner, 7 J. J. Marsh. 144, the insolvency of the vendor was held to confer jurisdiction in equity, to enjoin a judgment for the purchase money, and to decree a set-off against the judgment at law of damages growing out of the breach of covenant for title.

And in Markham v. Todd, 2 J. J. Marsh. 364, an injunction against the collection of the purchase money was held to be the proper remedy, where the grantor was insolvent and the title was defective. But it was held that the pleadings should be amended, and that complainant must elect whether he would rescind or plead an equitable set-off.

In Simpson v. Hawkins, 1 Dana, 305, it was said: "The relief granted by the court is, we think, to say the least, premature. If granted at all in this case, it should be when it is shown that the defendants have suffered an eviction, or what shall be

"This court has, in favor of purchasers, gone far beyond anything which has been sanctioned by the courts of chancery in England or elsewhere, in enjoining the payment of the purchase money after the purchaser has taken possession under a conveyance, especially with general warranty. Yet, it has never gone so far as to interfere unless the title was questioned by a suit either prosecuted or threatened, or unless the purchaser could show clearly that the title was defective." And this was quoted with approval by Judge Green, of this state, in Wamsley v. Stalnaker, 24 W. Va. 223, and, continuing, he said: "This is the view which, according to my understanding of the case, has been followed in Virginia and West Virginia, when the vendee was protected by a warranty of title, and had not been evicted."

The case of Wamsley v. Stalnaker is a leading case, giving a review of several of the Virginia decisions upon this subject, which proceed upon the theory that the purchaser should not be required to pay the purchase money where he is in great danger of losing the property. He is not required to take the hazard of the future insolvency of his vendor. No right of action would exist in favor of the vendee until a breach of the covenant, and, it being a covenant of general warranty of title, the breach would not occur until actual or constructive eviction. In discussing the question, Judge Green says that Judge Tucker, in Koger v. Kane, 5 Leigh, 608, questions the right to equivalent thereto. We think that in cases like this, where the vendors are alleged to be insolvent, and there are just grounds for fearing an eviction, the chancellor may interpose, and suspend the payment of the purchase money, although the vendor has executed the contract on his part by a conveyance. But whenever he does, if there has been no eviction at law, we regard it as indispensable that all parties interested should be brought before the court, when the chancellor should settle their respective rights; and if, in doing this, he finds it necessary to take the land from the vendee of the insolvent vendor, then he may secure the vendee, by setting off the damages occasioned by the loss of the land, against so much of the unpaid purchase money. This cause was not prepared under this view of the law."

In Fehrle v. Turner, 77 Ind. 530, the purchaser was held entitled to an injunction against the foreclosure of a purchase-money mortgage which included other lands, also, than the tract purchased, where there was a pending suit against the purchaser, and the grantor was insolvent. This case overruled Strong v. Downing, 34 Ind. 300, which held that an injunction should be denied where fraud was not alleged, and it was not alleged that the grantor was insolvent at the time of making the deed, or that the grantee did not know of his insolvency or nonresidency at that time. In this case the grantor was a resident of California, and suit had been brought against the grantee by parties claiming title.

And where the grantor was irresponsible it was held that an injunction should issue restraining the transfer of purchase-money notes, until the question of damages caused by loss of title to part of the tract conveyed was determined. McDunn v. Des Moines, 34 Iowa, 467.

And the insolvency of the grantor, who, having divested himself of title by a previous conveyance to his children, had conveyed by warranty deed, was held sufficient cause for an injunction against a judgment for purchase money. Walton v. Bonham, 24 Ala. 513.

An injunction was held proper where there was a warranty deed, but the vendor was insolvent and had no title to the most important tract conveyed, in Yonge v. McCormick, 6 Fla. 368, 63 Am. Dec. 214. In this case the vendee was in possession.

And where the grantor had warranted the title, and it was admitted that the title was defective, and there was great doubt as to the solvency of the vendor, the purchaser was held entitled to an injunction against a judgment for the purchase money. Jones v. Stanton, 11 Mo. 433.

An insolvent vendor sold lands by warranty deed where the title was clearly defective. The purchaser assigned, as purchase money, bonds held by him, given by another party. It was held that the purchaser was entitled to an injunction against their collection until the title should be cured or the value of that part ascertained to which the vendor had no title. Clarke v. Hardgrove, 7 Gratt. 399. The court said: "It not being incumbent upon the purchaser, in case of such clear defect of title, to risk the hazard of the vendor's solvency."

And a purchaser evicted by superior title was held entitled to an injunction against a suit on his purchase-money notes, where the grantor had covenanted that he was seised in fee simple, and the grantor's estate was insolvent. But he was held not to be entitled to an injunction against one of the notes assigned during solvency of the grantor, and the consideration of which was a lot, the title to which was good. Wray v. Furniss, 27 Ala. 471.

The purchaser under a warranty deed, having been evicted by a superior title from one of the tracts, was held entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money, where the vendor was insolvent, in Walker v. Johnson, 13 Ark. 522. Speaking of the right to a defense of partial failure of consideration, the court said: "Their right to this relief would not require a rescission of the contract, but would rest upon the ground of a partial failure of consideration; and this would have been available to them in equity, if not at law."

So, the purchaser, having lost part of the the remedy where there is a covenant of good title, because such a covenant would be broken the instant it is entered into, if the title should be defective. And Judge Green also says: "Judge Tucker bases this right of a court of equity to enjoin the purchase money, though there is a general warranty deed held by the purchaser, if the title is clearly shown to be defective, partly on the ground that on the general warranty the vendee could not sue at law till he was evicted, and seemed to regard it as doubtful whether such relief in equity would be given, if in the deed there were other covenants, which could be sued upon at law before eviction, as, for instance, a covenant for good title; but this point was not decided, nor do I know of its decision in any case in Virginia or in West Virginia. It would seem, therefore, that the extension of the right of a court of equity to enjoin the collection of the purchase money by the vendor because of defect of title, however clear, might, perhaps, be confined to the case when there was no other covenant but the covenant of warranty, and might not be recognized when there were also covenants on which the vendee could sue at any time at law, such as covenants of good title." But, in reviewing what Judge Tucker said in Koger v. Kane, supra, we find that he used this language: "The jurisdiction thus confessedly exercised by the courts of equity with us results from what may be called the preventive justice of those tribunals. It arrests the compulsory pay-land by an adverse claim, was held entitled to an injunction against the collection of part of the purchase money, where the vendor in a warranty deed was insolvent. Rawlins v. Timberlake, 6 T. B. Mon. 225.

But in Moredock v. Rawlings, 3 T. B. Mon. 73, an insolvent vendor gave a title bond, and then gave to the assignee of the bond a warranty deed. The assignor sued on his purchase-money notes. The purchaser sought an injunction against their collection on the ground of defect of title and loss of part of the land. It was held that the purchaser was entitled to a rebate for deficiency in quantity, but for defects in the title his remedy was against his warrantor, as the assignor would be liable to him only in case of failure to recover of the warrantor.

The nonresidence of the vendor is regarded in equity the same as insolvency, so as to give jurisdiction to enjoin the collection of the purchase money where the title is defective.

So, where the purchaser had accepted a deed, and acquired possession, the removal of the vendor from the state was held sufficient ground for an injunction against the collection of the purchase money, where the vendor had no title to a part of the land. But the decree should provide for an abatement of the price, or for a rescission. Wiley v. Fitzpatrick, 3 J. J. Marsh. 582.

And the purchaser was held entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money where the vendor in a warranty deed had no title and was a non-resident, and had no property in the state where the action was brought. Green v. Campbell, 55 N. C. (2 Jones, Eq.) 446. The court said: "The plaintiff is entitled to have a perpetual injunction as to a part of the purchase money; which part is to be ascertained by comparing the value of the land in dispute at the time of the purchase with that of the other tracts purchased by the plaintiff, the title to which is good, supposing the whole to be worth the amount mentioned in the deed; and, to ascertain this comparative value, there must be a reference."

A judgment for purchase money in favor of a nonresident vendor in a warranty deed, having no property in this state, was held properly enjoined where the title was defective, in Richardson v. Williams, 56 N. C. (3 Jones, Eq.) 116.

The insolvency or nonresidence of the vendor is held sufficient ground for an injunction in favor of the purchaser, where there is a prior lien existing against the property, which the grantor is bound to remove.

So, the purchaser was held entitled to an injunction against the foreclosure of a purchase-money mortgage where there were outstanding judgment liens exceeding the amount due against the grantor, who was insolvent. Arnold v. Curl, 18 Ind. 339.

And, where the grantor in a warranty deed was insolvent and dead, the purchaser was held entitled to an injunction against the collection of purchase money, where the estate sold was encumbered by a mortgage lien. Morrison v. Beckwith, 4 T. B. Mon. 75, 16 Am. Dec. 136.

A vendor executed a mortgage which was filed for record before a warranty deed made by him. The purchaser was not aware of the mortgage when he accepted the deed. The vendor sold the notes and died insolvent. It was held that the collection of so much of the last note as would pay the mortgage should be enjoined. Kyle v. Thompson, 11 Ohio St. 616. This mortgage was held to be an eviction pro tanto.

And where the grantor gave a quitclaim deed when he should have given a warranty deed, and there was a mortgage on the premises, it was held that the purchaser was entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money. Bowen v. Thrall, 28 Vt. 362. The court said: "The purchaser has a right to retain so much of the purchase money as is sufficient to secure him against the encumbrances on land, particularly where the grantor is insolvent, and no adequate remedy can be had on his covenants."

In Richardson v. Donehoo, 16 W. Va. 685, an injunction was granted in favor of a purchaser holding under a general warranty deed, against a sale of the land under a ment of the purchase money when the purchaser can show that there is either a certainty, or a strong probability, that he must lose that for which he is paying his money. It gives him the relief, too, though his demand may be in the nature of unliquidated damages, because he has no other means of ascertaining them. Thus, if the purchaser can show that he has received a deed with general warranty, and that the title is bad, yet, if he has not been evicted, he cannot maintain covenant at law and ascertain his damages before that tribunal, in order then to set them off against the demand. If, indeed, there are covenants of good title, etc., it may be otherwise; and so it may often happen that an action may be brought where there are such covenants of good title, etc., upon which the validity of the title may be tested, and the damages of the party ascertained. Whether in these cases relief could be given in equity, it is not necessary here to say." It will be observed that Judge Tucker says it is not necessary to decide this question, and from his language it would seem to be susceptible of the construction given by Judge Green, if this were all Judge Tucker said on the subject; but, continuing, he said: "But, where there is only a covenant of warranty, this cannot be done; and hence, I conceive, the party would be entitled to the assistance of a court of equity where he is full handed with proof that his title is defective, although he has not yet been evicted." This would seem to indicate that he thought, deed of trust given for the purchase money, on account of liens existing against the property. The liens were released before decree, and the injunction was dissolved. The grantor and trustee were nonresidents.

In Clark v. Cleghorn, 6 Ga. 225, where it was held that the apprehension of a lien against vendor's land was not well founded, it was said: "If the bill disclosed nothing more than that a title, with a covenant of warranty, had been made by the vendor to the vendee, in the absence of any fraud or other equitable circumstance, the argument would be entitled to consideration; but here the complainant alleges that the vendor resides without the limits of the state, and has no property, to his knowledge, within the state. This is an equitable circumstance which, in our judgment, entitles the complainant to maintain his bill, when taken in connection with the other allegations. The remedy on the covenant in the deed, against a nonresident who has no property in the state, would, to say the least, be very inadequate." The holding in this case was based on the denial in the answer, of the allegations in the bill.

V. Contract of vendor.

The purchaser is held entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money, where the title is defective, and the grantor has contracted to remove these defects as a condition precedent to the payment of the purchase money. In one case, the covenant against encumbrances having been broken by reason of existing liens, it was held that equity would take jurisdiction on the ground that the remedy at law was not as prompt or efficient as in equity.

Thus, a purchaser was held entitled to an injunction and rescission of the contract of purchase, where the contract provided that, if the title was not made, the notes were to be delivered up to the purchaser. The 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

bill alleged that the vendor was unable to make title. Black v. Bowman, 9 Ark. 501. The question of insolvency does not appear. The court said: "The power to enforce the specific execution of a contract (particularly in respect to real estate); to rescind a contract; to decree that outstanding deeds, and other contracts, be called in and canceled; to enjoin the collection of the purchase money until title is made,—has been so long recognized as within the appropriate jurisdiction of courts of equity as to render it unnecessary to refer to authorities."

A purchaser who bought by title bond, on representation that an indemnifying bond would be given to protect him against the claim of a third party, was held entitled to an injunction against an execution sale for purchase money, where the vendor had lodged a warranty deed for record and then levied on the land, and there was a suit pending by the third party claiming the land. Seago v. Bass, 49 Ga. 9. In this case the remedy at law on the covenants of the deed would not have availed, as the damages there would have been only the purchase money, while the breach of the bond would have been for damages and interest, including improvements.

And the collection of purchase money was held to be properly enjoined where the grantor had contracted to remove a previous encumbrance, had failed to do so, and was insolvent. Addleman v. Mormon, 7 Blackf. 31.

So, a contract of the vendor that the title was to be perfected before the purchase money was to be paid was held sufficient to entitle the purchaser to an injunction against an order of sale in favor of the vendor, where there was a prior mortgage existing on the land. Wade v. Percy, 24 La. Ann. 173.

An injunction against the collection of the purchase money was held proper where the purchaser was unable to obtain possession of the most valuable part of the farm purchased, containing the buildings and spring, which were held by an adverse claimant. Nelson v. Owen, 38 N. C. (3 Ired. Eq.) 175.

after eviction there would be stronger grounds for equity jurisdiction. And then, in Beale v. Seiveley, 8 Leig., 675, Judge Tucker says: "With us it cannot be denied that the practice has been more lax. But even with us relief is only given to a purchaser who had obtained his deed, where there had been an actual eviction, or where a suit is depending or threatened, or where the vendee, placing himself in the attitude of the superior claimant, can show a clear outstanding title or encumbrance."

But, even if that decision, in dealing with this question, did place it partly upon the ground that there is no breach of the covenant of general warranty until eviction, and, therefore, no right of action accrues to the vendee, still there is an additional reason why this remedy should be extended; that is, the remedy of the vendee, at law, is not adequate and complete. If the purchaser should be required to pay the purchase money, and the suit, prosecuted or threatened, should result in a total loss to him of the property, it would then be necessary for him to bring an action for breach of the covenant, while, in the meantime, the covenantor might have become insolvent. And this would also be true as to a vendee who had been evicted by reason of a superior title before the purchase money had been collected, because, while a right of action for damages would exist to the vendee upon the covenant, yet the defense would not be available to him in an action brought against him upon a writing

In this case the vendor orally agreed to oust the claimant, but failed to do so.

The vendor in a title bond covenanted under seal that he would not bring suit for the purchase money until the vendee could establish the title by a suit in a reasonable time. The purchaser brought suit, and it was held that prior patents conflicted, and that his title was defective. It was held that he was entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money. Bullitt v. Songster, 3 Munf. 55. There was no suggestion of insolvency of the vendor.

In Williams v. Neely, 69 L.R.A. 232, 67 C. C. A. 171, 134 Fed. 1, the covenant against encumbrances was held to have been broken as soon as made, and a court of equity had jurisdiction to enjoin a judgment for the purchase money in such a case. This was on the ground that the doctrine of recoupment was a good defense against the purchase money, but that "the adequate remedy at law which will deprive a court of equity of jurisdiction is a remedy as certain, complete, prompt, and efficient to attain the ends of justice as the remedy in equity."

In this case, the class of cases holding that until eviction in case of warranty the purchaser was not entitled to equitable relief, was distinguished, as in the Neely Case the covenant was broken at once, where there were encumbrances existing at the time of conveyance, and in the other cases the covenant was not broken until eviction.

See Dorsey v. Smith, 7 Harr. & J. 345, subd. III.

VI. Solvent vendors.

Equity will not intervene where there is a complete and adequate remedy at law. So, it is held that, where the grantor is solvent, the purchaser who seeks an injunction on account of defective title will be left to his remedy on the covenants of his deed, in the absence of fraud or concealment. In some of the cases, the expressions are used, "a purchaser in possession," and, "where there is no eviction," but it will be found that these cases generally turned 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) on the fact that there was amply remedy at law on the covenants of the deed by reason of the solvency of the vendor. But see exceptional cases, subd. I. "generally."

So, a purchaser under a warranty deed was held not entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money on the ground of defect of title, where no fraud, or eviction, or insolvency of vendor, was alleged. Abbott v. Allen, 2 Johns. Ch. 519, 7 Am. Dec. 554. No suit was pending against the title, and the purchaser had been in possession twelve years.

And where there was no eviction, and the vendor was solvent, and the alleged defects in the title were not specified, the purchaser in a warranty deed was held not entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money. The remedy was held to be on the covenants. Young v. Butler, 1 Head, 640. The court said: "And this is so if the covenants have been actually broken, unless the grantor is insolvent, in which event a court of equity may restrain him from proceeding to collect the whole amount due for the purchase money, and may offset the damages occasioned by the breach of the covenant of seisin, etc., against such unpaid purchase money."

In Merriman v. Norman, 9 Heisk. 270, it was said: "It is the settled law that when the contract is executed by conveyance, the complainant in possession under a deed with covenant of warranty of title, in the absence of fraud, eviction, or insolvency of the vendor, equity will not relieve by rescission, or by enjoining the payment of the purchase money for mere defect of title."

And a purchaser in possession under a warranty deed was held not entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money on the ground of defective title, where neither fraud nor insolvency on the part of the vendor was shown. Anderson v. Lincoln, 5 How. (Miss.) 279; Vick v. Percy, 7 Smedes & M. 256, 45 Am. Dec. 303.

A purchaser in possession was held not entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money on account of defects of title, where there was no diaobligatory, given for the purchase money. The writing being under seal, it imports consideration, and a defense of failure of consideration or want of consideration cannot be interposed to a writing under seal, at common law. Neither could the damages resulting from the breach of the covenant of warranty be relied on as a common-law counterclaim in the nature of recoupment, since the writing sued on is under seal. The supreme court of Virginia, in Columbia Acci. Asso. v. Rokey, 93 Va. 684, 25 S. E. 1010, says: "But, while a defendant, under the plea of nonassumpsit, might give evidence of matter by way of recoupment, or in diminution of the damages claimed by the plaintiff, even to the entire defeat of his action, yet it was not competent for the defendant to recover in that suit any damages he may have shown in excess of the damages of the plaintiff. If he wished to recover such excess, he could only do so in an independent action against the plaintiff. 4 Minor, Inst. pt. 1, 793, 798. Nor was it competent at common law, as against sealed contracts, to prove a failure in the consideration of the contract, or fraud in its procurement, or breach of warranty of title or soundness of personal property; but the defendant was driven, as when he proposed to recover against the plaintiff any excess of damages, to his independent action at law to recover the damages he had sustained. 4 Minor, Inst. pt. 1, 792; Taylor v. King, 6 Munf. 358, 8 Am. Dec. 746; Burners v. Keran, 24 Gratt. 42; and Hayes v.

turbance or eviction, and no suit pending, in Hile v. Davison, 20 N. J. Eq. 228. In this case there were full covenants of warranty. No reference was made to solvency.

And the possession by the purchaser under a warranty deed, and the solvency of the vendor, were held sufficient to prevent an injunction against the collection of the purchase money, in Wilkins v. Hogue, 55 N. C. (2 Jones, Eq.) 479. No suit had been brought or threatened; the bill showed that 36 acres of the best of the land were held by an older and superior title.

A purchaser in possession under a warranty deed from a solvent vendor, where no suit was threatened, was held not entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money, in the absence of a fraudulent concealment of defects in the title, which he had no means of discovering. Beale v. Seiveley, 8 Leigh, 658. The court held that, under a special warranty, the purchaser would be without remedy, except in case of fraud; that, under a general warranty, relief would be given only in cases of eviction; that, if a covenant of good title were given, it would be broken at once. The court said: "Accordingly, it is the established principle in the courts of equity in England that, if the conveyance has been actually executed, the purchaser can obtain no relief against the payment of the purchase money. He must look to his covenants; he has contracted for his remedy, and to that remedy he must resort. . . . To that rule there has recently been an admitted exception. Where the seller is aware of a fact from which a defect of title arises, and which the vendee had no means of knowing, the purchaser may either maintain an action at law for the deceit, or have a rescission of the contract itself, by an appeal to a court of equity. . . . With us it cannot be denied that the practice has been more lax. But, even with us, relief is only given to a purchaser who has obtained his deed, where there has been an actual eviction, or where a suit is depending or threatened, or where the vendee, placing himself in the attitude of the superior 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) claimant, can show a clear outstanding title or encumbrance."

In Wamsley v. Stalnaker, 24 W. Va. 214, the language in Judge Tucker's opinion in Beale v. Seiveley, 8 Leigh, 673, stating the exception to the English rule as quoted above, and the Virginia rule, was criticized, the judge saying: "In my judgment this conclusion drawn by Judge Tucker from this and other Virginia cases is inaccurate, and 'the rights of the vendee have, by the decisions both in Virginia and in West Virginia in numerous cases, been extended in equity beyond the covenants he has taken for his protection.' But I must say I am indisposed to extend these rights of the vendee in equity any further than I am compelled to do by the decided cases, which are binding authorities on us, or beyond such cases as come clearly within the meaning on which these cases must have been based. . . . They have generally been cases in which there was only a covenant of general warranty; and in Ralston v. Miller, 3 Rand. (Va.) 49, 15 Am. Dec. 704, Judge Green, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: 'This court has, in favor of purchasers, gone far beyond everything which has been sanctioned by the court of chancery in England or elsewhere, in enjoining the payment of the purchase money after the purchaser had taken possession, under a conveyance,—especially in the general warranty. Yet it has never gone so far as to interfere, unless the title was questioned by a suit, either prosecuted or threatened, or unless the purchaser could show clearly that the title was defective.'"

Where no insolvency of the vendor in a warranty deed was alleged, it was held that the purchaser was not entitled to an injunction against an execution sale for purchase money, although he alleged that the title had failed, in Allen v. Thornton, 51 Ga. 594. There was a good defense at law if the title had failed, or a remedy on the covenants.

In Wimberg v. Schwegeman, 97 Ind. 528, holding that, where a vendor was not insolvent, an injunction in favor of the purchaser should not be granted against the Virginia Mut. Protection Asso. 76 Va. 225. The object of the act of 1831 was to remedy these defects, and to enable a defendant both to make such defenses to a suit at law on specialties, and also to recover against the plaintiff any excess of damages he may have sustained, in order to settle in one suit all the rights of the parties arising under the contract, and to prevent circuity of action and a multiplicity of suits. Its object was to enlarge the right of the defense, and not to impair any previous right, or to take away such defenses where the law previously permitted them to be made." And in Kinzie v. Riely, 100 Va. 709, 42 S. E. 872, it is held that damages for breach of warranty could not be claimed at common law by way of recoupment, against a sealed instrument. Sterling Organ Co. v. House, 25 W. Va. 83; Williamson v. Cline, 40 W. Va. 194, 20 S. E. 917; Watkins v. Hopkins, 13 Gratt. 743. It will therefore be seen that, although there is a breach of the covenant of warranty in the deed from Ryan to Harvey, yet he cannot set this up as a defense in the action brought against him upon the purchase-money bond, but must rely upon his separate action for damages for a breach of the covenant, and, not being able to make this defense to the action of assumpsit, a court of equity will not require him to pay the money to the vendor, and compel him to resort to his action upon the covenant, and take the hazard of his vendor's insolvency. We fail to see the reason for such course. The title to the collection of the purchase money on account of defective title, the court said: "In holding that, where insolvency is alleged, the grantee may restrain the collection of the purchase money, we do not adopt a doctrine new to this court; for the principle upon which it rests was laid down long since in the cases of Fitch v. Polke, 7 Blackf. 564; Addleman v. Mormon, 7 Blackf. 31; Buell v. Tate, 7 Blackf. 55; Arnold v. Curl, 18 Ind. 339."

A vendor conveyed land in which his wife and the wife of his grantor had a potential right of dower. In a suit by the purchaser for an injunction against the collection of the purchase money, it was held that the solvency of the vendor would prevent an injunction on the ground of dower right in his grantor's wife. But, having promised to secure his wife's signature, which was obtained after this suit, it was held that the injunction should be dissolved without damages. M'Koy v. Chiles, 5 T. B. Mon. 259.

And a purchaser having covenants in his deed was held not entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money for defective title where insolvency was not shown, in Swain v. Burnley, 1 Mo. 404. The court said: "A court of equity, in a case of this kind, undoubtedly would have the right to interpose, by enjoining the money due on the judgment until a suit could be commenced and determined at law, upon the covenants in the deed; and, if there should be a recovery in such suit, might compel an offset. But it has no authority to take jurisdiction for the purposes of general relief, nor to grant a perpetual injunction. This court interfering merely in aid of and auxiliary to a proceeding at law, it is necessary that the complainant should show, in the first place, such facts as will induce their interference, such as the insolvency of the party who has the judgment, etc.; and, secondly, that the party, in order to continue the injunction, should show all proper diligence in prosecuting his remedy at law."

was held that the remedy of the purchaser should be by an action on the covenants of the deed, in Woodruff v. Bunce, 9 Paige, 443, 38 Am. Dec. 559. In this case the conveyance to the purchaser by one only of several executors was held to pass only a defective title; but it was suggested that a perfect title could be had. The court said: "As a general rule, where a contract to sell has been executed by an actual conveyance, a court of chancery will not rescind the contract on account of the mere defect of title, except in a case of fraud, but will leave the purchaser to his remedy upon the covenants in his deed. If the covenants have been actually broken, and the grantor is insolvent, a court of equity may restrain him from proceeding to collect the whole amount due for the purchase money, and may offset the damages occasioned by the breach of the covenants of seisin or of warranty against such unpaid purchase money."

Notice, being given at a public sale of defective title, but that the vendor would warrant the same, was held to preclude a purchaser at the sale from obtaining an injunction against the collection of the purchase money, where the vendor tendered a warranty deed, and there was no question made as to his solvency. Merritt v. Hunt, 39 N. C. (4 Ired. Eq.) 406.

In Platt v. Gilchrist, 3 Sandf. 118, it was held that a purchaser under a warranty deed was not entitled to an injunction against the foreclosure of a purchase-money mortgage on the ground that a suit was pending against the purchaser to establish a paramount title, where the grantor was solvent.

And the failure to allege insolvency of the vendor was held sufficient to defeat the remedy of injunction against collection of the purchase money, although the complaint alleged that the vendor had no title and induced the contract by fraud, and that the consideration had failed. Smith v. Short, 11 Iowa, 523. This was held to have constituted a defense that could have been made at law.

And the same ruling has been made where land has been adjudicated to be in Laidley, and Harvey has been ousted. The property for which the purchase-money bond was given has been totally lost to him, and there is no reason why a court of equity should not enjoin its collection. His legal remedy is wholly inadequate. He may pay the money, and then sue at law upon the covenant to recover it back, but this could not be a complete and adequate remedy. The vendor, in the meantime, may have become totally insolvent. This risk the vendee will not be compelled to accept, but equity will extend its aid and prevent the collection of the purchase money.

What we have said as to the defenses to a sealed instrument applies to the common-law doctrine, for, under our statute, § 5, there were liens existing against the property, and it was not shown that the vendor was insolvent or nonresident.

So, an injunction against the collection of a purchase-money judgment on account of judgment liens against the vendor was denied where the vendor tendered an indemnifying bond, and was able to satisfy any lien there might be against the property. Collins v. Clayton, 53 Ga. 649.

And, where the grantor was not alleged to be an insolvent or a nonresident, it was held that an injunction against the collection of the purchase money on the ground of outstanding liens should be denied. Crowfoot v. Zink, 26 Ind. 187.

A vendor, in a general warranty deed, covenanted "that the same shall not be subject to any liability from encumbrances thereon." There were judgment liens existing at the time of the conveyance. It was held that the purchaser was not entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money, where he did not show that the vendor had no other land sufficient to satisfy the judgments, or was insolvent. Wamsley v. Stalnaker, 24 W. Va. 214.

In Shannon v. Marselis, 1 N. J. Eq. 413, where it was held that different mortgagees were entitled to priorities and to protection in the order of their mortgages, it was said: "It is very evident that, if the amount of the mortgage money is raised from Carrick's property, and paid to satisfy the mortgage, Carrick can immediately recover it back by action on the covenant. There can be no good reason assigned why there should be this circuity of action; but a very good one why there should not,—which is, that the money might be lost to Carrick altogether, he having no security but the covenant. If Griffin was prosecuting at law on the bond, this court would certainly enjoin him, and compel him to appropriate the money so as to discharge the encumbrance against which he had covenanted, . . . [citing] Johnson v. Gere, 2 Johns. Ch. 546. . . . Where there is a mere allegation upon an outstanding title or encumbrance, the court will not interfere, but leave the party to his remedy on the covchap. 126, Code 1899, a defendant may plead failure of consideration, fraud in the procurement of the contract, or breach of warranty of title; but this is only concurrent with the equitable remedy, and by § 6 of the same chapter it is provided that such defense need not be interposed at law, and, if not so interposed, it can be availed of in equity. By this statute, it was not intended that the equitable remedy be taken away; but, on the other hand, it is expressly reserved. It was only intended to permit such defense to be made at law, at the election of the defendant. Therefore, if equity, before the enactment of this statute, had jurisdiction, it still has jurisdiction, notwithstanding a remedy by defense at law is given by statute. Knott v. Sea- nant; but where there is an eviction, or even an ejectment brought, it will interpose. In this case the first mortgagee is prosecuting his claim; the second one is before the court and asks to be paid what is due; and also the third. All parties are here, and justice can be done."

In Withers v. Morrell, 3 Edw. Ch. 560, it was held that a defendant could not prevent a foreclosure by alleging that as to part of the property conveyed the grantor had no title. But the court might refuse a personal judgment in personam against the mortgagor for the balance, and relegate the obligee to a suit at law. The court said that then the purchaser could file a bill for relief.

VII. Purchasers under quitclaim deeds.

It seems that the purchaser of a defective title will not be entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money where there is no warranty of title, or fraud or deceit.

So, where there was neither fraud nor eviction, a purchaser under a "special" warranty deed was held not entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money. Elliott v. Thompson, 4 Humph. 99 40 Am. Dec. 630. In this case the vendors offered to allow an abatement on the price pro tanto for the portion to which they had no title, and this was made the decree.

In Keyton v. Brawford, 5 Leigh, 39, holding that the contract of purchase was one of hazard as to the quantity, and disallowing an injunction for lack of title to a part, it was said: "Admitting the right of a party to enjoin the payment of purchase money, upon proving an actual outstanding superior title in another, which seems now to be the well-established principle of our courts (Ralston v. Miller, 3 Rand. [Va.] 44, 15 Am. Dec. 704), I am well satisfied that there is no such ground for relief in this case, because the vendor never contemplated selling that portion of land which lies within the boundaries claimed by the M'Knights."

mands, 25 W. Va. 99; Bias v. Vickers, 27 W. Va. 456; Jarrett v. Goodnow, 39 W. Va. 602, 32 L.R.A. 321, 20 S. E. 575; Kinzie v. Riely, supra. While some cases have been referred to to support the views herein expressed, yet, to demonstrate more conclusively that the rule is firmly fixed, and has been followed in this state since the question was first presented, it may be well to review other cases on this subject. In Womensdorf v. O'Connor, 53 W. Va. 314, 44 S. E. 191, it was held that where land was conveyed by deed with general warranty, and the vendee lost the land, that equity will enjoin the collection of the purchase money. Judge Brannon, in delivering the opinion of the court in this case, on page 316 of 53 W. Va., and page 192 of 44 S. E., says:

And where a grantee in a warranty deed sold to a purchaser by special warranty, it was held that an injunction would not be granted on the ground of defective title, in favor of the purchaser, against a judgment for purchase money; but injunction would be granted for deficiency in quantity. Koger v. Kane, 5 Leigh. 606.

A trustee under a deed of trust sold the land and conveyed by quitclaim deed. The purchaser, alleging that the title was defective as to part and that a dower interest existed as to all, was held not entitled to an injunction restraining the payment of the purchase money by the trustee to the cestus que trust. Sutton v. Sutton, 7 Gratt. 234, 56 Am. Dec. 109.

And, where the vendor in a quitclaim deed did not perpetrate a fraud on the buyer by concealing or knowing that the title to land purchased at execution sale by him was in other than the execution defendants, it was held that there was no cause for injunctive relief against a judgment for purchase money. Carrioco v. Froman, 2 Litt. (Ky.) 178. The fact that there were more heirs than the defendants in the execution sale, who were not parties, was held immaterial, where the complainant in the injunction suit alleged that none of the heirs had title.

See also Houston v. Hurley, 2 Del. Ch. 247, subd. II.; Williamson v. Raney, Freem. Ch. (Miss.) 112, subd. XI.; Latham v. Morgan, Smedes & M. Ch. 618, subd. XII.

VIII. Estoppel.

The purchaser of a defective title may, by estoppel, be precluded from obtaining an injunction against the collection of the purchase money; as where a bona fide holder of a purchase-money note buys the same on the representation of the maker that the same will be paid.

So, a holder of a title bond was held not entitled to an injunction against a judgment on purchase-money notes, although the land had been sold on an encumbrance existing at the time of his purchase, where the note was held by a bona fide holder who had bought the same on the purchaser's 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

"Counsel for O'Connor would impress upon us the law of actions upon a covenant of warranty; would treat this as if it were a suit by Womensdorf to recover back money paid upon the land under a breach of warranty. It is not such a suit. It is a suit to enable Womensdorf to keep in his hands purchase money for his indemnity. I should rather say, not for his indemnity, should he lose the land, but to be relieved from paying money for land already irrevocably lost to him." And in Bennett v. Pierce, 50 W. Va. 604, 40 S. E. 395, the same doctrine is announced, citing with approval Wamsley v. Stalnaker, 24 W. Va. 223. And in the case of Kinports v. Rawson, 29 W. Va. 487, 2 S. E. 85, we have: "Equity will enjoin the collection of the purchase money of land representation that it would be paid. McLain v. Coulter, 5 Ark. 13.

On the ground that the purchaser had a fund in his hands as a security, of which it would be inequitable to deprive him, it was held that he was entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money, in Jaques v. Esler, 4 N. J. Eq. 461. He held by warranty deed, and an action of ejectment by a claimant was pending. But the injunction was dissolved because the answer alleged that the purchaser had informed the assignee of the note, before purchase, that he would pay the same. It was held that the equity of the complainant existed without regard to whether or not he had notice of the defect in the title. No reference was made to solvency.

In Bumpus v. Platner, 1 Johns. Ch. 213, a purchaser in possession under a warranty deed, where there was no suit against the title, or allegation of insolvency, was held not entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money, although there was an older conveyance outstanding, made by his vendor's grantor; and it was alleged that it was believed that the deed to the vendor was forged. This purchaser had renewed his mortgage to the assignee of the vendor, which fact, also, was ground for refusing the injunction.

And where the purchaser under a deed gave a new mortgage bond to the assignee of the vendor, it was held that an injunction would not be granted against the collection of the purchase money. Washington v. Pollard, 5 Gratt. 432. The ground alleged was a prior mortgage on the land; but it was not shown that the assignee had notice. The vendor was insolvent.

IX. Purchaser in default.

Where a purchaser is negligent in taking steps to perfect his title, or where the defect is caused by his failure to meet the payments, he is held not entitled to an injunction.

The default of the purchaser in neglecting to pay the purchase money, where the vendor died leaving infant heirs, and the failure on the ground of defective title after the vendee has taken possession under conveyance from the vendor with general warranty, if the title is questioned by a suit, either prosecuted or threatened, or if the purchaser can show clearly that the title is defective." It is said in this case, to show that the title is questioned by a suit, either prosecuted or threatened, that the bill, on its face, must allege the ground on which the threatened suit is based, which must be such as will put a reasonable man in just apprehension of a loss of his land; that the mere fact that someone has asserted claim to the land is insufficient to justify a court of equity in restraining the collection of the purchase money. And in Heavner v. Morgan, 30 W. Va. 335, 8 Am.

St. Rep. 55, 4 S. E. 406, it was held that equity will not require a vendee, who has purchased land and taken a deed with covenants of general warranty, to pay the purchase money, when a part of the land sold is claimed by others, and the title is defective; but that, if the purchaser can show clearly that the title is defective, equity will not require him to pay the purchase money until such defect is removed, or a proper abatement decreed; and citing with approval Yancey v. Lewis, 4 Hen. & M. 390; Ralston v. Miller, 3 Rand. (Va.) 44, 15 Am. Dec. 704; Koger v. Kane, 5 Leigh, 606; Clarke v. Hardgrove, 7 Gratt. 399; Lovell v. Chilton, 2 W. Va. 410; Wamsley v. Stalnaker and Kimports v. Rawson, supra. Also see the following authorities: Renick v.

to make the infants parties to the injunction suit, were held sufficient to preclude relief, where the complainants alleged that the title could not be conveyed on account of infant heirs. Prout v. Gibson, 1 Cranch, C. C. 389, Fed. Cas. No. 11,445.

Where the contract provided that a deed should be made when all the purchase money was paid, and the purchaser sued for a rescission and for an injunction against a judgment for purchase money because the vendor had not good title, it was held that the failure to tender the purchase money would be sufficient ground for denying the bill. Mitchell v. Sherman, Freem. Ch. (Miss.) 120. This was on the ground that he who seeks equity must do equity.

The mere bringing of a suit in ejectment and securing of a verdict without a judgment against the purchaser by a claimant were held insufficient causes for an injunction against the collection of the purchase money. Miller v. Avery, 2 Barb. Ch. 582. In this case, the purchaser having been intrusted with a deed to the grantor for record, failed to record the same prior to a levy under a judgment against the grantor of the vendor. The allegation of insolvency was denied and not proved.

X. Contract of purchaser.

A purchaser, contracting to pay without regard to defective title, is, of course, not entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money. So, where he procures title from another than his vendor.

A contract by the purchaser to pay without regard to perfecting title was held to bar an injunction against the collection of purchase money, where the vendor showed that he had taken proper steps to acquire such title, and that his action was then pending, although the vendor had left the state, but alleged that his intention was known to the purchaser at the time of sale. Lucas v. Chapeze, 2 Litt. (Ky.) 31.

And a vendee taking conveyance from other than the vendor was held not entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money on account of defective title. It was held that his remedy was 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

against his grantor. Holeman v. Maupin, 3 T. B. Mon. 380.

A contract by the vendee to pay the last instalment on the settlement of a dispute as to the title to a part of the land was held to be a legal defense, and would have been a good defense to an action at law. The litigation having terminated successfully for the vendor, the purchaser had no standing in equity. As to other claimants of title, possession for over twenty years was held to cure any defects on those grounds. Allen v. Philips, 2 Litt. (Ky.) 1.

XI. Notice to purchaser.

Some cases deny the right of the purchaser to an injunction where he had full knowledge of the defects of the title at the time of purchase.

So, a purchaser knowing of the defects in the title at the time of purchase was held not entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money, where it was shown that the title could be cured within a reasonable time, and the vendor had taken steps to cure the same. Green v. Finucane, 5 How. (Miss.) 542.

And a purchaser at sheriff's sale was held not entitled to an injunction against the collection of the sale bonds on account of a conveyance made by the execution debtor, claimed to be prior to the sheriff's sale, where the purchaser had due notice of the difficulties he had to encounter. Fuller v. Harman 9 Rob. (La.) 205.

And a purchaser buying with knowledge of defective title, and taking no covenants for title, was held not entitled to an injunction on the ground of want of title in his vendor. Williamson v. Raney, Freem. Ch. (Miss.) 112.

A knowledge by the purchaser of existing encumbrances was held to be in equity a waiver of the right to enjoin the collection of the purchase money, where there had been no ouster, and there was a covenant of warranty, although the vendor was a non-resident. Worthington v. Curd, 22 Ark. 277. The court said: "A knowledge of encumbrances, or defects of title is no objection

Renick, 5 W. Va. 285; Thompson v. Catlett, 24 W. Va. 524; McClaugherty v. Croft, 43 W. Va. 270, 27 S. E. 246; Morgan v. Glendy, 92 Va. 86, 22 S. E. 854; Gay v. Hancock, 1 Rand. (Va.) 72; Beale v. Seiveley, 8 Leigh (Va.) 658; Grantland v. Wight, 5 Munf. 295; Richards v. Mercer, 1 Leigh, 125.

It is argued by counsel that there is no averment of irreparable injury; that, while it is averred that Ryan, the immediate grantor of Harvey, is insolvent, yet it is not averred that the Central Land Company, Harvey's remote grantor, is insolvent. The allegation of insolvency has never been one of the requisites for extending relief of this character, and, even if it were so, it is averred in the bill that Ryan, the immediate grantor, is a nonresident, having died, in the state of Ohio, insolvent; and the vendee would not be required to pay the purchase money and then resort to his action against a remote vendor. While it is true the Central Land Company conveyed with covenants of general warranty of title, which covenant runs with the land, and of which the vendee could avail himself, yet equity will not permit the collection of the purchase money from him, and compel him to resort to this remedy; and not only that, but the remote grantor would only be liable upon his covenant for the amount of the purchase money paid him, which might, in many instances, be wholly inadequate, even if such remedy should be resorted to. While it is true, in this case the consideration paid to the Central Land Company is the same as to recovery upon the covenants of the deed in a court of law; but it is a ground for equity to refuse relief out of the unpaid consideration, because it supposes that, with such knowledge, the vendee chose to rely upon the covenants; and to their legal effect he will be remitted."

A purchaser with knowledge of defective title of the vendor was held not entitled to an injunction against a judgment for purchase money, although the vendor was insolvent and had given a warranty deed. Patton v. Taylor, 7 How. 132, 12 L. ed. 637. In this case the vendor had been in possession for twenty years, and the purchaser had been his agent in relation to this land. The court held that mere insolvency was insufficient ground for relief. The court said: "These cases will show that a purchaser, in the undisturbed possession of the land, will not be relieved against the payment of the purchase money on the mere ground of defect of title, there being no fraud or misrepresentation; and that, in such a case, he must seek his remedy at law on the covenants in his deed. That, if there is no fraud, and no covenants to secure the title, he is without remedy; as the vendor, selling in good faith, is not responsible for the goodness of his title, beyond the extent of his covenants in the deed."

The purchaser by bond for title, of an equitable title, with knowledge of the legal title, was held not entitled to an injunction against a judgment for one half the purchase money in favor of an assignee, where the other half of the lot was sufficient indemnity, although a judgment had been had in ejectment for one half of the lot. Green v. McDonald, 13 Smedes & M. 445. It was not shown that the vendor could not make a good title. The court said: "The judgment recovered against Green, therefore, does not prove that Finucane's title is more defective than Green understood it to be at the purchase, nor than Finucane will be unable to coerce a conveyance from the heirs of Dickson and Caldwell."

XII. Pleading, parties, and proof.

Injunctions have been frequently refused where the plaintiff failed to specify the defects in the title, or to show that the alleged defects were of sufficient importance to entitle him to that kind of relief. Injunctions were refused the purchaser where he failed to sue the proper parties, or failed to establish the allegations of his bill where the same was denied by answer.

So, the failure of complainant to give any particulars as to any defects in his title was held sufficient to preclude him from any equitable relief. French v. Howard, 3 Bibb. 301.

And a purchaser was held not entitled to an injunction against a judgment for purchase money, where he alleged only misapprehension as to the title, and did not state facts showing adverse title, or charge fraudulent representations. Spence v. Duren, 3 Ala. 251.

A purchaser was held not entitled to an injunction against a trustee's sale on purchase-money mortgage, where it was not alleged in the bill that the vendor was insolvent, and it was not shown on the trial that an adverse claimant suing in ejectment had any title. Hoppes v. Cheek, 21 Ark. 585. The court said: "Although it is shown in evidence that Jacob Hoppes was insolvent, and unable to respond in damages on the covenants in his deed, still, there is no allegation to that effect in the bill, and without such allegation, according to the well-settled and familiar rules of pleading and practice in courts of equity, the evidence establishing the fact of insolvency cannot be regarded. Furthermore, the alleged title of Winchester does not appear in the record."

Mere apprehension of a defective title, where the purchaser was in possession under a warranty deed, was held insufficient ground to obtain an injunction against a judgment on award. Facts must be stated. Cantrell v. Cobb, 43 Ga. 193. In this case the plaintiff alleged that the vendor was a nonresident and insolvent.

that paid by Harvey, yet this cannot alter the case, because the rule must be one of general application, and not one which may be applicable to some cases, and not to others. We deduce from the authorities that it is clear, from the allegations of the bill, that equity has jurisdiction to enjoin the collection of the purchase money. The original bill shows that the action of ejectment was instituted for the recovery of the land conveyed to Harvey for which the bond was executed. The amended and supplemental bill shows that the suit was prosecuted to a final termination, which resulted in a judgment in favor of Laidley. Harvey having made improvements upon the property, the question of the value of the improvements, and the value of the lot without improvements, was submitted to the jury, and, the lot, having been found to be of the value of $450, and the value of the improvements, $1,000, Laidley elected to relinquish his title to the lot, and accept its value, and the lot was ordered sold unless the amount at which it was valued was paid by Harvey. Subsequently, the lot was sold, but the sale was not confirmed, and Harvey satisfied the judgment. This being so, a court of equity will not require the payment of the purchase money by Harvey, and force him to his action upon the covenant contained in his deed from Ryan, even if he

And a bill for an injunction was held insufficient where the purchaser did not state wherein the defect of title consisted. It was further held that, if insolvency of the vendor had been properly alleged, it would not have been sufficient where the deed warranted only against the acts of vendor. Latham v. Morgan, Smedes & M. Ch. 618.

And a purchaser under a warranty deed, where he was in possession and a suit was pending in ejectment, was held not entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money, as he did not show that the outstanding title was paramount. Senter v. Hill, 5 Sneed, 505. The remedy was said to be on the covenants in the deed.

So, a purchaser in possession under a warranty, where no suit was threatened, was held not entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money, where he did not show any superior outstanding title. Yancey v. Lewis, 4 Hen. & M. 390.

In Grantland v. Wight, 2 Munf. 179, where an injunction was erroneously granted on account of an alleged discrepancy of some feet frontage, the sale being by boundaries, it was held that the injunction should not be dissolved until a deed was tendered to the purchaser.

In same case, 5 Munf. 295, it was held that the purchaser in possession was not entitled to an injunction where he did not clearly show that the title was defective.

So, the purchaser under a warranty deed was held not entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money, on the ground that his neighbor's wall encroached on his lot some 2 feet, where his lot had the number of feet purchased, and no proof of error was shown by any valid survey. Ralston v. Miller, 3 Rand. (Va.) 44, 15 Am. Dec. 704. No suit was threatened, and lapse of time would cure any error as to survey.

In Kinports v. Rawson, 29 W. Va. 487, 2 S. E. 85, where it was held that an injunction should not be granted because it was not shown that the title was defective, the court said: "If it had appeared that a bona fide suit had been brought against Rawson's vendee to establish what was really believed to be a valid claim of superior title, and the court could see from the exhibition of such title that there was, indeed, doubt about the title, or if, under such circumstances, a suit of such character was threatened, then there would be grounds to enjoin the payment of the purchase money; but it certainly never was intended by the judges, who have used the language, 'title questioned by suit, either prosecuted or threatened,' to be understood to mean that, if an idle suit had been brought or threatened, when there was really [no] ground for such suit or such threat, this would be sufficient to prevent an honest vendor from collecting his purchase money by the enforcement of a judgment, deed of trust, or otherwise." In this case the purchaser under a warranty deed alleged insolvency of the grantor, and that his title was in doubt.

A purchaser was held not entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money, as to three fourths of the purchase money, on the allegation that the taxes had not been paid, where the amount was not stated, and they were only nominal, and the answer claimed they were paid. It was further held that other defects as to the title did not exist, and the injunction was dissolved. Ashe v. Hale, 40 N. C. (5 Ired. Eq.) 55.

One of two joint owners was held not entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money on account of defective title, where the other owner was not a party complainant. Merriman v. Norman, 9 Heisk. 269. The court said that, where the complainant was in possession in another state, under title depending on a decree of that state, an allegation in the bill that the vendor was a nonresident of this state was not of itself sufficient for an injunction. As to whether the fraud of vendor in concealing the defects in the title would be sufficient for an injunction was not decided.

A party having no title found a purchaser who accepted a warranty deed from the owner, and gave his bond to the seller, who accounted to the owner. Afterwards a street was changed to its original place, were solvent, but the fact of his insolvency is an additional reason for equitable interference. It is claimed that at the time Harvey purchased the lot the ejectment suit was pending, and that this is an additional reason why a court of equity should not entertain him. The deed to Harvey is with covenants of general warranty of title, and, although the action of ejectment was pending, yet this will not prevent him from enjoining the collection of the purchase money.

Care should be taken, however, to distinguish the case here from that class of cases in which injunctions to prevent a sale under a deed of trust, whether executed to secure deferred payments of purchase money, or to secure general indebtedness, have been freely granted in this state and in Virginia, upon the allegation that there is a cloud upon the title to the land about to be sold. In such cases, the injunction is granted until the cloud on the title is removed. This is done in the interest of all parties, that there may be no sacrifice of the property, and that the title of the purchaser may be assured.

For the reasons given, we reverse the decree of the Circuit Court, dissolving the injunction and dismissing the bill, and remand the cause.

cutting the lot. The owner and seller were insolvent. In the absence of fraud, it was held that the purchaser had no claim on the seller, who made no warranty, but that the remedy, if any, was against the warrantor. Price v. Ayres, 10 Gratt. 575.

So, a surety on a note for purchase money was held not entitled to an injunction against a judgment in favor of the vendor against the vendee and surety, on the ground of fraud on the part of the vendor in regard to the title, where the purchaser did not complain and was not a party to the bill. Walker v. Gilbert, 7 Smedes & M. 456, 45 Am. Dec. 303.

XIII. Rescission.

The purchaser is not entitled to an injunction and also the land, and a court of equity will adjust the decree to the equities of the case. But the court will refuse a perpetual injunction where the complainant does not offer to rescind.

Thus, in Jackson v. Norton, 6 Cal. 187, an injunction against a judgment for purchase money on the ground of a pending suit in ejectment and insolvency of the grantor was held to have been properly refused, where the plaintiff did not offer to rescind. This was on the ground that he could not avoid his contract and hold the land.

And in Edwards v. Strode, 2 J. J. Marsh. 506, a perpetual injunction against the collection of the purchase money was held to be erroneous, where the complainant did not offer to rescind.

In Shreveport v. Flournoy, 26 La. Ann. 709, where it was held that the objection that there was not sufficient evidence to authorize the order of executory process cannot be examined on an injunction, the remedy was by appeal. The court said: "The objection that the defendant had no title to the lots is of no force. No eviction has been complained of, and no tender or offer has been made to return the property to defendant. The city of Shreveport cannot keep the property and refuse to pay the price."

XIV. Curing title.

Where a title is cured before decree, the injunction is usually dissolved; the only question then being one of costs. So, where the lapse of time has cured the title, an injunction is denied.

A claim made by the purchaser, in an injunction suit, that the vendor misrepresented the amount of land conveyed, was held not to be sustained by the evidence, in Lovell v. Chilton, 2 W. Va. 410. A claim that the title was defective, showing outstanding title, was held to be cause for an injunction, but, on defendant's curing the same before decree, the injunction was dissolved.

So, where an injunction was granted to the purchaser on account of defective title, and the title was perfected before the hearing, it was held that the injunction should be dissolved without damages. Lampton v. Usher, 7 B. Mon. 57.

And, where an injunction was granted on account of dower right affecting the title, it was held that on the title being perfected the injunction should be dissolved with costs to plaintiff. Porter v. Scobie, 5 B. Mon. 387.

And a purchaser holding land until the title was cured by the statute of limitations was held not entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money, on account of defect of title when purchased. Amick v. Bowyer, 3 W. Va. 7.

Where the vendee was in possession fourteen years, it was held that an injunction should not be granted against the collection of the purchase money on the ground that a deed to the vendor was not acknowledged. Cooley v. Rankin, 11 Mo. 642. It was held that a deed not properly acknowledged passed title; and it was not shown that the grantor had ever made any other deed, or was then living.

XV. Code and statutory provisions.

The Louisiana Civil Code provides for an injunction against the collection of the purchase money where the purchaser has just reason to believe that he will be disquieted in his possession.

Article 2535 provides that, if the buyer is disquieted in his possession, or has just reason to fear that he will be disquieted, he may suspend payment until the seller has restored to him possession or prefers to give him security. Under this article, it has been held that the payment should have been suspended until the vendors gave security, where the vendor sold community property as his own, and his wife died, leaving infant heirs. Denis v. Clague, 7 Mart. N. S. 95. In this case the vendor was insolvent.

Under this section, the purchaser was held entitled to stay of execution on a judgment for purchase money until security was given by the vendor against a legal mortgage in favor of the vendor's children, existing against the property. Cammack v. Daunis, 6 La. Ann. 117.

In Rowlett v. Shepherd, 4 La. 93, it was held that the Louisiana Code in force when a sale was made applied, which provided that, if the buyer be disquieted by an action, whether hypothecary or in revindication, he might suspend payment of price; and that an injunction was the proper remedy where suit had been brought against him by a claimant of title. It was further held that interest was not payable until the claims were removed from the property. This overrules as to interest Duplantier v. Pigman, 3 Mart. La. 245, as that decision was based on the French and Roman civil law. See manuel de Droit Francais, Code Napoleon, arts. 1652, 1653. But the Louisiana Code is derived from the Spanish curia Phillip, Lib. 2, cap. 2, no. 24, which provides that he should pay interest from the time he ought to have paid the price until he does pay it. It was further held that this contract stipulated that the purchaser should retain in his hands an amount equal to all encumbrances.

An encumbrance on the land at the time of sale was held sufficient cause for an injunction against a judgment for purchase money, in Bushnell v. Brown, 3 Mart. N. S. 449. The court said: "It is a point clearly settled by law and many decisions, that a vendor [vendee?] of property, who is in danger of loss or eviction, by suit actually commenced, questiona mota, ought not to be compelled to pay the price, unless good security be offered by the vendor to save him from injury."

The location of the land by government survey, giving the purchaser swamp land instead of elevated ground that he purchased, was held sufficient cause for injunction against a judgment for the purchase money. Barrow v. Cazeaux, 5 La. 72. The court does not discuss the solvency of the vendor; the sale was by authentic act of the vendor.

And, where suit was brought against the purchaser by third parties claiming title to the land, it was held that he was entitled to an injunction restraining the collection of the purchase money, until the question of title was determined. Exnicios v. Weiss, 3 Mart. N. S. 480. The case does not show 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the purchaser's contract, or discuss the question of the vendor's solvency.

But, under the old Civil Code of Louisiana, in force in 1822, providing that the vendee could not resist the payment of the price unless he was disturbed by a suit, the purchaser was held not entitled to an injunction, where a suit by a claimant was dismissed before the hearing in the injunction suit. Thompson v. Dupuy, 3 La. 432.

The Georgia Code now requires the defense of defective title to be made in the action at law.

Under § 2939, requiring all existing defenses to be set up at the same time, it was held that a purchaser was not entitled to an injunction against a judgment for purchase money, where a defense at law was made of breach of warranty, and one breach existing, but not pleaded or excused, was alleged as cause for injunction. Desvergers v. Willis, 58 Ga. 388.

And the same was held where the purchaser held by title bond, where no new matter was alleged which was not or could not have been litigated in the action at law. Moore v. Hill, 59 Ga. 780.

And, under Ind. Civ. Code, § 56, sub. 3, requiring the defendant to set up all his defenses, legal or equitable, the failure to set up that there were encumbrances on the land, and the fraud of the vendor in misrepresenting the title, was held to preclude an injunction. Ricker v. Pratt, 48 Ind. 73.

This section was not referred to in Fehrle v. Turner, 77 Ind. 530, although the defense was set up by cross-complaint in a foreclosure suit, and it was held that insolvency of the vendor was ground for injunction against a foreclosure of a mortgage given by the vendee where the title was defective; but the court said that "it is held in this state that, in a suit to foreclose a mortgage on land conveyed by the mortgagee to the mortgagor, a defect of title will be no defense to the suit, for the reason that, if the mortgagor has no title, the foreclosure cannot injure him."

Under Md. act 1826, chap. 192, providing that no injunction shall be granted to stay any sale authorized by the act, unless the plaintiff in the injunction suit shall be a party to the deed or mortgage under which it is to be sold, or shall claim under such party, and unless he shall allege that the debt has been paid, or that fraud was used in obtaining the deed or mortgage, it was held that an injunction against collection of the purchase money should be denied when fraud was not alleged. It was further held that a suit in ejectment, by a claimant, was not ground where the title of the claimant was not alleged to be superior to that of plaintiff. Gayle v. Fattle, 14 Md. 69. The court said: "We content ourselves with a reference to Miller v. Avery, 2 Barb. Ch. 594, a case conclusive of this, and now everywhere in this country acquiesced in. There Chancellor Walworth, in alluding to the decision in Johnson v. Gere, 2 Johns. Ch. 546, says: 'I think it evident that the reporter was under a mistake in the statement of the case, for it cannot be possible that he intended to decide that a mere claim of a paramount title, by a third person, and the bringing of a suit upon that claim against the purchaser, was sufficient to authorize the court to stay the vendor, who had warranted the title, from proceeding at law or in equity to collect the unpaid purchase money. If the law was so, any vendee who was not ready to pay his purchase money when it became due might make a secret arrangement with some third person to claim the premises and bring an ejectment suit therefor, and thus tie up the vendor from collecting indefinitely."

XVI. English and Canadian cases.

It seems that in Canada the purchaser will be entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money on showing that the vendor has not a good title.

The purchaser of land in an executory contract was held entitled to an injunction against a suit for interest on the purchase money where he alleged that the vendor had not a good title, and the vendor failed to show by an abstract that he had a good title. It was held that the vendor could not claim that he would have a good title at the time of the last payment. Thompson v. Brunskill, 7 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 542. No defects in the title were pointed out, the court holding that the burden was upon the vendor to show that his title was good.

And where the vendors had not furnished an abstract of title notwithstanding repeated notices, and had at length brought an action at law on a note given by the purchaser for part of the purchase money, the purchaser filed a bill alleging that, by reason of the delay, the contract was at an end, and praying an injunction to stay the suit at law. The vendors failing to justify their neglect, the court granted the injunction. The court held that an injunction should be granted. Walton v. Armstrong, 11 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 379.

On a bill filed by a purchaser, alleging a defective title, a reference was had, and the referee reported the title defective. A perpetual injunction was granted against an action at law for the purchase money, and decree of rescission. Tiffany v. Thompson, 9 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 255.

In England there is a scarcity of injunction cases in favor of the purchaser. His rights are probably generally concluded by the abstract and title papers furnished in the practice in that country. But it seems that he can defeat suits for specific performance, and prosecute suits for rescission, where his contract is obtained from him by the fraud, misrepresentation, or concealment of material facts on the part of the vendor. A statute seems to furnish ex parte relief on application to a judge in chambers. A few authorities are cited to show the general jurisdiction of a court of equity.

In Koger v. Kane, 5 Leigh, 606, it was said: "In England, indeed, if the purchaser has obtained his deed, he can have no redress in equity, but must look to his covenants; and, if he has but a covenant of warranty, he can have no redress until eviction. And this principle has received countenance from the decisions of the courts of a sister state. . . . And in Ralston v. Miller, 3 Rand. (Va.) 44, 15 Am. Dec. 704, Judge Green, delivering an opinion in which the other judges concurred, remarks that this court has, in favor of purchasers, gone far beyond anything which has been sanctioned by the courts of chancery of England, or elsewhere, in enjoining the payment of purchase money after the purchaser has taken possession under a conveyance, especially with general warranty. Yet it has never gone as far as to interfere, unless the title was questioned by a suit, either prosecuted or threatened, or unless the purchaser could show clearly that the title was defective."

In England the vendor and purchaser act 1874, chap. 78, provides that a vendor or purchaser may obtain a decision of a judge in chambers in a summary way in respect of any requisitions or objections, or any claim for compensation, or any other question arising out of or connected with the contract (not being a question affecting the existence or validity of the contract).

Encumbrances must be paid off by the vendor before he can compel payment of the purchase money, if discovered before the conveyance. 2 Sugden, Vend. & P. 124.

After conveyance executed, if the vendor knew and concealed the defect in title it is a fraud, and the purchaser will be relieved in equity. Id. 132.

"If, after the Execution of a Conveyance, but before Payment of the Consideration Money, the Purchaser has Notice that the Vendor has no Title to the Lands, this is sufficient to avoid the Purchase. Jones and Stanley, Mich. 5 Geo. II. [1731], in Scac's MS. Rep." 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 685.

A purchaser an estate, and, having paid down part of the purchase money, gave bond for the residue. The plaintiff had an equitable lien on the purchased premises, of which the defendant alleged he had no notice at the time of making his purchase, but was apprised thereof before payment of the money due on the bond. And it was contended that this notice was not material, since the giving of the bond was as payment; and the purchaser, after he had given his bond for payment of the purchase money, was bound in all events to proceed, and could not plead at law that there was an equitable encumbrance on his purchased premises. Tourville v. Naish, 3 P. Wms. 307. It was held: "If the person who had a lien in equity of the premises gives notice before actual payment of the purchase money, . . . it is sufficient; and, though the purchaser has no remedy at law against the payment of the residue, for which he gave his bond, yet he would be entitled to relief in equity, on bringing his bill, and showing that, though he has given his bond for payment of the residue of his purchase money, yet now he has notice of an encumbrance, under which circumstances the court would stop payment of the money due on the bond."

In Maynard's Case, Freem. Ch. 1, which was an action by a purchaser against the vendor for repayment of the money because the title failed, "it was said by Mr. Attorney that, if a man sell another's land, and covenant to discharge it of such particular encumbrances, and, before the payment of the money, other encumbrances are discovered, this will prevent the suit for the money till all the encumbrances are discharged. It was said, likewise, by Mr. Keck, that, if there be no covenants against any encumbrances, yet, if, before payment of the money, any are discovered, the party may retain his money till they are cleared; quod fuit concess. per cancellar." But it was said by Sir John King, and not denied per Cur. that those must be encumbrances made by the vendor himself, or otherwise the party cannot detain the money, unless they be covenanted against."

In a suit for the payment of creditors, the real estates of the testator were ordered to be sold. A, being reported the purchaser of one of the estates for £14,480. entered into possession and accepted the title, and proper conveyances were executed. On application by the creditors to have the purchase money paid out, the purchaser stated that the tenants of the estate had been served with a writ of right at the suit of a person who claimed the whole estate under an adverse title. But it was held that the purchaser, having accepted the title, etc., could not now prevent the money being paid out of court, and ordered accordingly. The lord chancellor said: "The court, having given Mr. Digby possession of the estate which he had purchased, and a conveyance under a title which he himself had previously approved, had done all it could for the purchaser, who could not be heard at this stage of the business to object to the application of the purchase money." Thomas v. Powell, 2 Cox, Ch. Cas. 394.

XVII. Summary.

In cases of fraudulent representation of title, or concealment of material facts, by the vendor, the purchaser of a defective title is held entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money. And an injunction is usually granted to the holder of a bond for title, where the vendor is unable to make good title. The insolvency or nonresidence of a vendor gives equity jurisdiction to enjoin the collection of the purchase money, where the purchaser holds by warranty deed and the title is defective. Where the vendor stipulates that the purchase money is not to be paid until the title is perfected, and he brings suit before that time, equity will interfere. But, where the vendor is solvent, and is not a nonresident, the weight of authority is clear that the purchaser must look to the covenants of his deed, and that a remedy at law will prevent the court from granting an injunction. Purchasers under quitclaim deeds, in the absence of fraud, are not entitled to an injunction against the collection of purchase money, where the title is defective. So, a purchaser may be estopped by his conduct from obtaining an injunction, as where he tells a party who contemplates buying a note given for the purchase money that he will pay it at maturity, and the note is purchased on the strength of that representation. So, a purchaser whose default prevents the perfection of the title is not entitled to an injunction. A purchaser who contracts to pay for the title in its present condition, with full knowledge of its infirmities, is in the same condition as a purchaser under a quitclaim deed, and is not entitled to an injunction.

The complainant in an injunction suit should set out the facts showing that the title is defective; otherwise he will not be entitled to an injunction. The purchaser should ask an abatement of the price, or seek for a rescission, on the ground that "he who seeks equity must do equity." Where the title is cured at the time of hearing, the injunction is generally dissolved. In some states the Code and statutory provisions provide for injunction for defective title. Others provide that defenses against plaintiff's claim must be pleaded in that action. It seems that in some states sales under deeds of trust will be enjoined where the title is defective. The rule in Johnson v. Gere, 2 Johns. Ch. 546, that an injunction will be granted in favor of a purchaser where suit in ejectment is pending by a claimant of paramount title, is not supported by the weight of authority without the further qualification of, "provided the grantor was guilty of fraud, or is insolvent or a nonresident," and does not appear to have been followed in its broad statement by other cases, except in isolated cases, and in Virginia and West Virginia.

A few cases seem to hold that an absolute want of title at the time of conveyance will authorize an injunction; but the general rule is that there must be some equitable ground, as insolvency, or nonresidence, or fraud on the part of the grantor, before the court will grant an injunction.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, THIRD CIRCUIT.

STANDARD LUMBER COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
BUTLER ICE COMPANY.

(76 C. C. A. 39, 146 Fed. 359.)

Contract—corporation—fraudulent act of president—liability.

1. A contract to pay for the construction of a building does not become enforceable against a corporation because it is executed by its president under its corporate seal, if a large bonus in addition to the amount of the bid is included in the contract price, which is to be divided between such president and the contractor and its representatives, even as to extra work after the price named in the contract has been paid, where, under the statutes of the state, such conduct on the part of the president is a misdemeanor.

Same—denial of validity.

2. Where a contract on which an action is founded is contra bonos mores, or forbidden by express law, defendant may plead its invalidity, even though he is a participant in the wrong.

(June 20, 1906.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Pennsylvania to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover for work done and materials furnished

Case Note.—Secret bonus to officer or director of corporation as affecting right to enforce contract against corporation:—

In Stanton v. Sturgis, 140 Fed. 789, it was held that, where a contractor agreed to build a railroad for 15 per cent upon the cost of construction, and on the same day entered into another agreement with five of the seven directors of the railroad company to pay them two thirds of his profit, both contracts being made at the same time and substantially between the same persons, though one is executed in the name of the corporation and the other in the names of the majority of the directors, are to be treated as in pari materia and as constituting one contract, which, being void as against public policy, will not support an action by the contractor against the railroad company for damages in not being permitted to perform it. The court intimated, however, that, if the contractor had built the railroad, his right to recover the agreed compensation might not be affected.

But in Yellow Poplar Lumber Co. v. Daniel, 48 C. C. A. 204, 109 Fed. 39, it was held that the right of the seller of logs to enforce a contract lien for the purchase price was not affected by the fact that, after the contract of sale was made, an agreement to divide the profits was forced from the seller by a threat by the manager of the purchasing corporation, who had negotiated the purchase, that the corporation would repudiate the contract, where no damage was shown to have resulted to the corporation from the subsequent agreement.

In Findlay v. Pertz, 29 L.R.A. 188, 13 C. C. A. 559, 31 U. S. App. 340, 66 Fed. 427, it was held that, where the superintendent of a municipal gas works was paid a commission upon a sale to it, the city, upon discovering the fact, was entitled to rescind; but that the city might thereafter become liable by continuing to use the property purchased; and that the contract was unaffected by a statute declaring it a penal offense for any public officer, agent, servant, or employee to be directly or indirectly interested in any contract for the purchase of any property for the state, county, or municipality. The court said: "We must distinguish between the bargain for a commission between the defendants in error and the agent of the city and the contract between the two principals. The first was clearly illegal and incapable of enforcement; the latter was, on its face, altogether within the contracting power of the parties, was free from any immorality, and altogether legitimate. . . . It has been pressed upon us that, inasmuch as the agent corrupted was a public agent, the contract made through his corruption was absolutely void and incapable of ratification, and that no subsequent conduct of the plaintiff in error in retaining and using the machines bought can furnish a basis upon which the guilty party can maintain a suit founded upon the corrupt contract. It seems to us that this argument confounds the corrupt agreement between the agent of the city and the other principal with the contract between the principals."

So far as STANDARD LUMBER CO. v. BUTLER ICE CO. may be in conflict with the preceding case, it seems to be more fully in accord with the weight of indirect authority. As to the effect of the statute cited to taint the contract with illegality, reference may be made to a few of the many cases which, by an overwhelming weight of authority, support the rule that contracts made in violation of a penal statute cannot form the basis of an action, though not expressly prohibited or declared void. See Woods v. Armstrong, 54 Ala. 150, 25 Am. Rep. 671; Funk v. Gallivan, 49 Conn. 124, 44 Am. Rep. 210; Cook v. Pierce, 2 Houst. (Del.) 499; *Sandage v. Studabaker Bros. Mfg. The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Dallas and Gray, Circuit Judges, and McPherson, District Judge.

Mr. William M. Hall, for plaintiff in error:

The corporate name being signed to the contract, and the corporate seal being affixed thereto, a presumption thereupon arises that the instrument is binding on the corporation.

Gray, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

In the court below, the plaintiff in error, the Standard Lumber Company, a corporation of the state of Pennsylvania, brought an action ex contractu against the defendant, the Butler Ice Company, a corporation of the state of Delaware. The statement of claim sets forth a certain contract in writing between plaintiff and defendant, whereby the plaintiff undertook to provide the materials and do all the work mentioned and shown in specifications and drawings, referred to in said contract, for the erection and completion of an ice plant, with certain exceptions therein stated, and in consideration thereof, the defendant agreed to pay plaintiff the sum of $10,808. It was also agreed that there should be paid $6.50 per perch for extra stonework, above that shown in said plans, and 50 cents per yard for extra excavating, subject to additions and deductions as in said contract provided. It is then alleged that plaintiff had provided all the materials, and had performed all the work stipulated for in said contract, in accordance with the terms thereof, and that defendant had accepted the same; that plaintiff had also done extra work under the contract, amounting to $2,838, so that the $10,808 agreed to be paid for the completion of the work specified in the contract, and the amount to be paid for the extra work, at the rate stipulated for therein, amounted to $13,646. Against this sum, the plaintiff allows defendant credits to the amount of $11,624, leaving a balance of $2,022 claimed as due from defendant to plaintiff.

Bank, 88 Tenn. 573, 7 L.R.A. 705, 17 Am. St. Rep. 918, 13 S. W. 127; Territt v. Bartlett, 21 Vt. 184. Compare Niemeyer v. Wright, 75 Va. 239, 40 Am. Rep. 720, which holds that though, as a general rule, a contract founded on an act forbidden by a statute under a penalty is void although it is not expressly declared to be so, it does not necessarily follow that the unlawfulness of the act was meant by the legislature to avoid a contract made in contravention of it; but that the question is in a great measure one of legislative intent.

It is also well settled that, where the consideration for a contract is illegal in part, the whole is vitiated thereby. See Brieske v. North Chicago Street R. Co. 82 Ill. App. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

256 (citing Tobey v. Robinson, 99 Ill. 222; Henderson v. Palmer, 71 Ill. 579, 22 Am. Rep. 117; Bishop, Contr. § 487); Chicago, I. & L. R. Co. v. Southern Indiana R. Co. (Ind. App.) 70 N. Threadgill, supra; Wegner Bros. v. Biering, 65 Tex. 506; Burck v. Abbott, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 216, 54 S. W. 314.

The written contract, as set out in the statement of claim and produced at the trial, was executed by the plaintiff, the Standard Lumber Company, under its seal and the signature of J. M. Wetherill, manager, and on the part of the Butler Ice Company, under the seal of said company and the signatures of Peter F. McCool, its president, and S. B. Hermes, its secretary. The affidavit of defense set out, and it was proved at the trial, that the plaintiff company, by a letter addressed to P. F. McCool, then president of the defendant company, and signed by the Standard Lumber Company, "Per F. E. Brotherton," agent of the plaintiff company, duly authorized in that behalf, proposed to build the ice plant for defendant company, according to the plans and specifications submitted, for the sum of $6,309.50; that the plans and specifications referred to in said bid were the plans and specifications referred to in, and made part of, the contract between plaintiff and defendant companies, upon which suit was brought in the court below, and in which the consideration named for the work included in this bid was $10,808; and that the bid for $6,309.50 was full price for said work. Subsequent to the making of said bid, by agreement between Peter F. McCool, president of the defendant company, and the plaintiff company, acting through its manager, Wetherill, the said bid for said work was increased to the sum of $10,808, and the contract upon which suit was brought was then entered into upon that consideration to be paid by the defendant company, it being understood by the said officers of the two companies that, when the consideration was paid by the defendant company, $2,000 of the difference between the original bid and the contract price was to be paid to the said Peter F. McCool, and that the balance was to be divided between the said Wetherill and the said plaintiff company. The testimony as to this corrupt understanding and contract was uncontradicted, and it was not denied that the consideration of the written contracts was thus corruptly increased, or that the president of the defendant company conspired with the plaintiff company and its manager,

Wetherill, to defraud the said defendant company for his own benefit.

The facts thus summarized not being denied, counsel for plaintiff contends that the defendant is bound by the action of its president and secretary; and that, inasmuch as the corporate seal was attached, as well as the signatures of the last-named officers, defendant cannot now avoid the obligation of the contract thus formally executed; and that plaintiff had a right to rely upon the signed contract under the corporate seal. The cases relied upon by plaintiff seem to be those in which corporate obligations duly executed have come into the hands of innocent third persons, where it is held that, inasmuch as there is a presumption that the seal was affixed by the proper authority, it is not to be overcome by the mere fact that no vote of the directors authorizing it is shown. We are not, however, dealing with a case of the innocent holder of such a contract, the undisputed facts being that the manager of the plaintiff corporation, with the knowledge of its directing and executive authorities, entered into a corrupt bargain with the president of the defendant company, to add more than 50 per cent to the original bid, with the understanding that the amount by which the bid was thus increased should, when paid by the defendant company, be divided between the conspirators. It is too mild a characterization of such a transaction to say that it was fraudulent. It was a gross scheme for the abstraction of more than $4,000 from the treasury of the defendant company, to be converted to the use of the conspirators, the larger share of it to the defendant's own president. The acts and conduct thus described are clearly in violation of two statutes of Pennsylvania, which provide as follows:

Act of March 31, 1860: "If any two or more persons shall falsely and maliciously conspire and agree to cheat and defraud any person or body corporate of his or their moneys, goods, chattels, or other property, or to do any other dishonest, malicious, and unlawful act, to the prejudice of another, they shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, be sentenced to pay a fine, not exceeding $500, and to undergo an imprisonment, by separate or solitary confinement at labor, or by simple imprisonment, not exceeding two years." P. L. 413, § 128.

Act of June 12, 1878: "Sec. 1. If any person, being an officer, director, superintendent, manager, receiver, employee, agent, attorney, broker, or member of any bank or other body corporate, or public company, municipal or quasi municipal corporation, shall fraudulently take, convert, or apply to his own use, or the use of any other person, any of the money or other property of such bank, body corporate, or company, municipal or quasi municipal corporation [or association], or belonging to any person or persons, corporation or association, and deposited therein, or in possession thereof, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

"Sec. 5. That every person found guilty of a misdemeanor under any or either of the preceding sections of this title, wherein the nature and extent of the punishment is not specified, shall be sentenced to pay a fine not exceeding $1,000, and to undergo an imprisonment by separate or solitary confinement at labor not exceeding six years." P. L. 196, 197.

The contract was not only immoral, but it was illegal and criminal, and therefore void. No court would be justified in enforcing the whole or any part of such a contract. From an origin so flagitious, no right of action can arise. The maxim Ex turpi causa, non oritur actio, founded as it is on sound morals, has been long recognized by courts in the practical administration of justice. Petrie v. Hannay, 3 T. R. 422; Collins v. Blanters, 2 Wils. 341. A contract otherwise void, as being founded upon an immoral consideration, cannot be rendered valid by the mere ceremony of attaching a seal thereto. Gaslight & Coke Co. v. Turner, 5 Bing. N. C. 675.

The defendant, however, contends that the contract, as to the payment of $10,808, which included the amount to be stolen from defendant, was executed, and that the balance sued for referred to the extra work under the stipulations of the contract, and had no relation to the fraudulent part thereof. The evidence will not permit a serious consideration of this contention. There was no appropriation of the payments made from time to time to any particular part of the contract, and plaintiff cannot now make that appropriation for his own benefit. The poison of the immoral consideration infects the contract as a whole, and the court below was right in refusing to lend its aid to the enforcement of any part thereof.

Nor is the principle invoked by the defendant, that no one may show his own turpitude, applicable here. The real defendant is the company. It was the victim, not a perpetrator, of the fraud. Its president conspired with plaintiff to take from it a large sum of money by falsehood and deception practised through the medium of the contract here sued upon. But, even if the defendant could by any possibility have been shown to have been a party to its own spoliation by the dishonest conduct of its president, it could still have alleged the illegal consideration as a defense. Where the contract on which the action is founded is contra bonos mores, or forbidden by express law, the defendant may plead its invalidity, even though he be a participator in the wrong. In such a case the courts refuse to enforce the contract on grounds of public policy, and not as a matter of private interest.

In Holman v. Johnson, 1 Cowp. 343, Lord Mansfield says: "The objection that a contract is immoral or illegal, as between plaintiff and defendant, sounds at all times very ill in the mouth of the defendant. It is not for his sake, however, that the objection is ever allowed, but it is founded in general principles of policy. . . . No court will lend its aid to a man who founds his cause of action upon an immoral or an illegal act. If from the plaintiff's own stating, or otherwise, the cause of action appears to arise ex turpi causa, or the transgression of a positive law of this country, there the court says he has no right to be assisted. It is upon that ground the court goes, not for the sake of the defendant, but because they will not lend their aid to such a plaintiff."

It is objected that in such cases fraud is always a question for the jury, and that the court erred in giving binding instructions to find in favor of the defendant. We see no reason, and none has been shown, where the facts constituting such a defense are undisputed, why the court may not, as in other cases, direct a verdict in accordance with such facts, if it would feel compelled, upon the rendition of a contrary verdict, to set the same aside. That this was such a case, we have no doubt. It must not, however, pass without notice, that each side requested the court to give peremptory instructions for a verdict in its favor, and the record discloses the fact that, after the testimony was closed on both sides, it was agreed by counsel for both the plaintiff and defendant that the question was a question of law for the court, and the judge opened his charge to the jury with the statement: "It is agreed on both sides that this is a question for the court to dispose of under the evidence; and therefore it becomes my duty to direct the character of the verdict which you are to render."

As was said by the supreme court of Pennsylvania in a similar case: "It would be unfair to the court and to the defendant to sustain an assignment of error, based upon the failure to submit the question to the jury." New Era Life Asso. v. Weigle, 128 Pa. 577, 18 Atl. 393.

The judgment of the court below is therefore affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SEVENTH CIRCUIT.

VIRGINIA W. TINCHER, Appt.,
v.

THOMAS S. ARNOLD et al., Trustees, etc., of LeGrand L. Wells, Deceased, et al.

(77 C. C. A. 649, 147 Fed. 665.)

Trust—action to test—laches.

1. Laches will not debar an heir from proceeding to test the validity of a trust created by the ancestor's will for the accumulation of a fund to establish a charity school.

Same—uncertainty of beneficiaries.

2. A charitable trust for the education of poor boys is not rendered invalid by the fact that the class is not restricted in any way by the capacity, color, or condition of the beneficiaries.

Same—nonexisting object.

3. The existence of a public free-school system does not necessarily render invalid a trust for the benefit of boys unable to educate themselves, on the theory that the trust has no field for operation, since, notwithstanding such system, there may be boys who, by reason of poverty or other circumstances, cannot avail themselves of it.

Same—selection of beneficiary.

4. That no provision is made by the donor for the selection of the beneficiaries of a trust for the education of boys not able to educate themselves does not invalidate the trust, since equity will appoint a trustee for that purpose.

Same—cy près application.

5. That the donor of a fund to be held in trust for the education of boys unable to educate themselves provides that, after the building is secured, the income of the fund shall be used to pay teachers, does not prevent the use of a part of it for the heating, lighting, and care of the building.

Same—construction—solicitors' fees.

6. Complainant's solicitors' fees will not be paid out of the trust estate in a proceeding by an heir to annul his ancestor's bequest for charity,—especially where a judicial construction has already been given to the will which is sufficient for the purposes of the trustees.

(August 11, 1906.)

A PPEAL by complainant from decrees of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern Division of the Northern District of Illinois upholding a trust created by the will of LeGrand L. Wells, deceased, and refusing to allow complainant solicitors' fees out of the fund. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Grosscup and Baker, Circuit Judges, and Sanborn, District Judge.

Messrs. E. A. Otis, W. K. Otis, and Warren Pease, for appellant:

The trust is void for uncertainty. The will gives no power to anyone to select the Case Note.—Existence of public free-school system as affecting validity of trust for education of children: —The objection that the existence of a public free-school system renders invalid a trust for the education of poor children was made in the case of Green v. Blackwell (N. J. Ch.) 35 Atl. 375, and was there, also, held untenable; the court saying that it did not follow that, because the legislature had devised a method by which all the children of the state might receive an education free of charge, testators may no longer devote a part of their estates to the education of the poor, since it is undeniable that the class designated is still in existence and as capable of being the beneficiary of such a charitable trust as it ever was.

In Re John, 30 Or. 494, 36 L.R.A. 242, 47 Pac. 341, 50 Pac. 226, it is also held that a bequest for the maintenance of free public schools is not prevented from being a public charity by the fact that the state has for all practical purposes provided for the maintenance of free public schools for all children of school age within the same territory,—especially where, under the system provided by the state, there is no absolute assurance that a free school will be maintained, so that the purposes of the testator will be assuredly and inevitably met by the provision made by the state.

And see also the case of Clement v. Hyde, 50 Vt. 716, 28 Am. Rep. 522, as quoted in the opinion in TINCHER v. ARNOLD.

As tending indirectly to support the doctrine of the foregoing decisions, reference may be made to the cases of Swasey v. American Bible Soc. 57 Me. 523, which sustains a bequest "for the education and instruction of poor and needy children in the first school district in the town of Bucksport, to furnish them with necessary clothing while attending school;" and Crow v. Clay County, 196 Mo. 234, 95 S. W. 369, which holds that the establishment of a public-school system, not compulsory on individual districts, supported partly by state funds and partly by local taxation, did not so certainly meet the purpose of the creator of a charitable trust for the tuition and education of poor children under the age of sixteen within a certain district as to supplant such trust.

And in the following cases gifts for the benefit of the public schools themselves were upheld: Huntsville v. Smith, 137 Ala. 382, 35 So. 120; Heuser v. Harris, 42 Ill. 425; *Webster v. Mr. William H. Stead, Attorney General, for the State.

Sanborn, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Action to construe a will, to determine the validity of a trust clause therein, to have such clause held void, determine that complainant, as sole heir at law of the testator, is entitled to the amount of the trust funds in the hands of the trustees, and that they be required to account for the same and turn them over to complainant. The court below held that the trust was valid, as creating a good, charitable use, and dismissed the bill for want of equity. Complainant also moved the court to allow her the amount paid for attorneys' fees, on the ground that her solicitors had rendered valuable and important services to the value of $1,500, and that the terms of the will are ambiguous, indefinite, and uncertain, and application to the court was necessary to obtain a construction thereof; that at the time of the filing of the bill in this cause the trustees under the will had themselves prepared a bill to be filed in the circuit court of Watseka county, Illinois, asking a construction of the will. This petition was denied by the court, on the ground that complainant in this case was suing in her own right, and not for the benefit of the trust estate. Complainant has appealed from the decree dismissing the bill, and from the order or decree denying her petition for attorneys' fees.

Complainant is the daughter and sole heir at law of the testator, LeGrand L. Wells, deceased. On September 24, 1883, said Wells made his will, and by the fifth clause thereof attempted to create a trust, as follows: After giving his daughter, the complainant, a life estate in a farm in Iroquois county, Illinois, remainder to the heirs of her body share and share alike, and a legacy of $1,000 and certain personal property, and $1,000 each to her children as they should arrive at the age of twenty-one years, the will contains a residuary devise to his trustees for the purpose of carrying out the full terms of the will, and then proceeds as follows: "I further direct that my trustees and their successors manage my estate until it has accumulated a fund of at least thirty thousand dollars after setting aside a sufficient sum to pay all specific legacies, debts, etc., which shall form a fund known as the Wells fund, and shall be used in the following manner, to wit: If the city of Watseka will donate a suitable lot for such purpose within thirty days after being notified by said trustees, said trustees shall cause a building to be erected on said lot for the purpose of educating boys who reside in the state of Illinois between the ages of 12 and 18 years, and who are unable to educate themselves, which shall cost not exceeding five thousand dollars, and the balance of my estate in the hands of my said trustees after the payment for said building, shall be kept at interest and the net income, except ten dollars per year set apart for the purpose of keeping my family burial lot in repairs, shall be used for the purpose of paying teachers employed in said school. And I further direct my said trustees that in case the city of Watseka refuses or neglects for thirty days after being notified by the trustees that they are ready to carry out this provision in said Will as to said school, then they shall pay the whole sum set apart for this purpose over to the finance committee or the trustees of Onarga Seminary, located at Onarga, Illinois, the net income of which shall be used to carry on said Seminary and shall be known as the Wells Fund."

The specific legacies were paid by his executors, but the estate has never been settled in the county court of Iroquois county, nor the executors discharged. The executors and trustees continued to manage and invest the residuary estate until about the year 1890, when the trust fund amounted to $30,000. Soon after a lot of land in Watseka was conveyed by the owners thereof to the trustees as a site for the erection of the school building pursuant to the terms of the will, but there was no donation of the lot by the city which it is alleged in the bill did not have any power or authority to purchase the lot or make any donation thereof. The will was admitted to probate May 7, 1884. The original bill was filed May 14, 1903, and the amended bill July 21, 1903.

The bill further set up that about the year 1898 the trustees erected on the lot so conveyed to them a building to be occupied as a school for the purpose of educating boys of the class mentioned in the fifth clause of the will, expending therein $5,000, and, although the building was so erected and completed in 1898, no steps had been taken by the city, or anyone, to put in operation a school for the purpose mentioned; that, before any school can be put in operation in the building, it is absolutely necessary and indispensable to furnish the necessary fixtures, furniture, apparatus, libraries, fuel, and janitor's services; that the school building must be properly cared for, and suitable persons employed and paid to keep the building, fixtures, and appurtenances in reasonable condition and repair; that the building should be insured, and the taxes and assessments thereon paid, all of which would require the annual expenditure of a large sum of money over and above the salary of teachers employed therein, and that the city has no power or authority to discharge or perform these indispensable duties for the operation of a school of the character mentioned, and the trustees are absolutely without power to pay these expenses; with the result that no one is authorized or able to give the building any care or attention whatever, and that it has remained vacant and unoccupied ever since its construction. Its windows and doors have been boarded up, and the same is becoming in a ruinous condition from lack of care and attention, no arrangements having been made or contemplated by any of the defendants, or otherwise, to maintain any school or carry into practical execution the provisions of the will; that the net income of the trust will not exceed $1,000 to $1,250 a year, and that sum is wholly insufficient and inadequate to pay the salaries of teachers in said school even if the other expenses mentioned were otherwise provided for, and the carrying on of such a school will require annually the expenditure of many times the amount of such net income; that pursuant to the mandate of the Constitution of Illinois there was at the time of the death of the testator a complete system of free public schools in force in Illinois, whereby all boys of the ages mentioned in the will could and can be educated without charge, and there are no boys in Illinois who are unable to educate themselves, and no class of persons to which the fifth clause of the will applies. The city has no power to levy any tax to support or maintain such a school, and the trust provision of the will is uncertain, illegal, indefinite, and incapable of being carried into execution.

It is further alleged in the bill that the defendant Grand Prairie seminary (successor to Onarga seminary) is a school conducted for profit, is not a charity under the laws of Illinois, and the trust provision of the will is void as against said Grand Prairie seminary, if otherwise valid, because it creates a perpetuity; and that it is impossible to ascertain and determine what school or seminary should receive the benefit of the trust in case no site for the erection of the building had been supplied by the city of Watseka.

It is further averred that the Grand Prairie seminary, claiming to be the school referred to in the will, filed a bill in the circuit court of Iroquois county, claiming the legacy in its own behalf, and that neither the complainant nor the city of Watseka was a party to that bill or concluded by the same in any way. That suit proceeded to final hearing and decision in the supreme court of Illinois, wherein it was finally determined that Grand Prairie seminary was not entitled to said fund. A final decree was made in that suit in the circuit court, June 30, 1896, declaring the trust illegal and void, and a final decision sustaining the trust was made by the supreme court of Illinois on February 14, 1898. 171 Ill. 444, 49 N. E. 516. Grand Prairie seminary answered the bill in this case. The trustees, the city of Watseka, and the attorney general demurred to the bill for want of equity, and also on the ground of gross laches and estoppel by election. The court sustained the demurrers, and entered a decree dismissing the original and amended bills for want of equity, reserving the question of costs on the pending motion. An order or decree was afterwards entered, denying the motion, and appeals taken from both degrees.

As tending to explain the delay in filing the bill, complainant stated in the amended bill that about a year and a half after the death of her father she removed to Nebraska. She was advised by the executors to believe that several years would elapse before the residuary fund in their hands as trustees would amount to $30,000, and that there was no necessity for her to assert any claim thereto, because the trust estate was required to remain in their custody. She was in limited circumstances, and unable to pay the expenses of instituting the proceedings to obtain a construction of the will, and, having entire confidence in the integrity, honesty, and responsibility of the trustees, she was induced to delay proceedings. In 1895 she first ascertained that steps were being taken by the Grand Prairie seminary to obtain a construction of the will, and during the pendency of that suit, and for a long time thereafter, she was informed and fully believed that the final decision in that case would settle and determine the rights of all the parties to the trust fund, and she did not learn otherwise until a short time before beginning this suit. She further submits that no injury has resulted to any of the parties claiming the trust fund by reason of her omission to commence suit earlier, and that the ultimate rights of the parties to the trust fund remain substantially unchanged. Upon the 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) argument the court disposed of the question of laches through the following expression by Judge Baker, in which we all concurred: The legacy is either void or valid. This is to be determined by the will. If valid, the delay is of no consequence; if void, the laches of appellant could not make it valid. In no event could it become the individual property of the trustees. That the bequest does not offend against the rule of perpetuities, because of perpetuity in the first taker, and is not void for remoteness, is equally clear; and is settled by the cases of Crerar v. Williams, 145 Ill. 625, 21 L.R.A. 454, 34 N. E. 467, and Ingraham v. Ingraham, 169 Ill. 432, 48 N. E. 561, 49 N. E. 320. See also Russell v. Allen, 107 U. S. 163, 27 L. ed. 397, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 327.

The only difficult question presented is that of definiteness and possibility of execution. The testator gave to his executors, to be held by them as trustees for the purpose of carrying out the full terms of the will, all his residuary estate. They are directed to manage the property until it has reached at least $30,000, when it is to form a fund to be known as the "Wells fund," to be used in the following manner: If the city of Watseka will donate a suitable lot within thirty days after notice by the trustees, said trustees shall cause a building to be erected on said lot for the purpose of educating boys who shall reside in Illinois between the ages of twelve and eighteen, and who are unable to educate themselves, to cost not exceeding $5,000; the balance to be kept at interest and the net income (except $10 a year set apart to keep the family burial lot in repair) shall be used for the purpose of paying teachers employed in the school.

Several important questions are presented. As the Illinois public-school system affords a free education to boys of the ages mentioned, it is urged: First, that there were not, and are not now, any boys in Illinois unable to educate themselves; second, if such a class is decided to exist, its members are said to be indefinite, and no means of selection provided, the trustees not being empowered to select them; and, third, that the will imperatively requires all income to be used for teachers' wages, leaving nothing for other things absolutely essential, such as heating, lighting, care of the schoolhouse, repairs, taxes, and board and clothing of the boys. Wherefore the scheme is alleged to be indefinite, impracticable, illusory, and void.

1. Is there a class of boys to which the charity may apply, notwithstanding the public-school system? Such system existed when the will was made, and when it became operative; and the testator was fully aware of its operation, scope, and limitations. Perceiving this, he well understood that there are many boys who are still unable to avail themselves of its great advantages; whether by reason of indifference of parents, poverty, and consequent necessity of earning their own living, or otherwise. It is said the class is not restricted in any way by the capacity, color, or condition of the beneficiaries; but it is enough to say that charity delights in uncertainty. "Charity begins where certainty in the beneficiaries ends." In fact such a certainty will avoid the trust. "It is the number and uncertainty of the objects, and not the mode of relieving them, which is the essential element of a charity." Dodge v. Williams, 46 Wis. 97, 1 N. W. 92, 50 N. W. 1107. Trusts for charitable purposes "may, and indeed must, be for the benefit of an indefinite number of persons; for if all the beneficiaries are personally designated, the trust lacks the essential element of indefiniteness, which is one characteristic of a legal charity." Russell v. Allen, supra. The very indefiniteness complained of is the best means of making the charity effective and beneficial, since those boys to whom the school may be of real and substantial good may be selected from the large class indicated. "The rule that, to raise a valid trust, there must be sufficient words, a definite subject, and a certain object, has its exception in charitable uses, of which uncertainty and indefiniteness of object are characteristic." Daly's Estate, 208 Pa. 58, 57 Atl. 180. In People ex rel. Ellert v. Cogswell, 113 Cal. 129, 35 L.R.A. 269, 45 Pac. 270, a trust was created for the erection and maintenance of a polytechnical college for the purpose of giving the boys and girls of the state of California a practical training in the mechanical arts and industries, the better to fit them to engage in the different pursuits of life. It was urged that the trust was void for uncertainty in the recipients, the trustees not being authorized to designate what boys and girls, and, if all applied, the trust would be impossible of execution. It was held that, when the class has been fixed, this very vagueness and uncertainty as to individuals and numbers are not only permitted, but are absolutely essential elements, in the creation of a valid charitable trust.

But it is also objected, as all children may obtain a free education in the public schools, there are no boys in Illinois unable to educate themselves. It is well known, notwithstanding the public schools are free to all, there is still a class of boys who are unable to attend them; among whom are orphans, the poor who need public assistance, and those obliged to labor during school hours. Such an objection has never been sustained by the courts, so far as we have been able to find; on the contrary, similar charities have been sustained in a number of cases. A trust for the education of the children of the state of Kentucky, particularly the poor and most unintelligent, was sustained in Bedford v. Bedford, 99 Ky. 273, 35 S. W. 926; Handley v. Palmer, 43 C. C. A. 100, 103 Fed. 39. Also a trust for a home and place for the maintenance and education of poor children, in Howe v. Wilson, 91 Mo. 45, 60 Am. Rep. 226, 3 S. W. 390. For the education of the poor or orphan children of a township. Mason v. Methodist Episcopal Church, 27 N. J. Eq. 47; State v. Smith, 16 Lea, 664. To establish an institution for the benefit, tuition, etc., of the youth residing from time to time in New Jersey. Stevens v. Shippen, 28 N. J. Eq. 487. For the support of a school for white children. Cincinnati v. McMicken, 6 Ohio C. C. 188. For the education and tuition of worthy indigent females. Dodge v. Williams, 46 Wis. 70, 1 N. W. 92, 50 N. W. 1103. See also Green v. Blackwell (N. J. Ch.) 35 Atl. 375; Re John, 30 Or. 494, 36 L.R.A. 242, 47 Pac. 341, 50 Pac. 226.

In Clement v. Hyde, 50 Vt. 716, 28 Am. Rep. 522, a trust for the education of "the scholars of the poor people" of a certain county was sustained, although the public schools were also open to them. The court says: "The public schools being open to the scholars of the poor as well as of the rich, and being supported by taxation, it is manifest that the testator did not intend to have his bounty so applied as to relieve the taxpayers in any measure of the burden of the support of these schools. Neither did he intend to have it applied to all of the children of the poor people of the county indiscriminately; for he has designated a definite class of such children,—the scholars, not necessarily those attending schools, but those children of this class who have an aptitude for learning, and who could not avail themselves, for the want of a suitable education, of the powers that the Creator has bestowed upon them, without extrinsic aid. If the trustee had applied the income arising from the trust fund in good faith, and in the exercise of ordinary discretion, in the purchase of books, payment of tuition or board of any of the class of scholars indicated, no one, we think, would doubt about his accomplishing the intention of the testator. If the trustee hesitates to take the exercise of this discretion upon him, it is clearly the province of the court of chancery to aid him by devising a scheme for the appropriation of the income of the fund. Where a trust is created for a charitable use, the application will be effected by means of a scheme, to be directed and approved of by the court of chancery."

Leeds v. Shaw, 82 Ky. 79, was a trust to a school district, "for the education of poor children, or for the maintenance of a good common school in said district." It was held that the beneficiaries were children residing within the district, and who were by law entitled to the benefits of the common-school system of the state; and that the bequest was confined to white children, because there was then no law for the participation of colored children in the benefits of the common-school system; and the same result was reached in Moore v. Moore, 4 Dana, 354, 29 Am. Dec. 417, where there was a trust for educating "some poor orphans" of a particular county, "and to be confined to such as are not able to educate themselves."

2. But who is to select the limited number to be brought into the school under the small provision made, not exceeding $1,500 a year? The rule stated by Mr. Perry is relied on: "The courts in America have generally declined . . . to administer these indefinite gifts to charity or religion or education or public utility unless there was a trustee appointed by the testator to exercise his discretion in applying the gift to particular objects or persons." [2 Perry, Tr. 5th ed. § 719.]

Here there are trustees, but it is insisted that they have no power to select the charitable donees. The will appoints the trustees "for the purpose of carrying out the full terms" of the will, and directs that they shall manage the estate. In Grand Prairie Seminary v. Morgan, 171 Ill. 444, 49 N. E. 516, involving this same will, the supreme court of Illinois held that these provisions were intended to provide for trustees to control the disposition of the fund; but that, in any event, a court of chancery might appoint a trustee for that purpose. In Guilford v. Arthur, 158 Ill. 600, 41 N. E. 1009, a trust was created for the benefit of "widows and home and school for orphans of deceased members of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers," the property to be held under such rules and regulations as should be provided by the brotherhood. It was held that the trustee and the brotherhood had power to determine with certainty the beneficiaries. We think the will intends the trustees to manage the estate after the building should be built; and that this objection is not well taken. In any event a trustee may, if necessary, be appointed by 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the proper state court, to select the beneficiaries.

3. The most serious question, however, is whether the express direction of the will that all the income shall be used to pay the teachers must be literally executed, even though it may render the scheme abortive. Would it be a breach of trust to devote part of the income to pay for heating and other necessary expenses, or to the boys' support, so as to enable those selected to receive tuition? Or may education be regarded as the leading or dominant purpose of the charity, and effect be given to it by such a variation of the scheme as to make it practical and successful? The testator mentions the schoolhouse, the school, education, and teachers; thus making education his general object and purpose. He does not expressly refer to such things as are absolutely essential to such purpose, such as heat, light, care, repairs, etc.; essential because there can be no continuous use of the building without repairs and care, no school without heat and light; possibly no teachers or students without some pecuniary help to the latter.

After reasonable provision for his only heir and her children, the testator wished to devote the rest of his property to a charity. In this he was dictated less by policy than benevolence; and it was not as an expiation, for his property did not come from public spoliation. No need to examine with a microscope the gift to ascertain whether it bears any taint of unlawful gain, or selfishness, or personal or family interest; for from all these it is absolutely free. His benevolent and philanthropic purpose was to reach an unfortunate class of boys, and bring their hearts and minds under the benign influence of education. This he endeavored to bring about by appealing to the natural rivalry between adjoining communities; thus shrewdly adopting the very best means to secure the school in his own home city. True, he also wished to perpetuate his name by calling the gift the "Wells fund;" but this may be pardoned, and even be called laudable. Evidently he thought that "a boy is better unborn than untaught;" perhaps influenced by something he had himself missed, and valued accordingly. His dominant purpose is thus not only worthy and laudable, but clearly outlined, lacking only in perfection of detail; and is to be construed with the greatest liberality. Hunt v. Fowler, 121 Ill. 269, 12 N. E. 331, 17 N. E. 491; Ould v. Washington Hospital, 95 U. S. 303, 313, 24 L. ed. 450, 452. So construed, will a court of equity permit his charity to fail because he has not fully worked out the details of his plan? Or because, in practice, it is somewhat inconsistent? The whole income cannot be applied, as literally directed, to teachers' wages, since there can be no teaching without other things. To earn wages, or have education, or carry on the designated school, or make it in any degree successful, or even tolerable, there must be heat, and light, and paid labor. To mention education, a school, a building, and teachers, is to impliedly mention those things essential to their success, if not to their very existence. A literal, ironbound construction makes the plan impossible, and defeats it. A liberal one saves it, through a mere change of detail, and thus gives effect to the testator's worthy purpose. Qui hæret in litera, hæret in cortice.

A limited application of the equitable rule of cy près, or the so-called "doctrine of approximation," is relied on for permitting a change of plan, by which the income, restricted by the will to teachers' wages, may be partly applied to other expenses necessarily preceding them. This is on the theory that the testator's main purpose was education, and that he could not have intended to so limit and hamper the use of the money as to defeat the very object designed. This dominant purpose to found a school and furnish the means of education being clear, imperfect or impossible details of method may be corrected, so long as the main object—education—is secured and preserved. Such correction of detail has often been adopted by the courts, and nowhere with more liberality than in Illinois. Instance the cases hereafter referred to of the John Crerar will, where the impossible direction to form a corporation was disregarded; and the school-district trust in Heuser v. Harris, where an incongruous direction as to the method of electing a trustee was also disregarded. An impossible, or even unlawful, plan may be corrected, in order to carry out the main trust purpose. Any other course would sometimes defeat the very purpose of the trust, disappoint just expectations, and destroy gifts of great public importance and utility. While some courts have entirely rejected the rule of cy près, and it has sometimes been characterized, like the evidentiary rule of res gestæ, as a cloak for loose reasoning, and as a means of interpretation which finds a meaning where none exists, yet its judicial application has usually been most just, enlightened, and beneficial. Where a main charitable purpose is disclosed with reasonable clearness, directions of the donor relating to management of the trust, not intended as limitations, will be regarded as directory only, and not mandatory, if necessary to preserve the trust, and carry out its leading purpose. In such cases, it will be presumed that specified details of management were meant to be governed by circumstances; and this whether they be either impracticable or illegal. Administrative duties may be varied, details changed, and the main purpose carried out cy près, or as nearly as possible according to the plan prescribed by the trust instrument. A further application of the cy près rule sometimes takes place when the object itself fails; as a charity to emancipate slaves, made inoperative by their complete freedom; but it is not necessary to consider that aspect of the doctrine here.

The following cases illustrate the rule stated: When a definite charity is created, the failure of the particular mode by which its dominant purpose is to be effected will not defeat the charity, for equity will substitute another mode. Thus, where the testator provided that the trustee should not make any sale or other or different alienation from a certain one indicated, but did not so phrase such provision as to make it a condition, but merely an administrative limitation in respect to the management of the trust, it was taken to have been intended to advance the dominant purpose of the will, or the maintenance of the charity; and an alienation to further such purpose was permitted. The court said that it was clear that this involved no phase of what is known as the prerogative power of cy près, nor was it an instance which called for the exercise of the usual judicial power of cy près. Lackland v. Walker, 151 Mo. 210, 52 S. W. 414. It was also said by the court in the same case that this change of mode was not a deviation from the founder's intention as to the objects of the charity, but only from his directions as to management, varying only administrative duties, which were, no doubt, originally meant to be governed by circumstances. The difference was akin to that between the substance and its incidents, on the one hand, and form, or the rules of administrative detail, on the other; or the difference between the end in view and the means of its accomplishment.

In McDonogh v. Murdoch, 15 How. 367, 14 L. ed. 732, cited in Russell v. Allen, 107 U. S. 163, 27 L. ed. 397, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 327, a charitable trust was sustained, and it was held that the testator's directions as to the management of the income "must be regarded as subsidiary to the general objects of his will, and, whether legal and practicable or otherwise, can exert no influence over the question of its validity." "Assuming that the whole scheme of management should fail, the charitable use will not be permitted

In Amory v. Atty. Gen. 179 Mass. 89, 60 N. E. 391, there was a trust to create a home for poor women and their young children, for a temporary home for invalid women, both young and old, and for the poor, sick, and weary, of any denomination. The home was to be administered by a sisterhood, and, if it should not accept, the property was to be conveyed to a hospital for the same purposes. Both the sisterhood and the hospital refused the gift; and the master reported that the scheme could not be carried out as described in the will. It was also provided by the will that the trustees should not sell certain real estate known as "Seven Oaks." It was held that the fact that the scheme could not be carried out as prescribed was not fatal to the charity, but that it should be carried out as nearly as possible under the sanction of the court. Also, that "Seven Oaks" might be sold, especially as its sale was authorized by a codicil to the will. See also Stuart v. Easton, 21 C. C. A. 146, 39 U. S. App. 238, 74 Fed. 854, citing Re John C. Mercer Home for Disabled Clergymen, 162 Pa. 232, 29 Atl. 731, as to change of plan. John v. Smith, 42 C. C. A. 275, 102 Fed. 218.

When a definite function or duty is to be performed, and it cannot be done in exact conformity to the scheme of the donor, it must be performed with as close an approximation to that scheme as reasonably practicable, and thus enforced. It is the doctrine of approximation. It is not confined to the administration of charities, but is equally applicable to all devises and contracts wherein the future is provided for; and it is an essential element of equity jurisprudence. Philadelphia v. Girard, 45 Pa. 9, 28, 84 Am. Dec. 470. The doctrine of cy pres, in its last analysis, is found to be a simple rule of judicial construction, designed to aid the court to ascertain and carry out, as nearly as may be, the intention of the donor. Doyle v. Whalen, 87 Me. 414, 31 L.R.A. 118, 32 Atl. 1022, 1026; Taylor v. Keep, 2 Ill. App. 368, 383.

In Wisconsin the supreme court has quite recently adopted a more liberal rule as to charitable trusts of personal property than that formerly prevailing, and the legislature has followed by recognizing the validity of charitable trusts of real estate. See chapter 511, p. 950, Laws 1905, amending § 2039, Rev. Stat. 1898; Rev. Stat. Supp. p. 1057.

In Kronshage v. Varrell, 120 Wis. 161, 97 N. W. 928, a testator, after reciting that, "having in mind the many catastrophes resulting from the actions of the elements, and the great suffering, distress, famine, and want caused by the destruction of life and property by storms, floods, fires, and other accidental and natural causes; and having a desire to do what I can to relieve the same,"—made a bequest to trustees to annually expend a certain income for the purpose of relieving the wants, distress, and suffering arising from such causes, and for the purpose of aiding the victims of such accidents and catastrophes. No restriction was placed upon the trustees as to the locality where the moneys should be expended, but the will enjoined upon them to select subjects worthy of assistance, and to use their best judgment and prudence in so handling the moneys that they might be of the greatest possible assistance to suffering humanity. It was held that the bequest was not to charity generally, but defined a class of beneficiaries with such definiteness as would enable the court to determine whether any concrete expenditure was within the scheme of the testator. The court says: "The degree of definiteness essential to the validity of any grant in trust for charity is a subject so recently treated at large, and as to which our attitude is so unambiguously declared in Harrington v. Pier, 105 Wis. 485, 50 L.R.A. 307, 76 Am. St. Rep. 924, 82 N. W. 345, that we cannot justify extended review of either its history or of the writings of authors or judges upon it generally. This court has decided, disregarding the reasons which some others have deemed controlling, that there are inherent in our courts all the strictly judicial powers ever exercised by the chancellor or the high court of chancery of England to find means to carry into effect a charitable purpose entertained by a testator or grantor; that such courts lack only the prerogative cy pres power enjoyed by the sovereign to apply all goods devised to any charitable purpose to purposes never declared or even entertained by the donor, under certain circumstances, which prerogative power was in some degree exercised by the chancellor by delegation from the sovereign. All that is necessary is that the deviser shall place his property in trust, and designate a charitable purpose of his own narrower than the field of charity generally. The courts can find and will then see to it that a trustee is provided, if none be designated, and that means will be found to apply the property to the purpose, if no method be prescribed. They are limited to the defined purpose, and they must ascertain it from the words of the testator, but, in ascertaining it, may and will indulge the most liberal construction. Re Donges, 103 Wis. 497, 74 Am. St. Rep. 885, 79 N. W. 786."

In Harrington v. Pier, supra, a will gave three fourths of the net residuary personal estate to trustees to expend in temperance work in the city of Milwaukee. The trust was sustained, the court laying down the following rules: The common-law system of trusts for charitable uses did not originate with, nor is it dependent upon, the statute of 43 Eliz. chap. 4. A trust for a particular and valid charitable purpose, as distinguished from a bequest in trust for charity generally, was sustainable in chancery before the statute of Elizabeth solely by the judicial power of the court, and to that extent such statute was merely confirmatory of the common law; and to the same extent such statute was adopted as a part of the common law of this country and prevails in this state.

In sustaining a trust of the character last above indicated, courts of equity resort to liberal rules of construction to determine the intent of the donor, enabling them to go to the limit of the general purpose indicated by the donor and do everything necessary to enforce such purpose, but not to go outside of it into the realms of prerogative authority governed by the cy près doctrine strictly so called. The cy près doctrine, as indicative of prerogative authority, does not prevail in this state, but, as regards liberal rules of construction of charitable trusts, applied in chancery in England independent of the statute of Elizabeth, it does prevail.

Cy près power, as commonly understood, has two features: One, the right to exercise prerogative authority, enabling a court to deal with a bequest to a charitable use having no designated particular purpose as a bequest to charity generally, treating the purpose as the legatee, or a bequest for an illegal purpose, or some purpose impossible of execution for some reason; and the other, the right, by liberal rules of construction, to deal with a trust having a designated particular purpose, though in general terms, and enforce it within the limits of such purpose, supplying the trustee if necessary. The former is not exercised here, but the latter is. Similar definition and application of this "doctrine of approximation" have been uniformly made by the supreme court of Illinois. In Heuser v. Harris, 42 Ill. 425, lands were directed to be sold, and one half the proceeds was to go to a certain school district, to be used for school purposes only, and to be under the control of one trustee, to be elected by "the people" of the district for the term of four years. The other half was to go to the poor of Madison county. It was objected that the scheme was utterly impracticable, because the will provided no lawful method for the election of the trustee. It was held 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) that, if the trustee should not be elected, the district could apply to chancery to supply one; and the court would, in order to carry out the intent of the testator, by liberal intendment, appoint. "We entertain no doubt," say the court, "if the election of a trustee and his qualification are impracticable, a court of chancery, on a proper application, would remodel the will in this regard, cy près, as near as possible to effectuate the design of the testator."

In Crerar v. Williams, 145 Ill. 625, 21 L.R.A. 454, 34 N. E. 467, there was a trust for the erection, creation, maintenance, and endowment of a free public library; and providing for a corporation to carry out the trust. It was objected that the corporation could not be legally organized. Held that, whether this was so or not, the gift was valid; that, even though the provisions for putting the library into practical operation might be held impossible of execution, the court would consider the charity as the substance, and, if the designated mode failed, would provide another by which it might take effect. The same conclusion is reached in Andrews v. Andrews, 110 Ill. 223; Hunt v. Fowler, 121 Ill. 276, 12 N. E. 331, 17 N. E. 491; and Grand Prairie Seminary v. Morgan, 171 Ill. 444, 49 N. E. 516. Such being the rule in Illinois, the Federal courts will follow it as a rule of property. Jones v. Habersham, 107 U. S. 174, 27 L. ed. 401, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 336; Bucher v. Cheshire R. Co. 125 U. S. 555, 31 L. ed. 795, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 974. We also think the same result would follow from an application of the liberal rules of construction adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States, and many of the states, appearing from the foregoing citations.

On the appeal from the decree denying the appellant costs out of the estate, we adopt the conclusions of the circuit court which follow: "When the terms of a will are so ambiguous that resort to a court of equity is necessary to obtain a construction of the said will it may be proper for the court to order the costs of the parties to the proceeding, together with reasonable solicitors' fees, to be paid out of the estate of the testator. Such cases have arisen where the executor has filed a bill to have determined the respective rights of various legatees which, under the ambiguous terms of the will, are not clearly defined, and which the executor is justified in asking the aid of equity in construing. In such a case it is equitable that the common fund should bear the expenses of the proceeding. This cause, however, presents no such situation. Complainant seeks to have the court declare void testator's bequest to charity, and, the trust failing, she would then take the property as heir. The suit is one plainly for her own interest alone, and not for the interest of the defendant trustees who have been in possession of the property for years and engaged in carrying out the terms of the will. No case has been pointed out to me in which the court has gone to the extent of allowing fees to complainant's solicitor out of a trust estate under conditions similar to those of the case at bar. The case most strongly in complainant's favor is that of Ingraham v. Ingraham, 169 Ill. 432, 48 N. E. 561, 49 N. E. 320. Were I willing to subscribe to the doctrine of that case as to the allowance of fees, which I am not, I feel that the rule should not be further extended to embrace an allowance to the heir in this suit for securing a second adjudication of the validity of the bequest in clause 5, inasmuch as a construction thereof was made by the supreme court of Illinois in 1898, which was binding on all parties save the complainant herein, and under which construction of the will the parties for years have acted. The trustees neither desired, nor did they need, a further adjudication that the trust was valid. This suit was of no benefit to them as a guide to their future administration of the trust estate, for complainant has no standing to secure for the trustees the direction of the court as to the administration of the trust."

It may be further observed that the circuit court would have no jurisdiction of a suit brought merely to construe a will in order to obtain specific direction as to the duties of executors or trustees; since the "amount in controversy" would be lacking. Kurtz v. Moffitt, 115 U. S. 487, 29 L. ed. 458, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 150. It is the appellant's claim to the estate, founded on the position that the trust provision is invalid, which gave the circuit court jurisdiction. The fact that such claim renders a construction of the will necessary does not entitle appellant to counsel fees, because the jurisdiction depends on her claim as heir, and not on her right to have, incidentally, a construction of the will.

The decrees of the Circuit Court are affirmed.

JAMES H. FARRIGAN

v.

HENRY A. PEVEAR et al.

(— Mass. —, 78 N. E. 855.)

Trust—negligent servant—liability.

The rule of respondent superior does not apply in case of trustees who are administering a fund created for the sole purpose of educating and maintaining indigent boys without recompense, who have exercised reasonable care to select competent servants; and therefore they are not liable for injury to one servant through negligent orders given him by another.

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Superior Court for Worcester County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which defendants were alleged to be responsible, which resulted in a verdict in defendants' favor. Overruled.

Plaintiff was in the employ of defendants, and claimed that while in the performance of his work he was directed to work in a dangerous place, to wit, in a pump pit in an engine room which was filled with noxious gases which escaped from the exhaust pipe of a gasoline engine. For the injuries thereby caused he instituted this action.

Messrs. George S. Taft and George R. Stobbs, for plaintiff:

The doctrine of the inviolability of the trust fund was repudiated in Mersey Docks & Harbour Board Trustees v. Gibbs, L. R. 1 H. L. 93, in 1866.

The funds of a public charity may be diverted to pay for torts committed in the administration of the fund.

Powers v. Massachusetts Homeopathic

Case Note.—Liability of charitable institutions for personal injuries:—The liability of charitable institutions maintained by a state or municipality for personal torts of their agents or servants is the title of a note in 4 L.A. (N.S.) 269; and cases of that kind are therefore not included in this note.

While the courts have not agreed as to the fundamental reason for nonliability, they have generally held that such institutions are not liable in damages for personal injuries.

Powers v. Massachusetts Homeopathic Hospital, 101 Fed. 896, Affirmed in 65 L.R.A. 372, 47 C. C. A. 122, 109 Fed. 294, was a suit for damages for injury to a patient through neglect of one of the hospital nurses. Defendant was held not liable, and the decision in both courts was based upon the ground that one who accepts the benefit of either a public or a private charity enters into a relation which exempts his benefactor from liability for the negligence of his servants, if the benefactor has used due care in selecting those servants.

The decision in Currier v. Dartmouth College, 105 Fed. 886, was put upon the same ground. Here a student of the college, an Hospital, 65 L.R.A. 372, 47 C. C. A. 129, 109 Fed. 294; Davis v. Central Cong. Soc. 129 Mass. 367, 37 Am. Rep. 368.

If the defendants saw fit to hire the plaintiff to assist them in their administration of the trust, their obligations to him are as broad as though they hired him in connection with their private business.

Breen v. Field, 157 Mass. 277, 31 N. E. 1075; Gilbert v. Trinity House, L. R. 17 Q. B. Div. 795.

Messrs. Parker & Milton and George A. Gaskill for defendants.

Braley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Stetson Home, of which the defendants are trustees, was founded and is maintained under a trust created by gift for the sole purpose of affording an education and maintenance for destitute boys, and whatever advantages the institution offers are conferred without compensation. These distinctive features are ample to bring the home, even if unincorporated, within that class of benevolent institutions whose sole purpose is to furnish relief to destitute and deserving people, and therefore constitutes a valid public charity. Bartlett v. Nye, 4 Met. 378, 380; Odell v. Odell, 10 Allen, 1, 4; Jackson v. Phillips, 14 Allen, 539; Sherman v. Congregational Home Missionary Soc. 176 Mass. 349, 57 N. E. 702; Minot v. Atty. Gen. 189 Mass. 176, 179, 75 N. E. 149. At the outset it may be said that the case of Davis v. Central Cong. Soc. 129 Mass. 367, 37 Am. Rep. 368, on which the plaintiff relies, and that of Smethurst v. Independent Cong. Church, 148 Mass. 261, 2 L.R.A. 695, 12 Am. St. Rep. 550, 19 N. E. 387, are not authorities in his favor, as the question of the liability of a public charity institution organized and managed solely for the administration of a public charity, was injured by the alleged negligence of the superintendent of college buildings while engaged in clearing a tract of land for college purposes. This case was affirmed in 54 C. C. A. 430, 117 Fed. 44, on the ground that plaintiff was a mere looker-on, who was entitled to protection only as against wanton or wilful negligence, which did not appear in the case.

In Downes v. Harper Hospital, 101 Mich. 555, 25 L.R.A. 602, 45 Am. St. Rep. 427, 60 N. W. 42, it was held that those accepting the benefit of a charity accept it upon the understanding that the fund cannot be indirectly diverted by the tortious or negligent acts of the managers of the fund, or their employees, though such acts result in damage. This was a case of injury to a patient.

This rule was followed in Pepke v. Grace Hospital, 130 Mich. 493, 90 N. W. 278, where the alleged injury was to a patient.

In Parks v. Northwestern University, 121 Ill. App. 512, the liability of the university to a student who lost an eye through the alleged negligence of one of the professors was denied upon the ground that the law will not permit the trustee to divert or use the funds or property of his trust for any object not contemplated in the trust, and what the law will not permit the trustee to do it will not do itself. This case was affirmed in 218 Ill. 381, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 556, 75 N. E. 991.

In McDonald v. Massachusetts General Hospital, 120 Mass. 432, 21 Am. Rep. 529, it was held that a charity hospital was not liable to a charity patient for unskillful surgical treatment by the house surgeon, if due care was exercised in selecting him. The court said that the funds of such an institution were not to be diminished by such casualties, if those immediately controlling them had done their whole duty 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) in reference to those who had sought to obtain the benefit of them.

In the following cases the exemption of such institutions from liability was put upon the ground of public policy:

Thus, in Hearn v. Waterbury Hospital, 66 Conn. 98, 31 L.R.A. 224, 33 Atl. 595, it was held that a charitable corporation maintaining a hospital was not liable, on the ground of public policy, for an injury to a patient caused by the personal, wrongful neglect of servants who had been selected with due care. The court showed a leaning in favor of the doctrine first noted above when it said: "Such patient who may be injured by the wrongful act of a hospital servant is not a mere third party, a stranger to the transaction. He is rather a participant. The thing about which the servants are employed is the healing of the sick. This is set in motion, not for the benefit of the defendant, but of the public. Surely, those who accept the benefit, contributing also by their payments to the public enterprise, and not to the private pocket of the defendant, assist as truly as the defendant in setting the whole thing in motion."

In Van Tassel v. Manhattan Eye & Ear Hospital, 39 N. Y. S. R. 781, 15 N. Y. Supp. 620, it was held that the hospital, being a charitable corporation, was not liable to a charity patient for a negligent operation, nor for negligent treatment after the operation,—except where it failed to exercise due care in the selection of its surgeon or other employees.

A patient cannot recover from a charity hospital for an injury due to the negligence of a nurse who so placed or left a hot-water bottle that it severely burned the patient while unconscious. Joel v. Woman's Hospital, 89 Hun, 73, 35 N. Y. Supp. 37; Ward v. St. Vincent's Hospital, 23 Misc. 91, 50 N. Y. Supp. 466; Conner v. Sisters of Poor, 7 Ohio N. P. 514.

for the negligence of its servants or agents does not appear to have been raised or decided. See Minns v. Billings, 183 Mass. 126, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 686, 97 Am. St. Rep. 420, 66 N. E. 593; Osgood v. Rogers, 186 Mass. 238, 240, 71 N. E. 306. Compare Chapin v. Holyoke Y. M. C. A. 165 Mass. 280, 42 N. E. 1130, and Donnelly v. Boston Catholic Cemetery Asso. 146 Mass. 163, 15 N. E. 505. Under the authority of McDonald v. Massachusetts General Hospital, 120 Mass. 432, 21 Am. Rep. 529, if the home had been incorporated the plaintiff could not have maintained this action against it, for if properly selected such a corporation was held in that case not to be liable for the negligence of its servants when acting in the performance of their prescribed duties. See also Benton v. City Hospital, 140 Mass. 13, 54 Am. Rep. 436, 1 N. E. 836. Among the reasons given for this exemption it has been said that, being a charitable institution rendering services to the public without pecuniary profit, if the property of the charity was depleted by the payment of damages its usefulness might be either impaired or wholly destroyed, the object of the founder or donors defeated, and charitable gifts discouraged; or that, if an individual accepts the benefit of a public charity, he thereby enters into a relation which exempts his benefactor from liability for the negligence of servants who are employed in its administration, provided due care has been used in their selection. McDonald v. Massachusetts General Hospital, ubi supra; Perry v. House of Refuge, 63 Md. 20, 52 Am. Rep. 495; Williamson v. Louisville Industrial School, 95 Ky. 251, 23 L.R.A. 200, 44 Am. St. Rep. 243, 24 S. W. 1065; Fire Ins. Patrol v. Boyd, 120 Pa. 624, 1 L.R.A. 417, 6 Am. St. Rep. 745, 15 Atl. 553; Pow-

In Collins v. New York Post Graduate Medical School, 59 App. Div. 63, 69 N. Y. Supp. 106, it was said that the law was too well settled in this state to permit a recovery against a charitable institution for a wrong committed by one of its surgeons, who performed the operation gratuitously.

In Wilson v. Brooklyn Homeopathic Hospital, 97 App. Div. 37, 89 N. Y. Supp. 619, it was held that, if the patient paid only for board and attendance, and not for the surgeon's services, the charity hospital was not liable for his negligence, in the absence of proof that it failed to exercise reasonable care and diligence in the selection and employment of the surgeon.

The fact that the institution receives pay from those who accept the benefit of the charity is immaterial upon this question, such amounts not being for private gain, but to enable it more effectually to accomplish the purpose for which it was founded. Powers v. Massachusetts Homeopathic Hospital; Downes v. Harper Hospital; Parks v. Northwestern University; McDonald v. Massachusetts General Hospital; Collins v. New York Post Graduate Medical School; Ward v. St. Vincent's Hospital; and Conner v. Sisters of Poor,—supra.

It would seem from statements made in a number of the cases that, upon proof that the institution failed to exercise reasonable care and diligence in the selection of its servants or agents, it would be liable for their negligence; and such was the actual holding in Glavin v. Rhode Island Hospital, 12 R. I. 411, 34 Am. Rep. 675.

In Hewett v. Woman's Hospital Aid Asso. post, 496, it was held that charitable associations were not immune from liability for negligent injuries to their servants.

In Donaldson v. General Public Hospital, 30 N. B. 279, plaintiff was accepted and taken into the hospital as a patient. It was known that he required care, nursing, and medical attention, but he was negligently left without these for three days, by reason of which he suffered much pain, and lost his right eye. It was held that persons or corporations who take upon themselves to do acts of charity, or other public acts, gratuitously, must pay for the negligence of their servants, and that the funds of the hospital can be applied in satisfaction of a judgment for damages.

The general rule of nonliability seems to be applicable, although the injured party bears no contract relation with the institution, and was not at the time of injury accepting its bounty.

Thus, in Noble v. Hahnemann Hospital, 112 App. Div. 663, 98 N. Y. Supp. 605, the plaintiff was injured on a public street by a collision between her vehicle and an ambulance belonging to the hospital. The court said there would seem to be no distinction whether the servant, he being competent for the service in which he was engaged, carelessly injures one while in the hospital or in the street. But the nonliability of the hospital was placed upon the ground that the hospital, in running its ambulance under a contract with the city and in response to a call from the police department, was performing a duty imposed upon the city as one of its governmental functions.

In Benton v. City Hospital, 140 Mass. 13, 54 Am. Rep. 436, 1 N. E. 836, the hospital was held not liable to a person who entered the building upon an implied invitation to arrange for the removal of her grandchild, and who, upon leaving the hospital, tripped and fell down a stairway which she was directed by a hospital attendant to use, the unsafe condition of the stairway being due to the negligence of the superintendent.

In Fordyce v. Woman's Christian Nat. Library Asso. post, 485, it seems that the injured party was injured while walking along the public highway; but no importance was attached to this fact.

ers v. Massachusetts Homœopathic Hospital, 65 L.R.A. 372, 47 C. C. A. 122, 109 Fed. 294, 303. But, whatever grounds may have been stated in support of these and other decisions which have held public charities exempt from actions caused by the negligence of attendants or servants, such an exemption may well rest upon the application of the rule of law which makes the principal accountable for the acts of his servant or agent. Accordingly the true inquiry is whether this rule applies to the defendants. They are not shown to have selected incompetent servants, and are conceded not only to have been ignorant of the conditions which caused the alleged injury, but to have given to the plaintiff no instructions; nor can there be imputed to them knowledge in fact of any order given by their agents to him.

But the case of Foreman v. Canterbury, L. R. 6 Q. B. 214, following the decision in the leading case of Mersey Docks & Harbour Board Trustees v. Gibbs, L. R. 1 H. L. 93, it was decided that there was no distinction as to liability for the negligence of servants whether they were employed by a corporation established for a public purpose, or by a private person or corporation. This doctrine was approved and followed in the cases of Glavin v. Rhode Island Hospital, 12 R. I. 411, 34 Am. Rep. 675, and of Donaldson v. General Public Hospital, 30 N. B. 279, where a public charity was held liable in tort for damages suffered by patients from the negligence of servants, though subsequently, by R. I. Pub. Laws 1880, p. 107, chap. 802, such institutions in that state are now exempt from this burden. The plaintiff's argument in effect asks us to follow the last two cases, which have been decided since our former decision in Mc-

Donald v. Massachusetts General Hospital, supra. But in this commonwealth the rule of liability enunciated by the principal case has not been so broadly applied, and neither cities nor towns, in the performance of authorized municipal acts independently of certain exceptions defined by our decisions, nor public officers, although liable in damages for personal acts of negligence which cause injury to the persons or property of others when discharging the duties of their office, are held liable for the misfeasance of their servants. Hill v. Boston, 122 Mass. 344, 23 Am. Rep. 332; Tindley v. Salem, 137 Mass. 171, 50 Am. Rep. 289; Benton v. City Hospital, ubi supra; Rome v. Worcester, 188 Mass. 307, 74 N. E. 370; Dickinson v. Boston, 188 Mass. 595, 599, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 664, 75 N. E. 68, and cases cited; Moynihan v. Todd, 188 Mass. 301, 304-306, 108 Am. St. Rep. 473, 74 N. E. 367, and cases cited; Haley v. Boston, 191 Mass. 291, 292, 77 N. E. 888. See also 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 974. The reason for this rule is that acting for the benefit of the public solely in representing a public interest, whether by a municipality, or by a public officer, does not involve such a private pecuniary interest as lies at the foundation of the doctrine of respondet superior. While such officers may well be held liable for their personal negligence, it would be unreasonable and harsh to hold them responsible for the negligence of their servants or agents.

There would seem to be in principle no sound distinction between a suit for negligence by which personal injuries have been received, directly instituted against the charity by the person injured, where its corporate form renders such procedure possible or expedient, and the present case.

In Fire Ins. Patrol v. Boyd, 120 Pa. 624, 1 L.R.A. 417, 6 Am. St. Rep. 745, 15 Atl. 553, it was held that a charitable corporation was not liable for the negligence of its employees in throwing bundles from a burning building, while engaged in work for which the corporation was created, thereby injuring a person on the sidewalk. In this case the court said: "A public charity, whether incorporated or not, is but a trustee, and is bound to apply its funds in furtherance of the charity, and not otherwise."

In Winnemore v. Philadelphia, 18 Pa. Super. Ct. 625, it appeared that Stephen Girard, by will, provided for a college for the education of orphans, and directed that a building be erected upon a separate square of ground in such a manner as to secure a safe and permanent income for the maintenance of the college. The will also provided that the income from the building should be used in keeping the building in repair, and the net residue should go to the 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

college, and should not at any time be applied to any other purpose. Plaintiff, an employee of a tenant in this building, was injured through the negligence of the operator of an elevator in the building. It was held that plaintiff was entitled to recover, and that the results of negligent acts of servants necessary to the management of the building must be regarded as an incident to the management and as chargeable among the items of costs of such management. The case was distinguished from the preceding case on the ground that here the trustee was acting under the terms of a will which provided for the protection of income from a source independent of the charity, and the act of negligence was committed by one having no connection with the charity, save only that he was assisting in the work of making income from property not used in any way for the direct purposes of the charitable trust.

The object of the charity is the same whether administered by trustees elected by a corporation, or selected and appointed under a deed of gift; and, even if the terms of the settlement are not referred to in the exceptions, the trust is stated to be perpetual, and if so its provisions can be enforced in equity. Under either form of administration, those who administer the trust act essentially in a representative, and not in a private, capacity; and such trustees are not within the rule which holds the master liable, because as we have said, in its application the servant is acting, not only under his orders, but for the benefit and in the furtherance of the master's business. Farwell v. Boston & W. R. Corp. 4 Met. 49, 55, 38 Am. Dec. 339.

In no correct or just sense can it be said that the defendants were conducting a business, or engaged in an enterprise, from which they received, or could expect to derive, any monetary advantage, or private emolument. They were serving without compensation in the supervision of a home for indigent boys, which was established for the purpose of enabling them to become self-supporting and efficient members of society. Their duty to the plaintiff in the exercise of this function did not extend beyond the requirement of using reasonable care to select competent servants, and the demands of substantial justice are met if as charitable trustees they are not charged with the negligence of those so employed. McDonald v. Massachusetts General Hospital, ubi supra.

We are not unmindful that the remedy which the plaintiff may have against a fellow servant for the negligence, if any, which caused the accident may be wholly theoretical, and of little practical value; yet we deem it to be in accord not only with our own decisions, but with the weight of authority, to decide that the present action cannot be maintained, and that the ruling directing a verdict for the defendant was right. Heriot's Hospital v. Ross, 12 Clark & F. 507; Powers v. Massachusetts Homoeopathic Hospital; Perry v. House of Refuge; Williamson v. Louisville Industrial School; and Fire Ins. Patrol v. Boyd,—ubi supra; Van Tassell v. Manhattan Eye & Ear Hospital, 15 N. Y. Supp. 620, 621, and note (39 N. Y. S. R. 781); Joel v. Woman's Hospital, 89 Hun, 73, 35 N. Y. Supp. 37; Downes v. Harper Hospital, 101 Mich. 555, 25 L.R.A. 602, 45 Am. St. Rep. 427, 60 N. W. 42; Pepke v. Grace Hospital, 130 Mich. 493, 90 N. W. 278; *Hearns v. ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

FORDYCE et al., Appts.,

v.

WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN NATIONAL LIBRARY ASSOCIATION.

Charity—library.

1. A charitable trust attaches to property secured for its purposes by a corporation organized to maintain a library for the benefit of the members and of the multitude of people who visit the city, where anyone contributing a certain amount towards the purposes of the enterprise may become a member, and the funds are secured by membership fees and charitable contributions.

Patent—fee.

2. The vesting of a fee in the grantee of real estate is not prevented by the fact that the land was public and Congress authorized its purchase for the purpose of a public library, the patent, however, containing no conditions or limitations upon the character of estate conveyed.

Base fee—execution.

3. A base or conditional fee is subject to seizure and sale under execution against the one in whom it is vested.

Charity—execution.

4. The property of a charity cannot be sold under execution issued on a judgment rendered for the nonfeasance, misfeasance, or malfeasance of its agents or trustees.

Same—judgment—execution—recovery of possession.

5. That a charitable corporation has permitted a judgment to go against it for the negligence of its agent and its property to be sold under an execution does not prevent it from maintaining an action to recover possession of the property.

(McCulloch, J., dissents.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Garland County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover possession of real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note.—The liability of charitable institutions for personal injuries is treated in the note to Farrigan v. Pevear, ante, 481.

Messrs. Wood & Henderson and Ratcliffe & Fletcher, for appellants:

The association is not a public charitable association, and it is liable for the torts of its agents and employees, and its property, whether domicil or otherwise, is subject to execution therefor.

C. A. 122, 109 Fed. 300.

Mr. R. G. Davis for appellee.

Rose, Special Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 29th day of June, 1881, several ladies filed a petition in the Garland circuit court, praying that they might be incorporated under the name of the "Woman's Christian National Library Association for the purpose of establishing, providing, and keeping in the city of Hot Springs, Garland county, Arkansas, a library for the free use of the public generally, and of soliciting and receiving donations and aid for said purposes." The constitution presented with the petition was preceded by the following preamble: "We, whose names are annexed, desiring to form an association to organize a reading room and library for our own benefit, and that of the multitude of people who visit our city in search of health and pleasure, do pledge ourselves to be governed by the following constitution." Then follow provisions as to membership: Any lady might become a member by paying an initiation fee of $2 annually and 25 cents monthly dues. Persons of either sex might become honorary members for life on payment of $50; and anyone might become a "life patron" on payment of $250. The object of the association was further stated as follows: "The object of this association shall be to provide books, newspapers, and magazines of such character as will afford instruction and diversion; but such books and papers as are demoralizing in their tendency or subversive of religion shall not be admitted; also to provide a suitable and attractive building where the literature of the association may be permanently lodged, and where suitable lectures on such subjects as are not in the field of political or theological controversy and other entertainments not in conflict with the objects of the association may be given."

Having been duly incorporated, application was made by the association to Congress for leave to erect a library building on the government reservation at Hot Springs. This was refused. But Congress passed an act approved July 8, 1882, authorizing the association to purchase "for the uses and purposes of such association" lots 11 and 12 in block 127 in the city of Hot Springs. 22 Stat. at L. 155, chap. 282. These lots, having been previously appraised by the United States, were now entered by the association on payment of $100, and a patent was accordingly issued by the President. The patent contains no limitation or condition except one forbidding the boring for hot water on the lots conveyed. Preparatory to building a house on these lots for the proposed library the association employed one Murray to excavate the rock on the mountain side, so as to secure a proper foundation; and while this work was in progress resort was had to blasting, whereby one Thomas had his leg broken by a shattered piece of rock thrown out into the street. To recover damages for this injury Thomas brought suit against the association in the United States circuit court held at Little Rock, in which he recovered a judgment for $7,642 on the 21st of December, 1893. Execution having issued on this judgment, the lots were sold under it, and were bought by Wood & Henderson for $5,000, and in due time they received the marshal's deed therefor. Wood & Henderson afterwards conveyed the lots to the appellants Fordyce & McKee. On the 21st of June, 1902, the library association brought an action in the Garland circuit court against Fordyce & McKee to recover the lots, alleging that the association was merely a trustee, holding them for a public and charitable use, having no beneficial interest that could be seized or sold under execution to satisfy a judgment against the association for the negligence or torts of its agent; and that the defendants intended to divert the property from its charitable uses, and to apply it to the uses of a street-car line. The defendants demurred. The demurrer was sustained, and the plaintiff appealed to this court, which reversed the judgment of the court below; but as there was not a full bench, and the judges were not agreed as to the grounds of reversal, the merits of the cause were not fully passed upon. See Woman's Christian Nat. Library Asso. v. Fordyce, 74 Ark. 621, 86 S. W. 417. On a second trial in the court below the plaintiff recovered a judgment for the lots and $200 for damages by reason of their detention, and defendants appealed.

1. We are convinced that this is a case of a charitable trust. We are referred to the decision in Old South Soc. v. Crocker, 119 Mass. 1, 20 Am. Rep. 299; but that is not in point. In that case the court found that a trust was declared for "the beneficiaries, of which were the grantees themselves, with 'such as they should associate to themselves.'" The court was influenced by the further limitation in the deed "to their heirs and successors," implying "that the grantor contemplated a permanence of association of the cestuis que trust." The court added: "Gifts for the erection of a house for public worship or for the use of the ministry may constitute a public charity, if there is no definite body for whose use the gift was intended capable of receiving, holding, and using it in the manner intended. To give it the character of a public charity there must appear to be some benefit to be conferred upon, or duty to be performed towards, either the public at large, or some part thereof or an indefinite class of persons." Page 22, 119 Mass., page 307, 20 Am. Rep. In this case one of the objects of the association is to "organize a reading room and library for our own benefit and that of the multitude of people who visit our city in search of health and pleasure." This clause does designate an indefinite class of persons. It is plain enough that the phrase "for our own benefit" is not to be understood as confined to the persons who signed the petition for a charter, but was intended to embrace all persons who should thereafter contribute to the support of the library by becoming members of the association. This was also an indefinite class of persons. It certainly does not change the nature of the charity that the members of the association may also enjoy the privileges of the library along with other beneficiaries. It is clear from the rules as to the admission of new members that the object is to increase the utility of the association by an appeal to the public for an extension of its influence and for its support. The English statute of 43 Eliz. chap. 4, is in force in this state. In it schools and free schools are mentioned, but not libraries. The statute was, however, only remedial and ancillary, and did not affect, in any wise, the jurisdiction of the chancery court as it previously existed. Ould v. Washington Hospital for Foundlings, 95 U. S. 303, 24 L. ed. 450; Biscoe v. Thweatt, 74 Ark. 545, 86 S. W. 432. That a free public library is a charity there has never been any doubt. Duggan v. Slo- cum, 83 Fed. 244; Pickering v. Shotwell, 10 Pa. 23; Cottman v. Grace, 41 Hun, 345; Fairbanks v. Lamson, 99 Mass. 533; Drury v. Natick, 10 Allen, 169; Jones v. Habersham, 107 U. S. 189, 27 L. ed. 407, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 336. The importance of a public library at a great health resort where many invalids congregate in search of health, often despondent and sad hearted from the effects of disease, loneliness, and melancholy forebodings, cannot be questioned. We may suppose that of those who go there for pleasure the majority will not be indifferent to the pleasure to be derived from reading. A distinguished writer of the eighteenth century has said: "An author may be considered as a merciful substitute to the legislature. He acts, not by punishing crimes, but by preventing them."

A public library not only tends to the diffusion of knowledge, but also to public improvement in morals. The charter of the association in this case provides that demoralizing books shall not be admitted into the library; but, if that clause had been omitted, the result would have been the same. This principle of selection, in ordinary public libraries, operates automatically, since men and women having children to bring up, and many other persons having the public good at heart, will not patronize or help to support a library in which pernicious books form a part. It goes without saying that whatever contributes to the advance of public morals and that of civilization tends to the support of law and order, and the prevention of crime. The library association is organized purely for charitable purposes. It has no capital stock, no provision for making dividends or profits, and is as unselfish as any enterprise can be. McDonald v. Massachusetts General Hospital, 120 Mass. 432, 21 Am. Rep. 529. Whatever it receives from any source it holds in trust for the purposes mentioned in its charter; that is, for sustaining the library and "increasing its benefit to the public, by extending or improving its accommodations and diminishing its expenses. Its funds are derived mainly from public and private charity. Its affairs are conducted for a great public purpose." Ibid.; Powers v. Massachusetts Homeopathic Hospital, 65 L.R.A. 372, 47 C. C. A. 122, 109 Fed. 299. By our Constitution "buildings, grounds, and materials used exclusively for public charity" are exempt from taxation. Article 15, § 5. See also Kirby's Dig. § 6887. Further, in order to encourage institutions of that kind, and to diffuse their usefulness through all time, ample provision is made by statute for the incorporation of charities. Kirby's Dig. § 937. By our statutes cities of the first and second class are "empowered to establish and maintain public libraries" and to levy a tax for that purpose. Kirby's Dig. § 5543.

2. It seems clear that the patent to the library association conveyed an estate in fee simple. To create a limitation or a condition the intent must be clearly shown; and the mere expression of a purpose in a conveyance will not debase a fee. Stuart v. Easton, 170 U. S. 394, 399, 42 L. ed. 1082, 1084, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 650; Wright v. Morgan, 191 U. S. 55, 48 L. ed. 89, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 6. This question has been discussed; but we do not perceive its relevancy; for, if the patent conveyed an estate subject to a condition or limitation, there would have been an estate in the patentee until the limitation attached or the condition was enforced. A base or qualified fee during its continuance has all the incidents of a fee simple. It is descendible and assignable, and the owner, while his title continues, has the same right to the exclusive use and enjoyment of the land, and as complete dominion over it, as though he held it in fee simple. 16 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 603. Such an estate would be as liable to seizure and sale under execution as if it were a larger estate. In order to see whether the library association is a charitable one or not, we need not examine the patent; but we must look to its charter to discover to what uses its property is dedicated.

3. The authorities on the subject of liability of charities for the negligence of agents or employees are extremely divergent. There are at least four classes of cases: (1) Cases holding that the property of a charity cannot be sold under execution. Of these we shall speak presently. (2) Cases construing charities unfavorably, and assimilating them to private corporations organized for profit, as in the cases of Presbyterian Congregation v. Colt, 2 Grant, Cas. 75, and Davis v. Central Cong. Soc. 129 Mass. 372, 37 Am. Rep. 368. (3) Cases holding that trustees of a charity, though not answerable for the negligence of its agents, were liable for want of ordinary care in their selection. This seems to be a compromise between two irreconcilable principles. Such was the case of Hearns v. Waterbury Hospital, 66 Conn. 98, 31 L.R.A. 224, 33 Atl. 595. The case of Union P. R. Co. v. Artist, 23 L.R.A. 581, 9 C. C. A. 14, 19 U. S. App. 612, 60 Fed. 365, is not in point. In that case it was held that a hospital maintained by a railroad company for the free treatment of its employees, supported partly by the monthly contributions of all its employees and partly by the company, and not maintained for profit, is a charitable institution; and that the company is not responsible for injuries caused by improper treatment by a physician or attendants employed in the hospital by the railway company, by which the plaintiff, an employee of the company, was injured, where the master had exercised ordinary care in selecting such physician or attendants. Various similar cases are to be found in the books; and several are cited in Powers v. Massachusetts Homœopathic Hospital, supra. They are all railway cases; and railway companies are not charitable corporations. If in any one of these cases the judgment of the trial court against the company had remained unreversed, and an execution issued upon it had been levied on the hospital buildings of the railway company, then the question now under discussion might have been presented; but such was not the case in any of them.

(4) Cases holding that on a judgment against a charitable organization the grounds and buildings of the defendant cannot be sold under execution, but that any of its unappropriated funds may be applied to the satisfaction of the judgment. Such was the case of Glavin v. Rhode Island Hospital, 12 R. I. 411, 34 Am. Rep. 675, decided on the authority of Mersey Docks v. Gibbs, 11 H. L. Cas. 686; though that was not a case of a charity, but was a suit against a public board, charged with the duty of keeping certain docks in order, for negligence in performing their public duties. As we shall see, no such suit could be sustained in this state. The decision in the Glavin Case seems also to be based on a compromise. The court said that the buildings and grounds of the hospital were "subject to so strict a dedication that it could not be diverted to the payment of damages," but "that funds which were applicable generally to the use of the hospital" might be so diverted. And yet it would seem plain that funds not invested in buildings and grounds would be as strictly dedicated to public uses as any other species of property. Charities must have funds on hand to meet expenses. They cannot live on the wind, and that which takes away the means of living takes away life. All sums received by a charity, from whatever source, "are held upon the same trust as those which are the gifts of pure benevolence." McDonald v. Massachusetts General Hospital, 120 Mass. 435, 21 Am. Rep. 529. "The donations, if any are ever made, must be used according to the terms of the gift." Benton v. City Hospital, 140 Mass. 17, 54 Am. Rep. 436, 1 N. E. 836. We are of opinion that in this state the property of a charity cannot be sold under execution issued on a judgment rendered for the nonfeasance, misfeasance, or malfeasance of its agents or trustees. It would be difficult to overestimate the benefits that have been derived, directly and indirectly, from charities having their origin in private benevolence. Our common school system and all laws for the relief of the poor and destitute in England and in this country have no other source. 2 Perry, Tr. § 691. Consequently charities are much favored in the law, and they are upheld wherever possible. Duggan v. Slocum, 83 Fed. 246; Ould v. Washington Hospital for Foundlings, 95 U. S. 313, 24 L. ed. 452. The same rule was applied in the Roman law. 1 Domat. title 1, §§ 2, 14. And it is from that law that our doctrine of charities is largely derived. 2 Story, Eq. § 1137. A hundred years ago Lord Eldon said: "It has been urged for the defendants, and two hundred years ago would have been urged with great effect, that no distinction ought to be made in the proceedings between a charity and an individual. But at this time it is much too late, with reference to a great many doctrines, to insist upon that; for the court does hold out relief to charities under circumstances in which it would not give relief against defendants in ordinary cases." Atty. Gen. v. Jackson, 11 Ves. Jr. 367. So in a charity case if the bill prays the wrong relief the court will give the proper relief. Atty. Gen. v. Whiteley, 11 Ves. Jr. 246. Thus, in Atty. Gen. ex rel. Reid v. Stamford, 2 Swanst. 591, a bill affecting a charity was dismissed; but the court of its own motion entered a decree establishing the charity. In this respect charity cases differ from all others. Atty. Gen. v. Jeanes, 1 Atk. 355; Atty. Gen. v. Bucknall, 2 Atk. 328. Being public utilities of a very high order, charities are intimately associated with the state, which exercises over them through its courts a watchful supervision, so that their property, funds, and revenues shall not be diverted to any improper purpose, and that trustees and agents shall perform the duties assigned to them with honesty and fidelity, and for the best advantage of the charitable uses designated by the donor or donors. For these ends the chancery courts have an original and an inherent jurisdiction. Vidal v. Philadelphia, 2 How. 195, 11 L. ed. 233. If the estate is misapplied the remedy is not forfeiture, but a suit to enforce a trust. Brown v. Meeting Street Baptist Soc. 9 R. I. 186. It is the duty of the courts to correct all abuses in the management of the trust, and to preserve the property. Stanley v. Colt, 5 Wall. 119, 18 L. ed. 502. The trustees can always be required to account for the distribution of the funds, and they can be dealt with by the court for any bad faith or breach of the trust. 2 Perry, Tr. §§ 712, 719. If a donor makes a gift for a particular charity, and appoints no trustee, the charity will not fail; for the court will appoint a trustee. Reeve v. Atty. Gen. 3 Hare, 191. So, if the devise is to a corporation not yet in existence, it will pass to one that may be afterwards organized. Inglis v. Sailors' Snug Harbor, 3 Pet. 99, 7 L. ed. 617. Devises for charitable purposes that are void at law are often sustained in chancery. 2 Story, Eq. § 1170. Where a literal execution of a charitable devise becomes inexpedient or impracticable the court will execute it as nearly as it can according to the original purpose. Id. § 1169. The court will supply all defects of conveyances where the donor has capacity to convey unless the mode of donation contravenes some statutory provision. Id. § 1171.

The chancery court has jurisdiction over the trustees of charities, as it has over all trustees, to see that they do not commit a breach of their trust, or apply the fund in bad faith, or to purposes that are not charitable. 2 Perry, Tr. § 719. So intimate is the connection between the state and organized charities that it is the duty of the attorney general to intervene in all cases where there is a violation of duty by the trustees that endangers or impairs the charity. Id. § 744. And in such cases strict rules of practice cannot be insisted upon. Ibid. A public charity is not within the rule as to perpetuities. Bischoe v. Thweatt, 74 Ark. 546, 86 S. W. 432. The doctrine of liability of the principal for the acts of his agent performed within the scope of his authority, as expressed in the maxim Respondet superior, is not of universal application. It does not apply either to the state or the Federal government. Belknap v. Schild, 161 U. S. 17, 40 L. ed. 601, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 443; Broom, Legal Maxims, p. 865. With us a municipal corporation is not liable in a civil action to one who is injured by reason of a defective street, although the statute requires that the municipality shall keep the streets in good repair. Arkadelphia v. Windham, 49 Ark. 139, 4 Am. St. Rep. 32, 4 S. W. 450; Ft. Smith v. York, 52 Ark. 84, 12 S. W. 157. The same rule applies to counties. Granger v. Pulaski County, 20 Ark. 37. So of school districts and other quasi public corporations. School Dist. No. 11 v. Williams, 38 Ark. 454; Collier v. Ft. Smith, 73 Ark. 447, 68 L.R.A. 237, 84 S. W. 480. The reason given for the exemption of the property of cities, counties, and other public corporations from sale under execution is that they are public agencies of the state. The state itself is merely a trustee for the public good. It has no other excuse for being. Counties, towns, school districts, and similar public bodies, being a part of the machinery of the state government, hold their property of whatever kind subject to the same trusts, so that it cannot be diverted to individual uses, the whole object of the government being to confer the greatest good on the greatest number. In this work charities are important helpers and coworkers, relieving the state of a large part of its burdens. In every community there are schools, colleges, hospitals, and churches that are fruitful in good works that could not be performed by the state with the aid of any number of policemen or that of a standing army. In their several ways charities are more efficient in promoting the public good than the state could be acting without their aid. Whatever privileges or exemptions may be granted to such charities by the state are not gratuities; for without schools, hospitals, churches, and libraries we should soon relapse into a state of semibarbarism, which would not be for the public good.

4. The immunity of the property of a charity from sale under execution rests on special grounds. The property of a corporation organized solely for charitable purposes is exclusively dedicated to public uses, as much so as the streets and alleys of a town or city; for this purpose the corporation is a mere trustee. Benton v. City Hospital, 140 Mass. 13, 18, 54 Am. Rep. 436, 1 N. E. 836. It is of primary importance to the public that the trust shall be perpetuated. the trustees or the corporation are usually unsalaried agents, devoting their time and labor to the use and benefit of the public. For their own wrongs and misdeeds they are personally answerable, just as are the physician and the attendants in a hospital. If the doctrine of respondeat superior is applied to them it follows that, along with their other powers, they possess an implied power to destroy, by a wilful violation of their duties, by collusion, or by negligence, the public interests that they are selected to preserve. Any conclusion that tends to support that view must leave out of consideration the public; that is to say, the party most deeply interested. To say that the trustees may by their negligence destroy the charity is simply to say that they may do indirectly and by inadvertence what they cannot do directly. The doctrine that the principle of respondeat superior has no application in this class of cases when the trustees wilfully abuse their authority, and that it does apply in a single species of negligence, would seem to be merely the result of another effort to find a compromise. Nor do we think that an illogical compromise of that sort would tend to the public advantage. A judge or a jury might be convinced after a case of negligence had occurred that due judgment and discretion had not been used in the selection of experts and other agents, when perhaps they themselves, if put to it, in a similar case, would do no better, and might do worse; and it seems to us that, if our schools, churches, hospitals, and other charities could be sold out on such vague matters of opinion, about which men would naturally differ, the result would be extremely unfortunate. In the case of Fire Ins. Patrol v. Boyd, 120 Pa. 624, 1 L.R.A. 417, 6 Am. St. Rep. 745, 15 Atl. 553, the court, as to this question, decided that the charity was not liable, saying: "It would be carrying the doctrine of respondeat superior to an unreasonable and dangerous length. That doctrine is, at best,—as I once before observed,—a hard rule. I trust and believe it will never be extended to the sweeping away of public charities; to the misapplication of funds, specially contributed for a public charitable purpose, to objects not contemplated by the donors. I think it may be safely assumed that private trustees, having the control of money contributed for a specific charity, could not, in case of a tort committed by one of their members, apply the funds in their hands to the payment of a judgment recovered therefor. A public charity, whether incorporated or not, is but a trustee, and is bound to apply its funds in furtherance of the charity, and not otherwise. The doctrine is hoary with antiquity, and prevails alike in this country and in England, where it originated as early as the reign of Edward V., and it was announced in the Year Book of that period."

This point was involved in Heriot's Hospital v. Ross, 12 Clark & F. 507. In that case Lord Cottenham said: "It is obvious that it would be a direct violation, in all cases, of the purposes of a trust if this could be done; for there is not any person who ever created a trust that provided for payment out of it of damages to be recovered from those who had the management of the fund. No such provision has been made here. There is a trust, and there are persons intended to manage it for the benefit of those who are to be the objects of the charity. To give damages out of a trust fund would not be to apply it to those objects whom the author of the fund had in view, but would be to divert it to a completely different purpose." Lord Brougham said: "The charge is that the governors of the hospital have illegally and improperly done the act in question; and therefore, because the trustees have violated the statute; therefore,—What? Not that they shall themselves pay the damages, but that the trust fund which they administer shall be made answerable for their misconduct. The finding on this point is wrong, and the decree of the court below as to the damages must be reversed." Lord Campbell said: "It seems to have been thought that if charity trustees are guilty of a breach of trust, the persons damnified thereby have a right to be indemnified out of the trust funds. This is contrary to all reason and justice, and common sense. Such a perversion of the intention of the donor would lead to most inconvenient consequences. The trustees would, in that case, be indemnified against the consequences of their own misconduct, and the real object of the charity would be defeated. . . . Damages are to be paid from the pocket of the wrongdoer, not from a trust fund. A doctrine so strange as the court below has laid down in the present case ought to have been supported by the highest authority. There is not any authority, not a single shred, here to support it. No foreign or constitutional writer can be referred to for such a purpose." Not only is a trustee for a public or private use not permitted to misapply the trust funds committed to his care, but, if he convert them to his own use, the law punishes him as a thief. How much better than a thief would be the law itself were it to apply the trust's funds, contributed for a charitable object, to pay for injuries resulting from the torts or negligence of the trustees. The latter is legally responsible for his own wrongful acts. It is true that some of the courts have treated this case as having been overruled by that of Mersey Docks v. Gibbs; but that was not a case of a charity, but one of a public corporation supported by government funds. It is true that Lord Brougham in his remarks in the Heriot's Hospital Case speaks of charities and public corporations as if they were governed by the same rules; an error that has led to much confusion. In England the rules relating to charities and to public corporations were not the same. The case of Mersey Docks v. Gibbs related only to public corporations; and the decision in the Heriot's Hospital Case had never been overruled. Moreover, the decision in Mersey Docks v. Gibbs has never been the law in this state. With us public corporations and charities are, however, governed by the same rules as to the matter now under consideration, because the doctrine of respondet superior does not apply either to charities or to public corporations. The principle upon which the law proceeds in cases of this sort is well expressed in Downes v. Harper Hospital, 101 Mich. 556, 25 L.R.A. 602, 45 Am. St. Rep. 427, 60 N. W. 42. "If, in the proper execution of the trust, a trustee or an employee commits an act of negligence, he may be held responsible for his negligent act; but the law jealously guards the charitable trust fund, and does not permit it to be frittered away by the negligent acts of those employed in its execution. The trustees of this fund could not by their own direct act divert it from the purpose for which it was given, or for which the act of the legislature authorized the title to be vested in the defendant. It certainly follows that the fund cannot be indirectly diverted by the tortious or negligent acts of the managers of the fund, or their employees, though such acts result in damage to an innocent beneficiary."

Various other cases to the same effect are cited in the opinion delivered in this cause on the former appeal. "A valid vested estate in trust [for charitable purposes] can never lapse or become forfeited by any misconduct in the trustee, or inability in the corporation to execute it, if such existed. Charity never fails; and it is the right as well as the duty of the sovereign, by its courts and public officers, as also by legislature (if needed), to have the charities properly administered." Girard v. Philadelphia, 7 Wall. 15, 19 L. ed. 57. "With regard to the liability of charitable corporations or their trustees for the negligence of agents or employees, there is some difference of opinion, but the decided weight of authority denies such liability; this on two grounds; first, that, if this liability were admitted, the trust fund might be wholly destroyed and diverted from the purpose for which it was given, thus thwarting the donor's intent, as the result of negligence for which he was in nowise responsible; second, that, since the trustees cannot divert the funds by their direct act from the purposes for which they were donated, such funds cannot be indirectly diverted by the tortious or negligent acts of the managers of the fund or their agents or employees." 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 923.

5. Then the question arises whether the present suit is debarred by the judgment rendered in favor of Thomas under which the lands were sold. If a defendant permits a judgment to go against him which he might have successfully defended, he may still claim his homestead and other exemptions. Though a judgment is rendered against a railway company, yet its franchise or other property necessary to the operation of its road cannot be sold under execution, because that would interfere with the public good. East Alabama R. Co. v. Doe, 114 U. S. 340, 29 L. ed. 136, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 869; 1 Freeman, Executions, § 179. The fact that a city or county is by statute liable to be sued does not necessarily imply that its property may be taken in execution. This has been repeatedly decided. Highway Comrs. v. Martin, 4 Mich. 557, 69 Am. Dec. 333; Waltham v. Kemper, 55 Ill. 346, 8 Am. Rep. 652; White v. Bond County, 58 Ill. 297, 11 Am. Rep. 65; Bussell v. Steuben, 57 Ill. 35; Hill v. Boston, 122 Mass. 352, 23 Am. Rep. 332. The judgment is conclusive of the amount of the debt or demand, but it does not conclude the question as to the liability of any property to seizure under it. That is a question that may never arise. If it does arise it will be collateral and subsequent. The statute provides that corporations for benevolent purposes "shall have such powers of suing and being sued . . . as may be necessary to their efficient management and the promotion of their purposes." Kirby's Dig. § 943. This provision, so far from supporting the contention of the appellants, indicates with sufficient clearness that the efficient management and promotion of the purposes of the charity are to be kept steadily in view. If this were not the case there would be no difference between charitable corporations and those organized for purposes of private gain. But if the latter clause of the above section of the statute had been omitted the result, in our opinion would not be different.

It is familiar law that the property of a municipal corporation is not subject to execution, although it may be sued, and in a proper case judgment may be rendered against it. "It is the settled doctrine of the law that not only the public property, but also the taxes and public revenues, of such corporations cannot be seized under execution against them either in the treasury or when in transit to it." 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 100. Neither can such property be subjected to garnishment. Burnham v. Fond du Lac, 15 Wis. 193, 82 Am. Dec. 668. The reason is that "municipal corporations are instituted by the supreme authority of a state for the public good." Dill. Mun. Corp. supra. Such being the case, let us see where the doctrine of liability of the property of charitable organizations to levy and sale under execution would lead us. In every city of any considerable size may be found one or more hospitals organized and maintained by the city for charitable purposes and one or more hospitals maintained by private benevolence, under the control of trustees appointed or elected as the donors may direct or the statute may require. But a devise to a city for charitable purposes is valid. McDonogh v. Murdoch, 15 How. 367, 14 L. ed. 732; Perin v. Carey, 24 How. 465, 16 L. ed. 701. Let us suppose, then, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that a city had two hospitals, one created and supported out of the municipal revenues and another dependent upon a charitable gift and the donations of private individuals under the control of the city as a trustee. According to the doctrine contended for in behalf of the appellant, the former could not be sold under execution because it belonged to the city, and the latter could be thus sold because the city was only a trustee; and this notwithstanding both were charities instituted "for the public good." Such a distinction cannot be supported except by ignoring the general public interests common to both of these cases. The question is not as to who holds the property in trust, which is merely a personal consideration, a matter of policy and expediency; but it relates to the objects for which all charitable issues are created, and on account of which they are highly favored by law. A discrimination based not on the character of the trust, but on the character of the trustee, would be false and misleading. The property of a public corporation, such as a railroad or bridge company, essential to the exercise of its corporate franchise and the performance of its duties toward the public, cannot, without statutory authority, be sold to satisfy a common-law judgment, either on execution, or in pursuance of an order or decree of court. Overton Bridge Co. v. Means, 33 Neb. 857, 29 Am. St. Rep. 514, and note, and cases cited, 51 N. W. 240. Ammant v. New Alexandria & P. Turnp. R. Co. 13 Serg. & R. 210, 15 Am. Dec. 593.

Exemption laws apply to judgments rendered in favor of the state, though the state is not mentioned in them. State v. Williford, 36 Ark. 155, 38 Am. Rep. 34. We need not dwell further on these matters. Almost every point arising in this case was decided on full consideration. Grissom v. Hill, 17 Ark. 483, was a much stronger case than that now under consideration, since in that instance the property had been sold on a judgment under the mechanics' lien law in which it was specifically described and condemned. English, Dig. St. p. 715, § 12. Moreover, the mechanics' lien law is liberally construed. Murray v. Rapley, 30 Ark. 568; White v. Chaffin, 32 Ark. 69; Anderson v. Seamans, 49 Ark. 478, 5 S. W. 799. To hold that the judgment, whatever may be its form, prevents all inquiry as to the liability of property to be sold under it, would be to indulge in a technicality; but in dealing with charitable trusts "courts disregard all technicalities." 2 Perry, Tr. § 746. In the case of Grissom v. Hill there could be no doubt but that the trustees of the church had authority to erect a building for public worship; but the court held that they had no power to charge the property of the charity with a lien that might destroy the charity itself. The facts in the case were these: Hill had conveyed a lot in a town to trustees for the benefit of a church. The deed contained in the habendum the following phrase: "But said lot of land is never to be sold, or to be used in any other way only for the use of a church, for the benefit of the said Protestant church." The lot was afterwards sold in a proceeding instituted by Grissom to enforce a mechanics' lien for work and materials furnished for the purpose of building a church on the lot, and was bought by him. Grissom entered into possession and excluded Hill and the trustees of the church. Hill filed a bill in chancery against Grissom and the trustees; setting up the above facts, and praying that the title of the trustees be declared forfeited and revested in him, and that the title of Grissom be set aside and declared void; and it was so decreed. Grissom alone appealed. The clause in the deed above mentioned cut no figure in the case whatever; and what was said in the opinion as to the effect of the deed was pure surplusage, because the trustees acquiesced in the decree rendered in the court below, and did not appeal. This the court said explicitly: "The trustees having acquiesced in the decree of the court below, all controversy as to their rights as between them and Hill must be regarded as at an end, and the questions to be determined upon this appeal arise between Grissom and Hill. . . . But whether this is technically an estate upon condition such as upon failure to observe the conditions on the part of the trustees the lot will absolutely revert to the donor, and thereby cut off, on account of the acts of the trustees, the beneficial interests of the cestuis que trust,—the denomination for whose use the trust was created,—it is not necessary to decide, as no one is representing or claiming anything for them on this appeal unless it be Hill. . . . That Hill who made the grant for the use of the church, and who was entitled to have the property appropriated to the charitable purposes of the grant, had the right to apply to equity to set aside the sale to Grissom, and divest his title and possession, there can be but little question. . . . On this appeal no other question is properly presented; and inasmuch as the appellant has no cause of complaint, the decree must be affirmed." The deed being, then, out of the way, the ground of the decision is clearly stated: "If the trustees could, by improvident contracts, involve the property in debt, and thereby subject it to be sold under execution, the intention of the donor might be defeated in 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that way as well as by a voluntary sale on their part; because the purchaser could appropriate the lot and church in either case to his own private purposes, and prevent the use of it for religious purposes; as it seems was done in this case. The trustees would hardly be allowed to do indirectly that which they have no power to do directly."

It may be said that under this ruling hard cases must occur. They will not, however, be so numerous as those arising under the law exempting towns, cities, and school districts from liability for the negligence or torts of their agents, committed within the scope of their authority. On the other hand, still harder cases would occur under the opposite rule, by which the will of charitable donors would be defeated, and the public interest would be thwarted. Very many of the greatest charities of the present day have grown from very obscure and feeble beginnings. If they had been sold out in their infancy for some trivial sum on account of the carelessness of an agent or the mistake of a trustee, thus preventing the constantly accumulating benefits of centuries, it could not be truthfully said that the public good was promoted by the sacrifice. Much of the time of our courts is rightfully taken up with the enforcement of contracts and the collection of debts; but the state, which is not exclusively a collection agency for creditors, has many other interests to look after; and the principle of respondeat superior, like other legal principles, has its limitations. The decision in Grissom v. Hill was rendered just a half century ago. It is not supported by all the authorities. Neither is any other view of this question supported by all the authorities; indeed, the diversity of opinion on this subject is probably not exceeded in any branch of the law. To attempt to reconcile the adjudications would be a hopeless task. Grissom v. Hill is sustained by many of the most respectable adjudications to be found in the books. We believe that the case was rightly decided; but if we thought otherwise we should think it inexpedient to reverse a rule of property so long acquiesced in. The legislature can change the rule if it likes; but it has shown no desire to do so. On the contrary, the tendency to foster and protect charities has become stronger. As stated in Grissom v. Hill, they were subject to taxation when that case was decided. Now they are expressly exempted by a constitutional provision. Const. art. 16, § 5. The discrimination is sharp and decisive, because the legislature is prohibited from passing any law exempting any other property than as provided in the Constitution. Id. § 6.

6. As to the allowance of $200 by the court below for damages for detention of the lots, the judgment must be modified by canceling this allowance for want of evidence to support it. Subject to this modification, the judgment is in all things affirmed.

McCulloch, J., dissents on the grounds stated in the report of this case on former appeal.

The opinion referred to was as follows:

I did not participate in the original consideration of this case, but on the petition for rehearing have considered it, and am unable to concur in the views of the majority of the court. I think that the judgment rendered against appellant establishing the liability is enforceable, and that the property in controversy was properly sold to satisfy the judgment. Appellant is a corporation organized for benevolent purposes under the provisions of subdivision 9 of chapter 31, Kirby's Dig. A section of the statute on that subject reads as follows: "Such corporation shall have such powers of suing and being sued, buying, holding, and selling property, real and personal, and of otherwise carrying out the purposes and objects of their organization, as are possessed by other corporations, and which may be necessary to their effective management and the promotion of their purposes." § 943. The preamble to the constitution recites that the purpose of the association is for "organizing a reading room and library for our own benefit and that of the multitude of people who visit our city in search of health and pleasure." The constitution provides, among other things, that "ladies may become members by signing the constitution and paying an initiation fee of $2 annually and 25 cents monthly dues; that any gentleman who pays the sum of $50 at any one time shall be entitled to honorary life membership in the association; that anyone who pays the sum of $250 shall be constituted a life patron, and shall be entitled to all the privileges of membership except voting in business meetings; that gentlemen may become associate members of the association by the annual payment of $5." The patent issued by the United States to appellant conveying the lots in controversy is absolute in terms, and conveys the title in fee simple, without reservation or condition, except a proviso in accordance with the form usually adopted in patents to lands in the vicinity of the celebrated Hot Springs, prohibiting the grantee and its successors and assigns "from ever boring thereon for hot water." I think that according to the decided weight of authority corporations organized as agencies purely for charitable or like purposes are not liable for torts of their servants. 17 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Jaggard, Torts, pp. 187, 188; 6 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 975; McDonald v. Massachusetts General Hospital, 120 Mass. 432, 21 Am. Rep. 529; Powers v. Massachusetts Homoeopathic Hospital, 65 L.R.A. 372, 47 C. C. A. 122, 109 Fed. 294; Perry v. House of Refuge, 63 Md. 20, 52 Am. Rep. 495.

But we are precluded from inquiry as to liability of appellant by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction adjudging its liability. The only question is whether or not the judgment can be enforced against the property of appellant. It seems to me that the statute conferring upon such corporations the power to sue, and imposing upon them liability, is conclusive of the question of the right of a creditor to enforce payment of his debt out of the property of the corporation, after the liability has been established by a court of competent jurisdiction. The general rule is that all property is subject to sale under execution for payment of debt. Our statute so declares. Kirby's Dig. § 3228. This applies to corporations as well as individuals. Judge Thompson says: "The jus disponendi is involved in the very idea of property; and it is well said that, in the absence of some express legal exemption, 'it is an inseparable incident to property, legal or equitable, that it should be liable to the debts of the owner, as it is to his alienation.'" 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7847. Judge Freeman, in his work on Executions, vol. 2, § 172, states the general rule with reference to property subject to execution thus: "It is ordinarily sufficient to inquire whether the interest sought to be sold is real property, and, if so, whether the defendant in execution has a legal estate therein. These questions being answered in the affirmative, the property, or the defendant's interest therein, must be regarded as subject to execution, unless it falls within some exception hereinafter stated. . . . The right to subject real property to execution is not dependent upon the character or capacity of the persons, whether natural or artificial, to whom it may belong, except that they must be persons against whom a judgment may properly be enforced, and its payment coerced; and they must have a beneficial interest in the property, and not hold it merely upon some trust, public or private."

This leads us to a consideration of the question whether the appellant or its property, which was sold under execution, falls within any of the recognized exceptions to the general rule making all property of individuals and corporations subject to execution. This court held in Grissom v. Hill, 17 Ark. 483, that the trustees of a church, under a deed which provided that the "lot of land is never to be sold, or to be used in any other way only for the use of a church," could not create a charge upon the lot by contract for the erection of a house thereon, so as to authorize the mechanic to obtain a lien and sell the lot in payment thereof. But in the case at bar the conveyance under which the library association obtained title contained no restriction, limitation, or condition. It is absolute in form, and conveys the title in fee simple. It is true that the act of Congress authorizing the patent to be issued upon payment of the appraised valuation of the lot recited the reasons therefor; but it imposes no conditions upon the use of the property. In the case of Wright v. Morgan, 191 U. S. 55, 48 L. ed. 89, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 6, where lands were patented to the city of Denver pursuant to an act of Congress, "to enable the city of Denver to purchase certain lands in Colorado for a cemetery" at the minimum price, "to be held and used for a burial place for said city and vicinity;" and where, by a subsequent act, the city was authorized to "vacate the use of said lands, or any portion thereof, as a cemetery, for a public park or grounds,"—it was held that the title was absolute, and that the city had the power to alienate the lands so patented. The court, speaking through Mr. Justice Holmes, said: "If the legal title was in the city, it was an absolute title. In view of the extreme unwillingness of courts to admit the existence of a common-law condition, even when the word 'condition' is used, it needs no argument to show that there was no condition or limitation here. . . . Little more needs to be said to show that the act of Congress did not make the land inalienable at common law. We need not consider whether the act could have that effect upon land within a state, when the conveyance was absolute, and was made to a citizen or instrumentality of the state. We express no opinion upon the point. It is enough that it did not purport so to restrict the ordinary incidents of title. We should require the clearest expression of such an unusual restriction before we should admit that it was imposed,—especially in an ordinary sale for cash. Here the act probably meant no more than to explain the motive for a sale at the minimum price." The authorities on this subject are fully cited and exhaustively discussed by Mr. Justice White in Stuart v. Easton, 170 U. S. 383, 42 L. ed. 1078, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 650, where it is held that a mere declaration of purpose contained in a patent did not have the effect of qualifying or limiting the estate granted thereby. It is not denied that, where the naked legal title to property is held in trust, it cannot be sold under execution issued on a judgment against the trustee; but that rule does not apply here. The legal title, and the beneficial interest as well, were vested in the library association, the legal entity against which the judgment was obtained, and there is no beneficial interest separable from the corporate association. The public has no interest in the property or in its use, save such as the corporation, acting through its members and officers, might see fit to bestow from time to time. As is well said by counsel for appellees in their brief: "The association is not a mere agency. It is the thing itself, instituted and organized on its own motion, with all the powers pertaining thereto, which an individual would have if he should undertake such an enterprise." Churches and like associations and corporations, though in a limited sense agencies of the public, are governed by the ordinary rules of law controlling the rights of individuals and other corporations. 2 Kent, Com. § 274; Robertson v. Bullions, 11 N. Y. 243; Presbyterian Congregation v. Colt, 2 Grant, Cas. 75; Fadness v. Braunborg, 73 Wis. 257, 41 N. W. 84. In Presbyterian Congregation v. Colt, supra, it was held that a church house was subject to execution; the court saying: "Churches are intended for the public benefit; but this is a part of the public interest that is committed exclusively to private enterprise, and governed by the rules and remedies that belong to private relations, and it may well be questioned whether it would be for the public benefit to allow them to disregard their contracts." Learned counsel for appellant has not cited us to a single authority holding that the property of an association of this kind cannot be sold under execution. None are cited in the opinion of the chief justice, and I have been unable to find any. Therefore I am persuaded that there are none, and that there is no substantial reason why the property of this association should form an exception to the rule that all property is liable to execution against the owner. The case of Powers v. Massachusetts Homeopathic Hospital, supra, relied on, apparently, with much confidence in the opinion of the majority, merely holds that "a patient in a public hospital, chartered as a charitable corporation, although under private management, cannot recover from such corporation for injuries resulting from the negligence of a nurse employed in its hospital,"—a doctrine in line with the decided weight of authority that such corporations are not liable in suits founded upon torts of its servants. Nor, to my mind, can any support to the views of the majority be found in the case of Glavin v. Rhode Island Hospital, 12 R. I. 411, 34 Am. Rep. 675, where it is held that such a corporation is liable for torts committed by its servants. I am unable to see how, from a doctrine that such a corporation is liable in judgment for its torts, a theory can be worked out that its property is not liable to sale under execution issued upon the judgment.

I am therefore of the opinion that the property was legally sold under execution, and that the purchasers at the sale took a good title.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT.

VERA M. HEWETT

v.

WOMAN'S HOSPITAL AID ASSOCIATION

(73 N. H. 556, 64 Atl. 190.)

Trial—inconsistent verdicts—setting aside.

1. The court will not interfere with verdicts against a master and in favor of an employee upon whose negligence the liability depends, where neither party asks to set aside the verdicts for mistrial, but each seeks to preserve all in his favor and reject the rest.

Same—general and special verdicts.

2. Judgment cannot be entered in favor of an employer against whom a verdict is rendered for negligence of his servant, who has obtained a verdict in his favor, on the theory that the verdict is general and controlled by the special verdict in favor of the servant, where there is nothing to indicate which verdict is general and which special.

Hospital—charity—liability for negligence.

3. That a hospital is conducted as a public charity without expectation of profit does not render it immune from liability for negligent injuries to its servants.

Master—misrepresentation as to age of servant—effect.

4. That at the time of seeking service an employee represents herself to be older than she is does not relieve the employer of its ordinary duty to her as its employee.

Same—apprentice.

5. That an apprentice nurse is working for the opportunity of learning the trade, and receives only small wages in addition, does not deprive her of the rights of an employee.

Hospital—duty to inform nurse.

6. A hospital, upon assigning an inexperienced nurse to attend a patient sick from a contagious disease, is bound to inform her of the dangerous character of the service.

Same—trust—negligent injury.

7. That a hospital is founded by property given in trust for that purpose does not exempt it from liability for negligent injury to its employees.

Negligence—question for jury.

8. Whether or not managers of a hospital exercise ordinary prudence in delegating a nurse to attend a patient whom they know to be suffering from a contagious disease, but of which fact the nurse is ignorant, is a question for the jury, where their conduct may be explainable upon a theory consistent with due care, or upon a theory showing the absence of due care.

Hospital—information of nurse—doubt.

9. The court cannot say, as matter of law, that a reasonable doubt in the mind of the attending physician as to the contagious character of the disease of a patient would justify the omission to inform the nurse assigned to the case that it might be of a contagious character.

(June 5, 1906.)

TRANSFER by the Superior Court for Merrimack County, after a verdict against the defendant hospital, of an action brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiff which were alleged to have been due to defendants' negligence. Judgment on the verdict.

Plaintiff was in training in the defendants' hospital for the profession of nurse, and was to receive compensation at the rate of $10 a month. Her service began when she was only nineteen years old. The superintendent placed her in charge of a patient whose malady the state bacteriologist had pronounced to be diphtheria, but which diagnosis from surrounding circumstances the superintendent doubted. Plaintiff was not informed of the suspected character of the disease, or instructed to take any precautions against contagion. She contracted the disease, and brought this action for the resulting injury.

Messrs. John H. Albin and William H. Sawyer for defendants.

Mr. Henry F. Hollis, for plaintiff:

The real test of a charity is whether it is maintained for genuine charitable purposes as a purely benevolent undertaking, or whether it is maintained for the profit, advantage, and emolument of some person or persons connected with its management.

Texas & P. Coal Co. v. Connaughten, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 642, 50 S. W. 173.

Walker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's declaration combined three causes of action,—one against the hospital for its negligence in not notifying her of the danger of her situation in performing the duties of a nurse, one against Mrs. Russell for her personal negligence in inducing the plaintiff to assume the performance of those duties under the circumstances, and one against Mrs. Russell for professional malpractice in attending the plaintiff after she had contracted the disease of diphtheria. The jury returned a verdict against the hospital and a verdict for Mrs. Russell, finding substantially that, while the hospital was negligent as alleged, Mrs. Russell, its representative and manager, who actively directed the plaintiff to assume the danger complained of, was not negligent in that respect, and that she was not guilty of subsequent malpractice. If there is an apparent inconsistency between the first and second findings, a point upon which no opinion is expressed, neither party is in a position, as the case is here presented, to take advantage of it as a ground for setting aside one verdict and sustaining the other. If the supposed inconsistency existed, it would show that there had been a mistrial, and the result would be that both verdicts would be set aside and a new trial granted upon the first two issues raised in the declaration. The verdict upon the third issue in relation to Mrs. Russell's malpractice, having been fairly tried, would be unaffected by that result. But neither party moved in the superior court to have the verdicts set aside upon the ground of a mistrial, nor does either now urge that disposition of the case. Each seeks to preserve so much of the jury's action as is favorable to that side, and to reject the rest. Under such circumstances, both verdicts must stand, so far as this objection to them is concerned, even if they are inconsistent. If the parties are satisfied, the court will not complain. The defendant's suggestion that the verdict in favor of Mrs. Russell is a special verdict or finding that there was no negligence on the part of the hospital, and hence that it controls the general verdict against the latter (Richardson v. Weare, 62 N. H. 80; Folsom v. Concord & M. R. Co. 68 N. H. 178, 44 Atl. 134), is untenable, since no way is discoverable by which to determine that one of the verdicts is general or special rather than the other. If it is true that upon the evidence the actionable negligence of the hospital was also the actionable negligence of Mrs. Russell, and that a finding of her freedom from fault is necessarily equivalent to a finding that the hospital was not guilty, it is equally true, on the other hand, that the verdict of guilty against the hospital establishes the guilt of Mrs. Russell. The difficulty encountered is that there is nothing upon which to predicate the assertion that one of the findings is general and the other special. Both must stand or fall together.

The principal contention relates to the liability of the hospital, in an action of tort, for negligence. A motion was made in the superior court in behalf of the hospital that a verdict be directed in its favor. The motion was denied, subject to exception. Broadly stated, the question thus presented is whether there was any competent evidence from which it could be found that the defendant hospital was guilty of a breach of duty toward the plaintiff, which was the proximate cause of her injury. If there was, the case was properly one for the jury; if there was not, the defendant was entitled to a verdict, and its motion should have been granted. In support of the motion, it is urged that the corporate character of the defendant is such that it owed no duty to the plaintiff for the breach of which it can be held liable in an action of tort. Since the legal doctrine of negligence assumes as its basis or necessary premise the existence of a legal duty due from the alleged wrongdoer to the injured party, it is important to ascertain what the relations of the parties were and what resulting obligations existed between them. There can be little, if any, doubt that the hospital is what is known in the law as a charitable or eleemosynary institution. The purposes for which it was incorporated, according to the articles of association, were "to establish and maintain hospitals and homes, and otherwise aid and assist worthy and dependent women and children who wish to be under the care of women physicians and attendants." It has no capital stock, and no provision is made for a division of profits. Whatever property it owns is devoted to the support and management of the institution in the care of sick and dependent women and children, who pay for the benefits received according to their ability; and the money so received is used in paying the necessary expenses incident to such an institution. Its evident purpose is to aid and relieve the sick as economically as possible for the kind of attention provided, and not, like an ordinary business corporation, to earn or accumulate an income for division among its members. Indeed, it is not seriously contended that it is not a charitable corporation, or that it is not entitled to all the immunities legally incident to institutions of that character. But it is insisted that the law does not exempt it from liability for its failure to use reasonable care for the safety of its employees or servants; in other words, that the law imposes the same duty upon it in this respect that it imposes upon individuals and business corporations. The vital question is whether this contention is sound.

The defendant corporation was formed under the general incorporation law, which authorizes five or more persons to associate together to form a corporation for "the establishment and maintenance of hospitals." Pub. Stat. 1901, chap. 147, § 1. Section 4 provides that "such corporation, its officers and stockholders, shall have all the rights and powers, and be subject to all the duties and liabilities, of other similar corporations, their officers and stockholders, except so far as the same are limited or enlarged by this chapter." The chapter contains no express provision limiting or enlarging "the duties and liabilities" of hospitals, in any respect material to the present inquiry. If they are exempt from liability in cases of this character, the legislative intention to that effect, which determines their powers and duties, must be found inferentially from a consideration of the peculiar purposes they were formed to accomplish. Their powers and duties are the same as those of "other similar corporations." It should be noted in this connection that the defendant was not incorporated for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of an express trust in reference to property or money donated under a limited deed of trust. It holds its property under its charter for the general purposes of a hospital. It is a charitable institution whose powers and duties in the management and expenditure of its funds are unlimited, except so far as they are governed and defined by the general charitable purposes of its incorporation. It is therefore unnecessary to consider what its legal liability might be if it held funds upon a trust which expressly or by necessary inference exempted them from being appropriated to the payment of damages suffered through the negligence of its officers or servants. Many of the cases which either hold or state argumentatively that a charitable body is not liable for its torts proceed upon the theory that its funds are held upon a special trust, that to use them for the payment of damages in an action of tort against it would be an unwarranted diversion thereof, and that such an action is not maintainable, because it would be entirely futile. Such seems to be the doctrine of,

although not necessarily the holding in, Heriot's Hospital v. Ross, 12 Clark & F. 507. In that case Lord Cottenham says, with reference to the payment of damages for the tort of a charitable body (page 513): "It is obvious that it would be a direct violation, in all cases, of the purposes of a trust, if this could be done; for there is not any person who ever created a trust fund that provided for payment out of it of damages to be recovered from those who had the management of the fund. No such provision has been made here. There is a trust, and there are persons intended to manage it for the benefit of those who are to be the objects of the charity. To give damages out of a trust fund would not be to apply it to those objects whom the author of the fund had in view, but would be to divert it to a completely different purpose." In Powers v. Massachusetts Homoeopathic Hospital, 65 L.R.A. 372, 47 C. C. A. 122, 130, 109 Fed. 294, 302, it is said that, if this case "is rested upon a doctrine that under no circumstances can a trust fund be held liable for torts committed in its management, it stands alone in Great Britain;" and that doctrine is repudiated in the subsequent case of Mersey Docks & Harbour Board Trustees v. Gibbs, L. R. 1 H. L. 93. See also Gilbert v. Trinity House, L. R. 17 Q. B. Div. 795. It would seem to be entirely unnecessary to discuss a proposition so barren of arguments in its favor. That a charitable institution has certain duties to perform toward those with whom it is associated, which it cannot violate with impunity, in the absence of some express exemption of a legislative character, is not debatable. The sanctity of its general trust fund or property does not make that result necessary or, on grounds of public policy, desirable. The liability of charitable corporations in actions of tort is frequently enforced. Stewart v. Harvard College, 12 Allen, 58; Davis v. Central Cong. Soc. 129 Mass. 367, 37 Am. Rep. 368; Bishop v. Bedford Charity, 1 El. & El. 697; Gilbert v. Trinity House, L. R. 17 Q. B. Div. 795. Cases also like McDonald v. Massachusetts General Hospital, 120 Mass. 432, 21 Am. Rep. 529, which deny the liability of the defendant to a patient for the negligence of the attending physician or surgeon, seem to concede that, if the corporate officers have been negligent in selecting subordinate agents, the defendant may be liable for injuries occasioned by the negligence of the latter while attending to the corporate business. If the language of some courts is broad enough to deny the liability of charitable corporations in all actions of tort (Perry v. House of Refuge, 63 Md. 20, 52 Am. Rep. 495; Downes v. Harper Hospital, 101 Mich. 555, 25 L.R.A. 602, 45 Am. St. Rep. 427, 60 N. W. 42; Williamson v. Louisville Industrial School, 95 Ky. 251, 23 L.R.A. 200, 44 Am. St. Rep. 243, 24 S. W. 1065), it cannot be regarded as a discriminating statement of the law upon that subject.

Since the defendant has no absolute exemption from being sued for some torts it may be guilty of, the question recurs whether its character as a charitable institution furnishes a sufficient reason for its exemption in this case. In other words, Why did it not owe in a legal sense the duty of a master to the plaintiff while employed in its affairs? Whether the general rule of respondet superior applies to it as to a business corporation or individual may be an interesting question, but it is not material to the present inquiry. If it owed the absolute, nondelegable duty of a master to the plaintiff, it cannot escape liability by showing that the negligent act which caused the plaintiff's injury was the act of a servant, or raise the question of its liability for the collateral negligence of its servant under the rule of respondet superior. Upon this assumption, cases holding that a charitable corporation is not responsible under that rule of law are not in point. A few examples are Hearns v. Waterbury Hospital, 66 Conn. 98, 31 L.R.A. 224, 33 Atl. 595; Fire Ins. Patrol v. Boyd, 120 Pa. 634, 1 L.R.A. 417, 6 Am. St. Rep. 745, 15 Atl. 553; Coe v. Wise, 5 Best & S. 440, 453; Hall v. Smith, 2 Bing. 156; Duncan v. Findlater, 6 Clark & F. 894. Nor are cases in point that substantially deny the applicability of that rule to public or quasi public corporations exercising governmental powers, upon the ground that they are charitable corporations, like Metcalf v. Hetherington, 11 Exch. 257, and Mersey Docks & Harbour Board Trustees v. Gibbs, supra. The defendant does not perform governmental functions, and the reasons for the limited liability of municipal bodies for the torts of their servants have no application to corporations like the defendant. O'Brien v. Derry, 73 N. H. 198, 60 Atl. 843; Wheeler v. Gilsun, 73 N. H. 429, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 135, 62 Atl. 597. Its charity may be public, but it is in no proper sense an agency of the state.

The duties of the defendant to the plaintiff when she was employed to nurse a diphtheria patient had their inception in the contract of employment. She was engaged to do a necessary part of the work of maintaining a hospital for the sick. For this labor she was paid. If she was an apprentice receiving small remuneration in money, in consideration of the instruction and experience she received in practical nursing, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

she was none the less an employee of the defendant. An apprentice learning a trade occupies the position of a servant with reference to his employer, and obviously the latter's duty to inform him of the dangers of his occupation is greater than in the case of an experienced workman. While performing the necessary work of nursing in the institution, the plaintiff was not, like a patient, the recipient of the defendant's charity. McDonald v. Massachusetts General Hospital, supra; Glavin v. Rhode Island Hospital, 12 R. I. 411, 34 Am. Rep. 675; Hearns v. Waterbury Hospital and Powers v. Massachusetts Homeopathis Hospital, supra. She was doing the defendant's proper work, under its direction, and for its benefit in the discharge of its assumed duties. She was as much an employee of the hospital in respect to this particular work as she would have been if she had been a graduate nurse receiving full nurse's pay. The fact that, at the time she was employed, she represented herself to be older than she was, did not relieve the defendant of its ordinary duty to her as its servant. Her apparent youthfulness, general intelligence, and practical experience in nursing were facts for the consideration of the jury upon the question of the degree of care the defendant was bound to exercise. Whether she was in fact as old as she claimed to be, or appeared to be, was not a question of controlling importance. The finding of the jury that she was its servant or employee was amply supported by the evidence.

If she had been employed by an individual to attend a member of his family afflicted with smallpox of which he had knowledge, but of which he did not inform her, and she took the disease without fault on her part and suffered damage therefrom, it would not be seriously denied that he was guilty of actionable negligence in not informing her of the danger to which he exposed her. It was his duty arising from his employment of her, or from the contractual relation of master and servant existing between them, to warn her of the danger incident to the service which he knew or under the circumstances ought to have known, and of which he knew she was ignorant, though in the exercise of ordinary care. And this duty is a nondelegable one. Hamel v. Newmarket Mfg. Co. 73 N. H. 386, 62 Atl. 592; English v. Amidon, 72 N. H. 301, 56 Atl. 548; Wallace v. Boston & M. R. Co. 72 N. H. 504, 514, 57 Atl. 913. To say that a similar duty was not imposed upon the defendant for the benefit and protection of the plaintiff, because it is a charitable corporation, is to relieve such corporations from the reasonable obligation of exercising the care ordinarily required of, or contractually assumed by, men in general in the prosecution of their legitimate business. The necessity for such an exceptional holding is not apparent. Since the property of the defendant is held for the general purpose of maintaining a hospital, without other specific limitation, it is no more exempt from being appropriated to the payment of damages occasioned by the negligence of the hospital than is the property of an individual, which he holds for commercial or charitable purposes, for the consequences of his negligence. In conducting the affairs of a hospital, its officers and agents are as liable to commit acts of negligence as are the officers and agents of a railroad or other business corporation. Men in general are not uniformly careful. Experience shows that negligence—the failure to exercise ordinary care—is to be expected when men engage in industrial pursuits. It may, not inappropriately, be said to be necessarily incidental in the accomplishment of most practical results through the agency of man. The donors of the defendant's property for hospital purposes were not ignorant of this fact, and are presumed to have given the trust property knowing that it might be required for the liquidation of claims in tort, as well as for claims in contract, incurred in carrying out the purposes of the corporation. Indeed, its conceded authority to contract for the employment of nurses and other necessary agents would seem to include power to respond in damages for all breaches of such contracts, one essential or incidental element of which is its duty to exercise care as well as its duty to pay the stipulated compensation. No conditions were imposed upon the defendant, either by its charter or by the donors of its property, by which the contracts of employment it was obliged to make with its servants should have a different effect from that usually given to such contracts, or that the relations between it and its employees should be legally different from those usually subsisting between master and servant. There is therefore no substantial reason for holding that it did not owe the duty to the plaintiff of warning her of the dangers of her employment, under the law as applied to the ordinary relation of master and servant. In this respect, the legislature has not invested it, either expressly or inferentially, with peculiar powers.

The defendant further claims that the evidence was not sufficient to warrant a finding of negligence on its part. This position, stated in more specific language, is that the evidence is so meager and inconclusive that the court must hold that reasonable men acting as jurors could not reasonably draw the inference from the evidence that the defendant violated its duty to inform the plaintiff of the danger of her employment. It is not for the court to determine the weight of the evidence. Upon the assumption that the evidence for the plaintiff is true, the question for the court is whether it is logically and legally sufficient to support a finding by the jury in favor of the plaintiff upon a material issue. The weight and reliability of competent evidence is to be determined exclusively by the jury. It is unnecessary, upon this point, to review the evidence at length. It is sufficient to state that it tended to show that one of the patients whom the plaintiff nursed had a form of diphtheria, that a culture taken from this patient and examined by a bacteriologist contained diphtheria bacilli, and that Mrs. Russell, the physician in charge of the patient and manager of the hospital, was duly informed of the result of the examination. If the jury found these facts to be true, they were warranted in the conclusion that the hospital had notice of the contagious character of the patient's disease, and that it was its duty, acting as ordinarily prudent men would have acted under the same circumstances, to disclose the danger to the nurse, who was ignorant of its existence. Whether the hospital, through Mrs. Russell, used ordinary prudence in this respect, may be a debatable question upon the evidence reported. Her conduct may be explainable upon a theory consonant with due care, or upon a theory showing the absence of due care; and it is exclusively the province of the jury to determine which is the true one. As they have upon competent evidence adopted the latter theory, their finding is conclusive. The court cannot say that reasonable men could not come to that conclusion, or that a reasonable doubt in the mind of Mrs. Russell, in her diagnosis of the patient's disease, as to its true character, would justify her, who as the representative of the hospital was bound to exercise reasonable care for the plaintiff's safety, in omitting to inform the plaintiff that the disease might be of a diphtheritic character. The hospital might be bound to warn the plaintiff before Mrs. Russell had reached a satisfactory diagnosis. The motion to direct a verdict for the defendant was properly denied.

Certain exceptions were taken by the defendant to the charge to the jury and to the denial of requests to charge; but the foregoing discussion renders it unnecessary to further consider the points raised. Nor are the exceptions to the remarks of the plaintiff's counsel in argument tenable. Counsel did not, so far as the case shows, exceed the limits of legitimate argument.

Exceptions overruled. Judgment on the verdicts.

MARTIN YOUNG, Appt.,
v.

SOUTHERN BELL TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH COMPANY, Resp't.

Removal of cause—dismissal—second action.

The removal of a suit from a state to a Federal court does not confer upon the latter such exclusive jurisdiction that, upon its entering an order of discontinuance, plaintiff cannot institute a new action upon the same cause in the state court, laying the damages so low as to prevent a second removal.

Case Note.—Right of plaintiff, after removal of action commenced in state court to the Federal court and its dismissal in the latter court without prejudice, to commence a new action in a state court upon the same cause of action:—With the exception of one decision and a few dicta which are subsequently referred to, the cases are unanimous in favor of the doctrine of YOUNG v. SOUTHERN BELL TELEPH. & TELEG. CO., that the removal to the Federal court of an action commenced in a state court does not, in the event the action is dismissed in the Federal court, without a decision on the merits, upon the plaintiff's motion or upon his voluntary submission to a nonsuit, prevent him from commencing and maintaining a new action upon the same cause of action in the state court. The following cases expressly so hold: Gassman v. Jarvis, 100 Fed. 146; Texas Cotton Products Co. v. Starnes, 128 Fed. 183, Affirmed in 66 C. C. A. 673, 133 Fed. 1022; *McIver v. Florida, C. & P. S. 110, 27 L. ed. 354, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625, referred to in the reported case.

The ground upon which the doctrine rests, and the distinction between the commencement of a new action in the state court and the further proceedings in the state court in the original action, are well stated in the opinion in Swift & Co. v. Hoblawetz, supra, as follows: "It [the case of Kern v. Huidekoper, 103 U. S. 485, 26 L. ed. 354] holds that a compliance with the act of Congress by a party entitled to remove a cause in a case that is removable under the act removes the cause and the subject-matter, notwithstanding the refusal of the state court to allow such removal; and that thereafter the state court has no jurisdiction in that case to proceed further therein. The state court having been wholly divested of jurisdiction in the case by the removal, it does not follow that when the Federal court's jurisdiction is divested by the termination of the cause, as on a dismissal without prejudice, the plaintiff cannot choose the forum in which he will bring an-court, and having done so, the cause of action was transferred from the state to the Federal judiciary; the last-named tribunal alone retained the jurisdiction of this cause, and the state court had no jurisdiction to entertain a suit on the same cause of action for a reduced amount.

Jones, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff commenced action in the court of common pleas for Charleston county on September 6, 1902, to recover $10,000 damages for personal injury alleged to have been suffered by him through defendant's negligence. On September 19, 1902, a petition and bond for removal on the ground of diverse citizenship was duly filed and accepted, and subsequently the cause was actually transferred to the United States circuit court for South Carolina. On April 21, 1903, the United States court, on motion of plaintiff's attorney, passed an order discontinuing the cause on payment of costs. After payment of the costs, plaintiff, on April 24, 1903, upon new summons and complaint, brought this suit in the court of common pleas for Charleston county upon the same cause of action, except that the damages were laid in the sum of $2,000. The defendant answered and the case was submitted to a jury at November term, 1904, and resulted in a mistrial.

Thereafter, in March, 1905, defendant on notice moved, before Judge Memminger, to dismiss all the proceedings in the cause on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction thereof, and that the jurisdiction of said cause is vested exclusively in the United States court. Judge Memminger granted the motion, and dismissed the case for want of jurisdiction upon the rule and reasoning stated in Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Fulton, 59 Ohio St. 575, 44 L.R.A. 520, 53 N. E. 265. That case held that, where a case has been properly removed from a other action or case founded upon the same cause of action. . . . We hold, on the contrary, that a dismissal without prejudice or other final disposition of the case not upon the merits not only divests the Federal court of jurisdiction of that case but of the subject-matter of the suit, and that the plaintiff is at liberty to renew his cause in the state court, or in any court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties."

The rule above stated applies even though the damages laid in the second action are for such a sum as to prevent the removal of the new action to the Federal court. Texas Cotton Products Co. v. Stearnes, 128 Fed. 183; McIver v. Florida, C. & P. R. Co.; Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Lawler; Adams Exp. Co. v. Schofield; Krueger v. Chicago & A. R. Co.; and Hooper v. Atlanta, K. & N. R. Co.—supra. In some of the other cases above cited in which the rule was applied it also appeared that the damages in the new action were laid at such a sum as to prevent the removal of the new action to the Federal court, though no comment was made on the fact.

In Powers v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 169 U. S. 92, 42 L. ed. 673, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 264, Affirming 65 Fed. 129, after the removal of the original action against a railroad company for personal injuries to the Federal court and its dismissal in the latter court, the plaintiff commenced a new action upon the same cause of action in the state court, but, for the purpose of preventing the removal of the new action to the Federal court upon the ground of diverse citizenship, joined as defendants two of the employees of the company, and, after the expiration of the time in which the defendant was required to answer, discontinued the suit against the individual defendants. A petition for removal having been thereupon filed and granted, it was held by the Supreme Court that the removal was properly granted, notwithstanding that the time when the defendant was required to answer had expired.

In Yawkey v. Richardson, 9 Mich. 529, 81 Am. Dec. 769, also, the fraudulent attempt of the plaintiff to prevent the removal of the new action was frustrated. In that case it appeared that the plaintiff originally brought an action against a single defendant, a citizen of another state, who thereupon caused the case to be removed to the Federal court. Plaintiff then discontinued that action and brought a new action in the state court against the same defendant and another person, a citizen of his own state, for the same cause of action. The trial court afterwards permitted the plaintiff to discontinue as against the new defendant; but upon appeal the state supreme court, upon the ground that the plaintiff had undertaken to perpetrate a fraud, held that the discontinuance was improper, and, since a discontinuance against one, except when permitted by law, is a total discontinuance, reversed the judgment for plaintiff without granting a new trial.

It has also been held that the new action in the state court may be maintained although the action in the Federal court was not dismissed until after the commencement of the action in the state court. S. F. Dana & Co. v. Blackburn, supra. And the dismissal of an action in the Federal court, state to a Federal court, the jurisdiction of the state court ends forever, unless perhaps the case is remanded with the consent of defendant; that the jurisdiction of the Federal court over the cause of action remains exclusive, even though the suit is disposed of in the Federal court otherwise than upon its merits. The reasoning by which this result is reached is based upon the court's view of the spirit and policy of the statute authorizing removal on the ground of a diversity of citizenship as resting upon the fact that litigation between citizens of different states must be more or less affected by local influences, and that such a policy applies as well to any renewal of the action after it has been disposed of in the Federal court as to the period of its pendency; and the further reason is given that a contrary rule would be productive of a very inconvenient practice and much abuse, in enabling a party to permit his case to be dismissed by failure to prosecute in the Federal court with the purpose of recommencing it in the state court, and thus entailing expense and trouble on the defendant in causing it to be removed or submit to the jurisdiction of the state court. The only case cited in that opinion as directly supporting the same was Cox v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 68 Ga. 446.

The supreme court of Georgia, however, in the case of McIver v. Florida C. & P. R. Co. 110 Ga. 223, 65 L.R.A. 437, 36 S. E. 775, holds the contrary view, and declares that the Cox Case merely decided that after non-suit in the Federal court, a renewal of the action in the state court was not a part of the original case or on the same footing with it with respect to the statute of limitations. The Georgia supreme court quoted with approval the following forceful language of a writer in Case and Comment, of July, 1899, at page 228: "The possibility that a plaintiff might improperly permit the dismissal of a cause after removal for the purpose of beginning again in the state court, and thus compel the defendant to remove the cause again or else submit to the state court, is one ground of the Ohio decision. But the unnecessary trouble caused to a defendant by dismissing an action and even after plea in abatement in the action in the state court, is sufficient to prevent the abatement of that action, unless it appears that it was brought for the purposes of vexation. Wilson v. Milliken, 103 Ky. 165, 42 L.R.A. 449, 82 Am. St. Rep. 578, 44 S. W. 660; Harby v. Patterson (Tex. Civ. App.) 59 S. W. 63.

Nor, where the action in the Federal court has been dismissed, may the action in the state court be properly abated until the costs incurred in the Federal court are paid. Harby v. Patterson, supra. The general question as to the effect of the dismissal of an action in the Federal court upon a pending action in the state court or vice versa is discussed in a note in 42 L.R.A. 459.

The case of Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Fulton, 59 Ohio St. 575, 44 L.R.A. 520, 53 N. E. 265, seems to be the only express judicial authority against the doctrine first above stated. That case and the case of Cox v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 68 Ga. 446, upon which the Ohio court relied, are sufficiently discussed in the opinion in YOUNG v. SOUTHERN BELL TELEPH. & TELEG. CO. As there shown, the point was not involved in the Georgia case, and the dicta on which the Ohio court relied were subsequently withdrawn in McIver v. Florida C. & P. R. Co. 110 Ga. 223, 65 L.R.A. 437, 36 S. E. 775. There was also a dictum in Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Riddle, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1687, 72 S. W. 22, founded upon the Ohio case, against the doctrine sustained by the weight of authority; but this dictum also was expressly withdrawn in the subsequent case of Stevenson v. Illinois C. R. Co. supra. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The case of Kern v. Huidekoper, supra, has been sometimes invoked in support of the contention that a new action will not lie in the state court; but, as pointed out in the opinion in McIver v. Florida C. & P. R. Co. supra, the Kern Case did not pass upon this question, but merely ruled that when a case has been removed from a state to a Federal court any action taken by the state court while the case is pending in the Federal court is coram non judice and void. That principle, of course, does not conflict with the doctrine that a new action may be maintained in the state court after the first action has been dismissed in the Federal court.

The doctrine first above stated presupposes that there is no objection arising from the statute of limitations, or other cause than the previous jurisdiction of the Federal court over the matter in litigation, to the maintenance of the new action in the state court. Whether the running of the limitation is suspended during the original action so as not to be available against the new action presents a distinct question which is not considered in this note. It is assumed for the purposes of this note that the original removal from the state to the Federal court was proper, and conferred jurisdiction of the original action upon the Federal court; and the cases falling within the scope of this note are therefore to be distinguished from cases like Seeligson v. Texas Transp. Co. 70 Tex. 198, 7 S. W. 708, involving the jurisdiction of the state court over the original action where the removal, or attempted removal, to the Federal court was improper and did not confer jurisdiction upon the Federal court.

suing anew is not confined to cases that have been removed from a state court. It does not, in other cases, prevent the plaintiff from commencing a new action after dismissing the former one, and the difference in respect to actions removed into a Federal court is only in degree. The distinction between reinstatement of an action and the bringing of a new action does not seem to have been much considered in this case. Because a case can be reinstated only by the court that dismissed it, it is said that 'by parity of reasoning' a state court cannot pass on the right of the plaintiff to recommence an action after it has been dismissed by a Federal court. But commencement of a new action, although for the same cause, is not a reinstatement, but a distinct and independent case. Exclusive jurisdiction of an action is a very different thing from exclusive jurisdiction of all possible actions for the same cause. An election to bring an action in one of two courts of concurrent jurisdiction is not usually irrevocable. After dismissal of the first one, the plaintiff has the same choice between the courts that he had originally. There seems to be no reason why this should not apply where the concurrent jurisdiction is in state and Federal courts. If bringing an action originally in the Federal court does not give it such exclusive jurisdiction of the entire cause of action as to prevent bringing any action therefor in a state court after the Federal suit is dismissed, why should this be the result of removing a suit from a state court into a Federal court? In either case, it is difficult to see why, after an action has been dismissed without prejudice to the right to bring a new action, the plaintiff has not the same election that he had in the beginning with respect to jurisdiction."

The supreme court of Georgia further declares: "The act of Congress provides that certain cases may be removed from the state court to the Federal court, but this does not mean that the cause of action is removed. The act refers in terms to suit, and not cause of action. Until the state court is absolutely deprived of jurisdiction of a particular cause of action it may take jurisdiction of, and pass upon, the same, with the exception above noted.—that, when the Federal court has taken jurisdiction, the state court cannot take any action in connection with the same so long as the cause is pending in the Federal court. But when that court denies to the plaintiff a hearing, or fails for any reason to pass upon the sufficiency of his cause of action, he may bring the same again in the state court and invoke an adjudication of that court. And the fact that the new suit is for an amount which will prevent another removal to the Federal court will not invalidate the suit. If the plaintiff in the new suit voluntarily abandon a portion of his claim for damages, it does not seem that the defendant should complain. The policy of the laws of the United States is to compel persons having claims of small amounts to litigate in the state courts, and voluntarily giving up a portion of his claim for damages and being content to accept a sum less than the Federal court would entertain jurisdiction of would not seem to be contrary to the laws of the United States and its established public policy in reference to the jurisdiction of its courts."

The rule declared in the Georgia case and the reasoning by which it is supported appear to us to be correct. The Ohio case, so far as our investigation develops, is the only precedent in support of the view of the circuit court, while, on the other hand, several authorities besides the Georgia court support the contrary view. Hooper v. Atlanta, K. & N. R. Co. 106 Tenn. 28, 53 L.R.A. 931, 60 S. W. 607; Rodman v. Missouri P. R. Co. 65 Kan. 645, 59 L.R.A. 704, 70 Pac. 642. See also the following cases, which we have not examined, but which, from the syllabi in the Century Digest, seem to hold in opposition to the Ohio case: De Witt v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 25 Ky. L. Rep. 2019, 79 S. W. 275; Nipp v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 25 Ky. L. Rep. 2335, 80 S. W. 796; Krueger v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 84 Mo. App. 358; Gassman v. Jarvis, 100 Fed. 146; Texas Cotton Products Co. v. Starnes, 128 Fed. 183. Affirmed by the circuit court of appeals, 66 C. C. A. 673, 133 Fed. 1022. Our attention has not been called to any decision of the United States Supreme Court which is decisive as to this question, and we have discovered no such case. In the case of Bush v. Kentucky, 107 U. S. 110, 27 L. ed. 354, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625, the removal of a criminal case from the state to the Federal court did not operate to divest the state court of all jurisdiction thereafter to try the accused, although the indictment removed to the Federal court was in that court quashed; but, inasmuch as the crime was against the state, and not the United States, and prosecution could only have been begun in the state court, not being originally cognizable in the Federal court, the case is perhaps not conclusive, although there is similarity in view of the fact that the present suit for the sum of $2,000, treated as a new and independent action, is only cognizable in the state court. But the case cited certainly shows an exception to the broad contention that a cause or controversy removed from the state court to the Federal court is forever thereafter, until finally determined upon its merits, within the jurisdiction of the Federal court to the exclusion of the state court.

In reaching our conclusion we are mindful of the rule established in the United States Supreme Court that the jurisdiction of a Federal court acquired on removal from a state court cannot be ousted or divested by any change of conditions; that is, conditions in the pending suit, as, for example, when the parties become residents of the same state after removal to the Federal court on the ground of diverse citizenship (Morgan v. Morgan, 2 Wheat. 290, 4 L. ed. 242; Clark v. Mathewson, 12 Pet. 165, 9 L. ed. 1041), or, after the right of removal attached, an amendment in the state court allowing plaintiff to reduce the matter in dispute to less than the jurisdictional amount (Kanouse v. Martin, 15 How. 198, 14 L. ed. 660), or when there is a change in the value of the subject of controversy after jurisdiction acquired (Cooke v. United States, 2 Wall. 218, 17 L. ed. 755), or by dismissal of the original bill involving the jurisdictional amount after the filing of a cross bill which did not involve the jurisdictional amount (Kirby v. American Soda Fountain Co. 194 U. S. 141, 48 L. ed. 911, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 619). The present contention does not relate to a mere change of the conditions in a suit pending in a Federal court or within its control, but to a new action in the state court, having concurrent jurisdiction in the first instance subject to the right of removal, restored after the Federal court has discontinued the removed suit. It is not contended by respondent in this case that the order of discontinuance, not having therein the words "without prejudice," must be treated as a final adjudication so as to prevent a new suit in any court, as the case of Dunham v. Carson, 37 S. C. 269, 15 S. E. 960, shows that the failure to insert such words in the order of discontinuance did not make the order a decree on the merits; but the contention is that the removal gave the Federal court exclusive jurisdiction over the cause of action until adjudication on the merits. It is argued that the phraseology of the removal statute supports this contention. Section 629 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, after prescribing the proceedings necessary to removal, declares: "It shall then be the duty of the state court to accept said petition and bond and proceed no further in such suit, . . . and, the said copy being entered as aforesaid in the said circuit court of the United States, the cause shall then proceed in the same manner as if it had been originally commenced in the said circuit court." Act March 3, 1875, chap. 137, § 3. 18 Stat. at L. 470, superseded by act August 13, 1888, chap. 866, § 1, 25 Stat. at L. 433 [U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 510].

It is contended that the word "cause" means more than "suit;" that it means "cause of action;" and that the cause of action is taken entirely out of the jurisdiction of the state court; and that the Federal court alone had jurisdiction thereof. We cannot accept this construction. The words "suit" and "cause" mean the same thing in the statute. In common usage, and very often in statutes and decrees, the words "suit," "action," "case," and "cause" are used interchangeably to indicate the same thing. Bouvier defines "cause" to be "a contested question before a court of justice; it is a suit or action." The suit, action, case, or cause in which the state court cannot proceed further is the matter removed to the Federal court. This is manifest from the context which requires that the cause shall proceed in the Federal court in the same manner as if it had been originally commenced there,—language appropriate in reference to a "suit," but wholly inappropriate in reference to the "cause of action," which is the legal right of the plaintiff invaded by the defendant's breach of corresponding duty, upon which the right of action arose when the invasion took place. The respondent's contention, therefore, receives no aid from the phraseology of the statute. On the contrary, the plain meaning is that the suit or cause after removal shall proceed in the Federal court, subject to the same rules which would govern if the suit or cause had been originally commenced there. If plaintiff had originally commenced the suit in the Federal court for $10,000, and the same had been discontinued on payment of costs, we know of no rule which would prevent plaintiff's election to sue again in the state court for any sum, subject to the defendant's election to remove again, or to sue for such sum as gave the state court exclusive jurisdiction. This suit is for such a sum as in the policy of the removal statutes is such a case as should be tried exclusively by the state court.

This conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider the other question raised as to whether the defendant, by answering and going to trial and delaying this motion for about two years, has waived any right it may have had to make such motion.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed.

MARCELLUS HARDMAN, Appt.,
v.

GODFREY L. CABOT.

(— W. Va. —, 55 S. E. 756.)

Highway—pipe line—additional burden.

1. A pipe line, laid in a public rural highway under proper authority, and used for supplying the public with natural gas for heating and illuminating purposes, though imposing an additional public servitude upon the road, is not a use in excess of the right of the public in such road, and

Headnotes by POFFENBARGER, J.

Case Note.—Gas-pipe line in highway or street as additional burden:—As the appropriation of land for the use of a public highway is for a specific purpose, and the public acquire thereby a mere right of passage, while the owner of the land still retains the fee, with the right to maintain ejectment or trespass, and is entitled to use the highway for his individual purposes in any way consistent with the public easement, the laying of gas pipes in a country road is held to be such an interference with the rights of the fee owner as to constitute an additional servitude, for which he is entitled to compensation. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 691, note; Thornton, Oil & Gas, §§ 502, 505; Jones, Easements, § 491; Donahue, Petroleum & Gas, § 8, p. 92; Bloomfield & R. Natural Gaslight Co. v. Calkins, 62 N. Rep. 246, 2 Atl. 105.

HARDMAN v. CABOT seems to be the only case laying down a contrary rule.

But where a county has acquired the fee-simple title to land appropriated for a highway, an abutting owner is entitled to no compensation because of the laying of gas pipes therein, unless he suffers some special damage thereby. Ward v. Triple State Nat. Gas & Oil Co. supra.

As to the right to lay such pipes in city streets, there is some conflict among the authorities. The text-books, however, generally favor the doctrine that such use of a city street does not impose an additional burden. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 691, note; 3 Abbott, Mun. Corp. § 870; Thornton, Oil & Gas, § 500; Jones, Easements, § 491.

Some of the cases holding such a pipe line an additional servitude on a country highway intimate that a different rule might apply in case of city streets.

does not impose an additional burden upon the estate in fee in the land.

Same—urban and suburban roads.

2. In respect to the rights of the public in highways, held under valid dedications and acceptances, and the power of the legislature over the same, there is no distinction in this state between the streets of incorporated cities and towns and country roads.

Same—gas main—consent of authorities.

3. Certain rights of use in public highways, owing to their peculiar nature, are dependent upon the will of the authorities having control of the streets and roads, and can be exercised only with their consent and under such restrictions as they, in the exercise of their discretion, may see fit to impose. Among these the right to convey

Thus in Sterling's Appeal, supra, the court said: "As to streets and alleys in cities and boroughs, there are reasons why a different rule, to some extent, should prevail."

And the court, in McDevitt v. People's Natural Gas Co. 160 Pa. 367, 28 Atl. 948, in referring to this language, said: "These reasons are obvious. The necessity for drainage, for a water supply, for gas for purposes of lighting, for natural or fuel gas for heat, for subways for telegraph and other wires, and for other urban necessities or conveniences, gives to the municipality a control over the subsurface that the township has not. Property in a city is no less sacred than property in the country. The title of the owner is neither better nor worse because of the location of his land. But its situation may subject it to a greater servitude in favor of the public in a large, compactly built city than would be imposed upon it in the open country. The city has the right to use the streets and alleys, to whatever depth below the surface it may be desirable to go, for sewers, gas and water mains, and any other urban uses. In taking the streets for these necessary or desirable purposes, it is acting not for its own profit, but for the public good. It is the representative of the inhabitants of the city, considering their health, their family comfort, and their business needs; and every lot owner shares in the benefits which such an appropriation of the streets and alleys confers. If the city abridges his control over the soil in and under the streets, it compensates him by making him a sharer in the public advantages that result from proper drainage, from an abundant water supply, from the general distribution of gas, and the like." It was therefore held that as by statute the transportation of natural gas was declared to be a public use, and as the company had received permission from the city to use the streets as a means of reaching customers, it might lawfully enter upon the streets to lay its pipes without liability to lot owners therefor.

In an earlier Pennsylvania case the right of a city, by ordinance, to confer upon a gas natural gas for public use along a highway by means of pipes laid under the surface is included.

Same—natural person.

4. Permission to so use a public road may be granted, by a county court, to a natural person.

Same—effect of public use.

5. In a suit to enjoin the use of a public road, under permission therefor, granted by a county court for the purpose of conveying natural gas along the same by means of pipes laid under the surface thereof, for public consumption, as a means of producing heat and light, on the ground that the pipes are not maintained, and the gas conveyed by means of them, for such purpose, the plaintiff must allege and prove the fact; wherefore, the defendant may introduce evidence to prove that the pipes are so maintained and the gas so conveyed, in resistance of the effect of the plaintiff's evidence, under his denial of the allegation of the bill.

Equity—allegation and proof.

6. In assailing a prima facie right or title by a bill in equity, the plaintiff must aver and prove facts sufficient to overcome it. Ordinarily, he cannot otherwise put the defendant to the proof of a perfect, indefeasible title or right.

(November 27, 1906.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Circuit Court for Calhoun County dissolving a temporary injunction which had been granted to restrain defendant from company the right to lay its gas mains in the city streets without the consent of the owners of the fee to the center line of the street, and without just compensation being made to them, was denied. Mallory v. Bradford, 1 Pa. Dist. R. 670. The court referred to the dictum in Sterling's Appeal, but refused to follow it, saying: "If the laying of a pipe or gas line in a rural highway is a taking within the meaning of the Constitution, I am not able to see why the laying of the same pipe line is not such taking within the limits of a city or borough. Is not the right of a city or borough landowner just as sacred and as securely guarded by law as that of the rural owner? It may well be held that, under the police powers of municipalities, the landowner must yield a larger control over his property to the public authorities, this for the public good and on the theory, doubtless, that he will receive larger corresponding benefits and protection. But it does not seem to me that this doctrine can be justly carried so far as to permit councils, by ordinance, to turn over to a private corporation, organized for profit, the perpetual use of the property of a citizen. Suppose the defendant company, under the authority of such ordinance alone, lays its gas line upon a street of the city, and subsequently such street shall be lawfully vacated. What, then, are the rights of the parties? Surely, the complete control and right of possession to the land reverts to the owner, and it would therefore appear that the defendant company would be occupying the land of another with its gas lines without shadow or color of right. . . . I do not mean now to decide that a city or borough may not itself, by its proper officers, lay mains in its streets and furnish gas and water to its inhabitants, where it owns the plant. But, conceding that this may be done, it does not follow that such city or borough can confer such right upon a private corporation organized for profit."

In Webb v. Ohio Gas Fuel Co. 9 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 662, also, the laying of fuel gas pipes in a city street by a private corporation, under authority of ordinance, is held to constitute an additional burden, for which the holders of the fee of the street are entitled to compensation, though abutting owners who do not hold the fee are held obliged to show special damage in order to be entitled to compensation. The court here said: "Ordinary sewers, and, perhaps, illuminating gas pipes, and some kind of water pipes, laid in public streets, comprise one class of urban servitudes, arising out of reasons of public health, convenience, and necessity. But how can a use such as the one at bar be brought within this doctrine? Here we have a corporation organized for the purpose of producing, transporting, and selling gas for fuel anywhere in the district named in its charter. For aught that appears, the city of Youngstown is—and the evidence tends to so show—only one of the stations in its system. It is, in fact, a private corporation, with some public features, organized not for one city alone, but for the entire district named, or any part of it, as it may select. How such an institution, contemplating the supply of fuel for manufacturing and other purposes, anywhere in said district, can be brought within the doctrine of urban servitudes, I am unable to see."

Where the fee-simple title is in the city, there can, of course, be no question of its right to use the street in any way that may subserve the public good.

Thus, in Illinois, where the fee title to streets is vested in the municipality, it is held to be the general doctrine that municipalities, under the power of exclusive control over their streets, may allow any use of them consistent with the public objects for which they are held, and that uses for the purpose of sewers, gas pipes, and water pipes are among those for which the use of streets may be granted.

But, as to this distinction between cases where the city owns the fee of the street and cases where it does not, Dillon (vol. 2, Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 688, p. 818) says: "Whether the municipal corporation holds the fee of the street or not, the true doc-

Poffenbarger, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Marcellus Hardman feels aggrieved by the action of the judge of the circuit court of Calhoun county, in dissolving, in vacation, an injunction, which he had obtained, inhibiting and restraining Godfrey L. Cabot from locating, maintaining, and operating a gas-pipe line in a public road, running through the lands of said Hardman, under permission for occupation thereof, granted by the county court of said county, which pipe line was required, by said order of permission, to be placed under the surface of the road at least 2 feet.

Certain conclusions to which we have come, and which seem to be accordant with those of the trial court, render it unnecessary to discuss a number of questions, concerning which elaborate arguments are found in the briefs. This will be apparent to counsel from the following statement of principles and conclusions: Assuming for the present that the use to which the road is subjected, in the exercise of the privilege so granted, is within the purpose for which the road was dedicated to the public, and accepted by its authorities, and does not constitute an additional servitude upon the land, the title to which is in the plaintiff, subject to a right of use in the public for highway purposes, the important question arises whether such permission can be granted by a county court to a private individual, for the purpose of enabling him, by means thereof, to subserve the public interest by supplying the inhabitants of the community with natural gas for the purposes of heat and illumination. Express authority for granting such permits to incorporated companies organized for the purpose of transporting petroleum oil and natural gas is conferred upon county courts by § 24 of chapter 52 of the Code 1899 [Code 1906, § 2229]. It is earnestly insisted by counsel for the appellee that the authority conferred by that section is broad enough to enable such tribunal to grant like permits or privileges to private individuals; and Lowther v. Bridgeman, 57 W. Va. 306, 50 S. E. 410, is cited as authority for the proposition. But it was carefully noted in that case that the act of the legislature authorizing the occupation of public roads by telephone companies, with the consent of county courts, was not amendatory of any chapter of the Code relating to corporations; wherefore this court was able to place a liberal construction upon the word "companies," used in the act. It may well be doubted whether chapter 113, p. 337, of the Acts of 1891, adding a new section to chapter 52 of the Code of 1899 [Code 1906, §§ 2207-2229], relating to corporations generally, falls within the line of that process of reasoning. But this is not conclusive. While we may not be able to say the word "companies," as used in chap. 52, § 24, Code 1899 [Code 1906, § 936], includes copartnerships or individuals, the spirit of that and other statutes may sustain the action of the county court.

It is far less important for us to know, and for the legislature to declare, what persons may make a certain use of a highway, than what may be lawfully done in it. All persons, both natural and artificial, are entitled to use public highways, and have equal rights in respect to them; but there is a limitation upon all as to the manner in which they may use them. Some of the uses that courts have deemed to be within the grant of the land for highway purposes are such in character as cannot be exercised with safety to the public, or without working prejudice to persons using the way in the ordinary modes, in the absence of regulation. To the end that proper rules and regulations may be established in every such case, persons desiring to exercise such powers must obtain permission to do so, and the permission is granted upon terms and conditions intended to prevent the use permitted from rendering the highway unsafe to other persons or producing an unreasonable restraint upon their privileges. To this class belong railways, telegraph and telephone lines, sewers, and water and gas pipes. The legislature, in expressly authorizing the use of highways, under permission of the county courts, by corporations engaged in the service of the public, for the location and operation of their gas pipes, has declared that such use is proper. Who may have it is a matter of no consequence, in so far as it affects the road, but of immense importance as regards the public. We are not to impute to the legislature an intention to allow corporations greater rights in public highways than natural persons. That private persons may engage in public service, such as is usually carried on by corporations, has been declared by this court. Lowther v. Bridgeman, supra; Charleston Natural Gas Co. v. Lowe, 52 W. Va. 662, 44 S. E. 410; Watson v. Fairmont & Suburban R. Co. 49 W. Va. 528, 39 S. E. 193. The legislature has expressly so declared, also, in § 1, chap. 44, p. 100, of the Acts of 1891, as to the transportation of petroleum oil.

That railroads, whether operated by steam or other motive power, and telegraph and telephone lines, do not impose additional servitudes, when located in highways, be they city streets or country roads, is abundantly settled by the decisions of this court. Watson v. Fairmont & Suburban R. Co. and Lowther v. Bridgeman, supra; Arbenz v. Wheeling & H. R. Co. 33 W. Va. 1, 5 L.R.A. 371, 10 S. E. 14; Spencer v. Point Pleasant & O. River R. Co. 23 W. Va. 406; McEl-downey v. Lowther, 49 W. Va. 348, 38 S. E. 644. To hold the contrary, as regards pipe lines for conveying gas, water, and other supplies, would be most disastrous to cities, towns, and counties of this state, in which hundreds, possibly thousands, of miles of such pipes have been laid in the highways, without any thought on the part of the fee owner of any right in him to prevent it, until payment of compensation should be made. In the states of Indiana, Pennsylvania, and some others, such use of a highway is regarded and treated as subjecting the land to an additional servitude; but there is a great deal of high authority to the contrary, besides a lack of forcefulness in the reasoning upon which the decisions declaring the doctrine are based. In Bishop v. North Adams Fire District, 167 Mass. 364, 45 N. E. 925, the court held that the public authorities might lay water pipes in a public highway without the payment of any compensation to an abutting landowner, although the highway, of which he owned the fee, was thereby subjected to an additional public use. This decision was based upon the doctrine announced in Atty. Gen. v. Metropolitan R. Co. 125 Mass. 515, 28 Am. Rep. 264, and Pierce v. Drew, 136 Mass. 75, 49 Am. Rep. 7. In the latter of these two cases, which involved the right to compensation for a supposed additional servitude, resulting from the location of a telegraph line in a public highway, the court said, at page 81 of 136 Mass., at page 12 of 49 Am. Rep.: "When the land was taken for a highway, that which was taken was not merely the privilege of traveling over it in the then-known vehicles, or of using it in the then-known methods, for either the conveyance of property or transmission of intelligence. Although the horse railroad was deemed a new invention, it was held that a portion of the road might be set aside for it, and the rights of other travelers, to some extent, limited by those privileges necessary for its use. . . . The discovery of the telegraph developed a new and valuable mode of communicating intelligence." In another part of the opinion it said: "It has never been doubted that, by authority of the legislature, highways might be used for gas or water pipes intended for the convenience of the citizens, although the gas or water was conducted thereunder by companies formed for the purpose; or for sewers, whose object was not merely the incidental one of cleaning the streets, but also the drainage of private estates, the rights of which to enter therein were subject to public regulations. . . . Nor can we perceive that these are to be treated as incidental uses, as suggested by the plaintiff, because the pipes are conducted under the surface of the traveled way, rather than above it. The rights of the owner of the fee must be the same in either case, and the use of the land under the way for gas pipes or sewers would effectually prevent his own use of it for cellarage or similar purposes." The theory of incidental use, thus repudiated, was that pipes could be used only for the purposes of the highway, such as supplying it with light and water, and draining it. The court held the additional public use was not an additional burden upon the land. See Watson v. Fairmont & Suburban R. Co. supra, for approval of some of the principles declared in said case. The Indiana, Pennsylvania, and other decisions denying the power of the legislature to authorize such use of rural highways make a distinction between such highways and streets of cities and towns. This court recognizes no such distinction. Lowther v. Bridgeman, supra. Some of them assign as a reason for the additional-servitude doctrine that such an occupation of the land would ripen into title by lapse of time. As it is under permission, not title or claim of title, it is difficult to see how it could be adverse. In the case of streets, the exercise of such right is universally recognized, and held not to impose any additional burden. Elliott, Roads & Streets, § 405.

That the surface, the use of which is granted for highway purposes, includes more than the visible part of the land, has been often declared by the courts, and is affirmed by constant experience. Excavations, fills, and the laying of deep foundations for bridges are necessary. Danforth,

J., said, in Story v. New York Elev. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 122, 161, 43 Am. Rep. 146: "The public purpose of a street requires of the soil the surface only. Very ancient usage permits the introduction under it of sewers and water pipes, and upon it posts for lamps." In Coverdale v. Charlton, L. R. 4 Q. B. Div. 104, Lord Justice Bramwell said: "'Street' comprehends what we may call the surface; that is to say, not a surface bit of no reasonable thickness, but a surface of such thickness as the local board may require for the purpose of doing to the street that which is necessary for it as a street, and also of doing those things which commonly are done in or under the streets." What has just been said, it must be observed, assumes that the grantee of this permission will use the pipe line in the service of the public. Upon the evidence adduced, the circuit court has necessarily found that such is the intention, and the evidence seems to amply justify the finding. The defendant testifies that he has 30 miles or more of gas mains, of which this pipe will form a part, used in distributing natural gas, and that he is supplying a number of private customers. It seems not to be contested that he is supplying the people of the town of Brookville and vicinity; and he says if he is unable to lay the large line in controversy he will be obliged to obtain gas from some place other than his Leaf Bank field, in order to give his customers down the river an adequate supply; and further, that some of his customers in that section are complaining of the lack of an adequate supply. Lack of capacity to give his customers an adequate supply of gas by means of the 6¼-inch pipe, which is already laid over the plaintiff's land at some distance from the public road, seems clearly to be the cause of his effort to put in the 10-inch pipe on the road. His testimony is not as full and definite as it might be, but we think it sufficiently discloses the public nature of the business in which he is engaged and the necessity of the use of the road to enable him to successfully prosecute it.

His right of occupation of the road for the purpose and in the manner aforesaid is denied in the argument, on the ground that no notice of his application to the county court for the privilege or franchise was given in the manner prescribed by the statute; but the bill does not charge failure to give such notice. As will be shown herein, the plaintiff is bound to show that the defendant's occupation of the road is wrongful, in order to sustain the injunction, and, under well-settled principles and rules of equity practice, he must allege whatever it is necessary to prove. But, aside from this, such notice would only have given him an opportunity to be heard before the granting of the privilege, and he has had the equivalent of that in the hearing given him upon his motion, after the permit had been given, to revoke the same, upon which hearing the court modified its order and curtailed the privilege to such an extent as it thought any body was entitled to have it restricted, by requiring the defendant to put his pipe 2 feet under the ground, instead of 18 inches, as prescribed in the first order. The statute requiring notice of such applications does not confer any judicial powers upon the tribunals to which they apply, nor vest in any citizen the right to prevent or control action, otherwise than to the extent of being heard in opposition, by remonstrance or otherwise. Benwood v. Wheeling R. Co. 53 W. Va. 465, 44 S. E. 271. However, we do not decide that he is precluded by the hearing on his motion to revoke from having such relief, if any, as he is entitled to by reason of the granting of the permit, without notice having been given, if it was so granted. This matter is not in the case. Since, in using the road as aforesaid, by permission of the county court, the defendant has not taken, and is not attempting to take, any of the land of the plaintiff, it is quite clear that some of the principles enunciated in Charleston Natural Gas Co. v. Lowe and other condemnation suits are not applicable, and much of the argument in the briefs of counsel for the appellant need not, therefore, be responded to. Whether his property has been, or will be, injured by a rightful occupation of the road is an entirely different matter. For that he is not entitled to an injunction, as has been emphatically asserted by a number of decisions of this court, unless the injury is so great as to amount to a virtual taking of the property. Watson v. Fairmont & Suburban R. Co. 49 W. Va. 528, 39 S. E. 193; McEldowney v. Lowther, 49 W. Va. 348, 38 S. E. 644; Taylor v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 33 W. Va. 39, 10 S. E. 29; Arbenz v. Wheeling & H. R. Co. 33 W. Va. 1, 5 L.R.A. 371, 10 S. E. 14; Spencer v. Point Pleasant & O. River R. Co. 23 W. Va. 406; Mason v. Harper's Ferry Bridge Co. 17 W. Va. 396. By these decisions he is limited to his action at law for compensation in damages.

In his answer Cabot did not aver that his use of the road was permitted for a public purpose. On the motion to dissolve, he tendered, and was permitted to file, over the objection of the plaintiff, an amended answer, setting up this fact. Before doing so, he had taken depositions to prove it. On objection to the reading of the depositions for that reason, the court gave leave to re-take them. Thereupon the parties filed a stipulation by which the plaintiff waived the right to require the depositions to be retaken and consented to the reading thereof. It is here assigned as error that the court considered this evidence and founded its decree thereon, because the objection to the filing of the amended answer has not been waived and is insisted upon, and, without said amended answer, there is no allegation of the fact which the testimony proves. Well-settled principles deny the right to file the amended answer, upon the facts disclosed by the affidavits, tendered with it. But the evidence is admissible without any affirmative allegation of the fact. The defendant's occupation and use of the road is not the occupation and the use of the plaintiff's land, for it is covered by the grant out of said land to the public of the right to use, and the permission given to the defendant confers upon him no right in excess of that which the public has in respect to the land. Hence, in order to sustain his injunction it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to show that, in granting to the defendant the privilege which he had, the county court, in some way, exceeded its authority. This might have been done by alleging and proving that the purpose for which the privilege was granted, and the use to which the road was thereby subjected, were not public in their nature, or, possibly, but we do not so decide, by failure to give the notice of the application. In this ruling we apply nothing more than elementary rules of pleading and practice. The defendant has the prima facie right. Anyone who seeks to deprive him of that must overcome it with proof, and must lay a basis for his proof in his pleadings. The occupant of land is not compelled to make a disclosure of his title merely because somebody challenges his right to it. He who seeks to set aside a deed on the ground of fraud or a defect of any kind, be it apparent upon the face of, or found in some matter dehors, the instrument, and to be established by proof alunde, must allege that defect, as well as prove it, in order to invalidate, or obtain relief against, the deed. That the defendant has the prima facie right is apparent, and not disputed. The road is a public one, having been under the control of public authorities and used by the public for half a century or more, and the county court granted a privilege in it which it had a right to grant for aught that has been shown by the plaintiff. "Every averment necessary to entitle a plaintiff to be entertained in a court of equity must be contained in the bill." Vanbibber v. Beirne, 6 W. Va. 168; Eib v. Martin, 5 Leigh, 141; Parker v. Carter, 4 Munf. 273, 6 Am. Dec. 513. And the plaintiff must assert his claim with reasonable certainty. Zell Guano Co. v. Heatherly, 38 W. Va. 409, 18 S. E. 611.

Seeing no error in the order complained of, we affirm it.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

UNITED STATES STANDARD VOTING MACHINE COMPANY

v.

A. N. HOBSON.

Certiorari—facts—consideration of.

1. Facts not appearing in the return to a writ of certiorari, nor in any other manner which would enable the court to take notice of them, are not to be considered in determining the propriety of the writ.

Same—injunction suit—answers—effect.

2. The filing of answers in an injunction suit in which a restraining order has been issued to prevent the carrying out of a contract does not defeat the right of defendants to apply for a writ of certiorari to annul the injunction.

Same—right of appeal.

3. The right to appeal from an order restraining performance of a contract for voting machines does not defeat the right to apply for a writ of certiorari to annul it on the ground that it was in excess of jurisdiction and therefore void, where the election at which the machines were to be used would pass before the appeal could be heard.

Equity—control of election—jurisdiction.

4. There is no right on the part of voters and taxpayers to injunctive relief against the use of voting machines at elections, and therefore the court has no jurisdiction of suits seeking such relief.

Elections—voting machines.

5. The use of voting machines is not prohibited by a constitutional provision that all elections shall be by ballot.

Same—statutory regulation—effect.

6. The approval for use at elections of a voting machine on which the whole ticket can be voted as a unit is not annulled by the passage of a statute striking the circle from the Australian ballot.

(October 24, 1906.)

Note.—The right to invoke the power of equity to protect one's right to vote is discussed in the opinion in the case of Shoemaker v. Des Moines, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 382, and the general subject of the power of equity to interfere in matters preceding the election is discussed in the note to that case.

PETITION for a writ of certiorari to annul an order restraining the use of voting machines at an election. Order annulled.

Statement by the Court:

This is a proceeding by certiorari to annul that portion of an order entered by the defendant as judge of the thirteenth judicial district holding the district court in and for Winneshiek county, granting a temporary injunction at the suit of one H. C. Hjerleid, plaintiff, in an action brought in equity against Winneshiek county, the board of supervisors, and the auditor of said county, and the United States Standard Voting Machine Company, as defendants, by which the defendants in that action (except the voting machine company, which had not at that time been served with notice) were enjoined and restrained from the use at the election in November, 1906, in said county, of voting machines, sold or contracted to be sold or furnished to said county by the voting machine company. The other portion of the restraining order, of which no complaint is made in this proceeding, enjoined and restrained the same defendants from paying for said machines either in cash, warrants, or bonds, or in any other manner, or from issuing warrants, orders, or bonds in payment therefor. The allegations of the petition in the injunction suit, so far as material to the determination of the question whether the portion of the restraining order complained of was proper, were, in brief (as appears by the return made by the defendant in this proceeding to the writ of certiorari issued from this court), that plaintiff, Hjerleid, was a resident, voter, and taxpayer of Winneshiek county; that on or about the 8th day of June, 1906, the defendant, the United States Standard Voting Machine Company presented to the defendant board of supervisors its written proposal to sell on trial to the defendant county certain voting machines, to be used at the November, 1906, election; that said proposal was accepted and adopted by the defendant board of supervisors; that subsequently a certain agreement in the nature of a contract between the voting machine company and the defendant county was approved by the defendant board of supervisors and signed by the chairman thereof under the authority of the said board; that, in securing the adoption of the written proposal and the contract above referred to, certain representations were made by the voting machine company which were false and fraudulent, in that the contract was not, as understood by the board of supervisors, an embodiment of the written proposal, but amounted to an absolute barter-sale contract with a guaranty, and not a conditional contract as intended by said board, and that the board of supervisors never passed any other resolution or adopted any other contract than that authorizing the use of United States Standard voting machines on trial at the November, 1906, election in said county; that the alleged contract above referred to was absolutely void, for the reason that there is no law authorizing the use at elections in Iowa of voting machines, and that title 6, chap. 3a, of the Code of Iowa (Supplement of 1902), is unconstitutional; that the commissioners appointed under and by virtue of the authority conferred by § 1137c of chapter 3a, title 6, of the Code of Iowa (Supplement of 1902), has not approved said machines since the enactment of the constitutional amendment relating to biennial elections, nor since the acts of the thirty-first general assembly of Iowa in relation thereto, and that such approval was necessary to authorize the defendant board of supervisors to enter into any contract for the purchase of such machines; that § 1137e of said chapter 3a (Supplement of 1902), relating to the use of voting machines, and providing that one ballot may be placed in each party column or row containing only the words "Presidential Electors," preceded by the party name, and that a vote for such ballot shall operate as a vote for all the candidates of such party for presidential electors, is unconstitutional and violative of the constitutional amendment with reference to biennial elections, in not affording to the individual voter an opportunity to pass personal choice upon each and every candidate for office; that the voting machines referred to in the proposal and contract were inadequate and their use illegal, and not in conformity with the requirements of the laws of the thirty-first general assembly with reference to elections, inasmuch as their construction permitted the use of so-called party levers, which substantially nullified the effect and purpose of the statute removing the circle from the official ballot; that plaintiff was a duly qualified voter, and the use of said machine for voting purposes was not a vote or voting by ballot, and that their said use at said election would be unconstitutional and would nullify such election, causing great expense and trouble to the people of said county, including the plaintiff; and that by the terms of the contract above referred to it was provided that the defendant county would, at its meeting in November, 1906, pay to the defendant the voting-machine company for said machines the sum of $17,550, and that, unless restrained by injunction, the defendant voting machine company would deliver to defendant county the said twenty-seven voting machines, and the said county would, in pursuance of said contract, accept said machines and pay to the defendant voting machine company the purchase price thereof, and the property of the plaintiff and of the other taxpayers throughout said county would be taxed to raise funds for the payment of said sum, and, unless restrained, the said machines would be used at said November election, making it impossible thereafter to replace the parties defendant in statu quo, and plaintiff would be remediless at law to recover his loss or protect his said rights, and that plaintiff had no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law.

Messrs. Read & Read, J. K. Macomber, and Frank Keiper, for plaintiff:

The matter being a political one, the defendant was without jurisdiction to restrain the board of supervisors of Winneshiek county from using voting machines in holding elections.

Per Curiam:

In a motion submitted with the case, the defendant asks that the petition for a writ of certiorari be dismissed, and the writ be quashed; but in the main the grounds urged in the motion are such as may be considered in passing upon the merits of the case, involving the legality of defendant's action in making the portion of the order which restrains the county of Winneshiek and its board of supervisors and auditor from using the voting machines referred to in the action of the board at the November election. It is urged, however, that the plaintiffs in this action, having subsequently appeared in the injunction suit as defendants, filed an answer therein, and otherwise raised issues of law and fact, have a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by appeal. With reference to the filing of the subsequent pleadings in the injunction suit, to which reference is made in the motion to dismiss the petition and quash the writ, it is sufficient to say that, whatever may have been the effect of such action on the part of the defendants in the injunction suit, the facts do not appear by the return, nor in any other manner, such as would enable us to take notice of them, and therefore they need not be considered. But, even if they were to be considered, we cannot see that they would affect the present proceedings, for the injunction suit was still pending, and the portion of the order restraining the county and its board of supervisors and auditor from carrying out the contract with the voting machine company, by accepting the machines and paying therefor under the terms of the alleged contract, was still in force. The voting machine company was still in court for a proper purpose, regardless of the validity of that portion of the restraining order questioned in this proceeding.

As to the ground of the motion involving the claim that the plaintiffs cannot maintain this certiorari proceeding, because they have a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by appeal from the order granting the temporary injunction, it is enough to say, briefly, that in our judgment the right to appeal does not preclude plaintiffs from questioning the validity of the portion of the order complained of, on the ground that it was made in excess of jurisdiction and is therefore void and should be annulled. It is provided in Code, § 4154, that "the writ of certiorari may be granted when authorized by law, and in all cases where an inferior tribunal, board, or officer exercising judicial functions is alleged to have exceeded its proper jurisdiction, or is otherwise acting illegally, and there is no other plain, speedy, and adequate remedy." It is contended in behalf of plaintiff that "other plain, speedy, and adequate remedy" is only a limitation of the power to issue the writ where the tribunal exercising judicial functions is alleged to be "otherwise acting illegally," and that it has no application to a case where an inferior tribunal is alleged "to have exceeded its proper jurisdiction." But we think that the correctness of this view need not be passed upon, in view of our conclusion that the remedy by appeal is not such plain, speedy, and adequate remedy as to preclude the right to test the validity of the order in question, as against the complaint that it was made without jurisdiction. Of course, the writ of certiorari is not available to correct mere irregularities or errors in the proceedings of the lower court. It may be that illegality of action, where the court has jurisdiction, may sometimes be tested by certiorari, and, in such a case, the want of a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by appeal may be important. But, where the action complained of is in excess of the jurisdiction of the court, it is doubtful whether the remedy by appeal is ever plain, speedy, and adequate. Certainly, in this case an appeal would neither have been speedy nor adequate, for it would have postponed any test of the validity of the order prohibiting the use of voting machines at the November election of this year until long after the election had been held. In a case involving an injunction to test the title to an office, when the term of office would probably expire before the appeal could be heard and decided, this pertinent language was used in State ex rel. McCaffery v. Aloe, 152 Mo. 466, 47 L.R.A. 393, 54 S.W. 494, with reference to a writ of prohibition, serving the same purpose, as we understand it, that is served by the writ of certiorari under our procedure: "It is also contended by learned counsel that relators had their remedy by motion to dissolve, and by appeal on final judgment. Prohibition is an extraordinary remedy, and will not lie where the party claiming it has adequate remedy by ordinary means. But the ordinary means that will defeat the application for this extraordinary writ must be sufficient to afford the relief the case demands. If the relators should await to follow the course pointed out by their adversaries, it would, in all probability, be a year before their appeal could be heard and decided, and it would be perhaps two years, if the cause took its regular course without advancements, both in the trial and appellate courts." In our own cases, we find nothing to indicate that an appeal is a speedy and adequate remedy, where the question is as to want of jurisdiction to make the order complained of. Indeed, it is a justifiable inference, from those cases where the question of the adequacy of the remedy by appeal has been considered, that such remedy would not preclude resort to certiorari, if the jurisdiction of the subject-matter were the question involved. See State v. Schmidt, 65 Iowa, 556, 22 N. W. 673; Abney v. Clark, 87 Iowa, 727, 55 N. W. 6; Callanan v. Lewis, 79 Iowa, 452, 44 N. W. 892. We are clear that, in this case at least, the remedy by appeal, to which plaintiff might have resorted, was not such a speedy and adequate remedy as to preclude his resort to this proceeding by certiorari.

On the merits of the case, as made by the return to the writ, the position strongly relied upon for plaintiff is that the lower court had no power or authority, under the allegations of the petition for injunction, to interfere with the use of voting machines at the November election, 1906, as provided for by the board of supervisors. And to this broad proposition we shall now direct our attention, without attempting to follow the course of argument mapped out by counsel on either side. The right to vote is a political, and not a civil, right, and a court of equity will not exercise its extraordinary power of injunction to protect a mere political right as distinct from a civil right. The plaintiff in the injunction case, as a taxpayer, could no doubt have relief by injunction to prevent the board of supervisors and the county auditor, defendants in that action, from attempting to carry out a contract which would impose an unlawful indebtedness upon the county; but, as a taxpayer, he had no interest in the question whether or not the November election in the county should be held by means of voting machines, and, as a voter, he had no interest in the method of conducting the election which would entitle him to control that method by the assistance of a court of equity. Some remedy at law he would, no doubt, have, if his right to vote were interfered with; but a court of law would not give him relief as against a mere anticipated wrong. It is to be noticed that the want of jurisdiction of the lower court to grant relief in equity was not on account of the want of right of the plaintiff in the injunction suit to maintain the action, but on account of the absence of any equitable right to relief on the part of anyone; and therefore the want of jurisdiction did not grow out of the incapacity of the particular plaintiff, but out of the incapacity of any plaintiff, to have such remedy. Therefore the question is not as to the capacity of the plaintiff to sue, but the power of the court to give the attempted relief.

That courts of equity cannot interfere by injunction to protect a claimed political right is too well settled to require extended discussion. A few references to illustrations found in adjudicated cases will show the reasonableness and propriety of this rule. In Fletcher v. Tuttle, 151 Ill. 41, 25 L.R.A. 143, 42 Am. St. Rep. 220, 37 N. E. 683, the question was as to the jurisdiction of a court of equity to grant an injunction to prevent the giving of election notices, or the certifying of nominees for districts created by an apportionment act which was claimed to be unconstitutional; and the court, holding that an injunction could not be granted for the protection of a political, as distinguished from a civil or property, right, used this language: "The complainant is a legal voter and a candidate for a particular elective office, and by his bill he is seeking the protection and enforcement of his right to cast his own ballot in a legal and effective manner, and also his right to be such candidate, to have the election called and held under the provisions of a valid law, and to have his name printed upon the ballots to be used at such election, so that he may be voted for in a legal manner. The rights thus asserted are all purely political; nor, so far as this question is concerned, is the matter aided in the least by the attempt made by the complainant . . . to litigate on behalf of other voters, or of the people of the state generally. The claims thus attempted to be set up are all of the same nature and are none the less political." And, further, the court says: "The extraordinary jurisdiction of courts of chancery cannot therefore be invoked to protect the right of a citizen to vote or to be voted for at an election, or his right to be a candidate for or to be elected to any office; nor can it be invoked for the purpose of restraining the holding of an election, or of directing or controlling the mode in which, or of determining the rules of law in pursuance of which, an election shall be held. These matters involve in themselves no property rights, but pertain solely to the political administration of government. If a public officer charged with political administration has disobeyed, or threatens to disobey, the mandate of the law, whether in respect to calling or conducting an election, or otherwise, the party injured or threatened with injury in his political rights is not without remedy; but his remedy must be sought in a court of law, and not in a court of chancery." In the case of State ex rel. McCaffery v. Aloe, supra, already referred to, involving the right of a court of equity to enjoin the entrance of a person to office and to declare his title invalid, this language is used: "The real and only purpose of the suit in the circuit court was to bar the entrance to the office of board of election commissioners by injunction, and to obtain a decree of a chancery court, declaring relators' title to the office invalid. This is a subject over which a chancery court has no jurisdiction. The courts of law are open to all persons who have rights of that nature which have been violated, and ample means are afforded in those courts for the vindication of such rights and the redress of their wrongs." And, after saying that the powers of a court of chancery cannot be invoked to protect by injunction purely political rights, the court continues: "No such jurisdiction has ever been conceded to a chancery court, either in the Federal or state judiciary. The political rights of a citizen are as sacred as are his rights to personal liberty and property; but he must go into a court of law for them. A court of equity is a one-man power, wielding the strong force of injunction, often issued at chambers, and on ex parte hearing. Neither in England nor America has this power been suffered to extend to political affairs." Without further quotation, it will be sufficient to cite the following additional cases supporting the general proposition that a court of equity cannot interfere, by injunction, to protect political rights: Georgia v. Stanton, 6 Wall. 50, 18 L. ed. 721; Re Sawyer, 124 U. S. 200, 31 L. ed. 402, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 482; Shoemaker v. Des Moines, 129 Iowa, 244, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 382, 105 N. W. 520. The conclusion is inevitable that, so far as the order of the lower court restrains the use of voting machines authorized by the board of supervisors to be used at the November election, it is beyond the jurisdiction and power of the court to make, and is void.

But by way of illustrating the kind of questions which a court of equity would be compelled to pass upon and make determinative of the method of conducting elections, if the power which the lower court has attempted to exercise were held to be within its jurisdiction, we may refer to a few of the most important grounds presented to the lower court for granting a preliminary injunction. It is urged that the statute (Acts 28th Gen. Assem. p. 19, chap. 37; Code Supp. 1902, §§ 1137a-1137u) authorizing the use of voting machines is unconstitutional because of the provision in the state Constitution (article 2, § 6) that "all elections by the people shall be by ballot." In other words, the lower court was asked to interfere with a policy of the state declared by the legislature, unquestioned for six years, and in accordance with which elections have already been held in some of the counties and will doubtless be held in many more, whatever the result of the determination of the lower court on final hearing may be; for the action of that court can only be binding on parties to the suit, and the state of Iowa, under whose authority the county of Winneshiek acted in adopting voting machines, is not, and cannot be, a party to that suit or any other, for the determination of the question. If such power exists in a court of equity, then the method of conducting elections provided for under this or any other law may be interfered with and set aside. It has been held, however, that voting by such a machine is voting by ballot. Detroit v. Inspectors of Election, 139 Mich. 548, 69 L.R.A. 184, 102 N. W. 1029; Lynch v. Malley, 215 Ill. 574, 74 N. E. 723. Without elaborating the discussion, it is enough to say that the constitutional provision was intended to require and protect the secrecy of the ballot with the general purpose of guarding against intimidation, securing freedom in the exercise of the elective franchise, and reducing to a minimum the incentives to bribery. Ex parte Arnold, 128 Mo. 260, 33 L.R.A. 386, 49 Am. St. Rep. 559, 30 S. W. 768, 1036, and see cases referred to in those above cited. In no case, so far as we can discover, has the use of a voting machine been held unconstitutional. In Massachusetts the supreme court divided on the question whether a vote cast by means of such machine was a "written vote," within the language of the Constitution of that state, and three judges held that it was. Under the Constitution of Rhode Island requiring voting by ballot, it was held that a provision for voting machines was constitutional; the court saying: "The primary meaning of 'ballot,' which signified a little ball, is not the one intended, but the broader meaning which has been substituted for the word by reason of the change in the mode of voting from little balls to that of a paper vote." [Re McCammany Voting Machine, 19 R. I. 729, 36 L.R.A. 547, 36 Atl. 716.] We see no merit in the contention that the provision for use of voting machines is unconstitutional, and that an election in that method would be invalid.

It is urged by counsel that the machine adopted by the board of supervisors has not been approved by the commissioners provided for in Code Supp. 1902, §§ 1137c, 1137d. But they admit that the commissioners did approve of this very machine; the real claim now made being that such approval was prior to the recent constitutional amendment providing for biennial elections, and prior to the enactment of the recent statute (Acts 31st Gen. Assem. p. 30, chap. 44) striking the circle from the Australian ballot. The biennial election amendment makes no change in the method of conducting elections, and the statute referred to does not amend or repeal the provisions as to the use of voting machines. We see no reason for saying that a vote cast by means of an authorized machine will not be as valid and effectual as one cast by Australian ballot in accordance with the latest statute on the subject.

It is claimed that the machine adopted has not sufficient capacity for the number of candidates to be voted for in 1908, when presidential electors must be chosen; but this suit relates to the election of 1906, and the lower court was not called upon to determine the sufficiency of the machine for 1908. So far as the validity of the order preventing the use of the machine at the coming election is involved, it is wholly unnecessary to discuss the validity of the contract between the county and the voting machine company. That is left for determination in the lower court. The use of the machine under the adoption thereof by the board of supervisors for trial (the validity of which is not questioned) cannot possibly fasten upon the county any contract which the board of supervisors had no authority to make, or did not in fact make.

In conclusion, we need only reaffirm the proposition already announced, that the lower court had no power or jurisdiction to interfere with the use at the coming election in Winneshiek county of voting machines duly authorized to be used. And especially should there be no such interference where the plain purpose of the suit is not to secure a valid election, but to determine contract rights as between the county and a voting machine company, which rights can be fully adjusted in proper proceedings without prohibiting the conducting of a public election by methods authorized by law.

The part of the order of the lower court brought before us for review is therefore annulled.

Case Note.—Parent's mental anguish as element of damages, at common law, for personal tort to minor child: — SPERIER v. OTT seems to be the first case to pass on the question of the right of a parent to recover for mental suffering caused by the false arrest of his minor child. But the analogous question, referred to in the opinion, of the right to consider the parent's mental anguish in estimating the damages recoverable by him for physical injury to a 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

defendant is not responsible for its alleged consequences on the health of the mother. Same—action by child.

3. The action is maintained as to the demand of the two minors for exemplary damages for unlawful arrest, and for malicious prosecution.

(May 7, 1906.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans, Division "E," in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for alleged false imprisonment. Reversed in part.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. E. Howard M'Caleb and Nicholas Eugene Humphrey, for appellant:

Fright and mental anguish are legitimate causes for damages, under the jurisprudence of this state.

Graham v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 109 La. 1069, 34 So. 91; Lindsey v. Tioga Lumber Co. 108 La. 476, 92 Am. St. Rep. 384, 32 So. 464.

Negligence which occasions fright and causes serious personal injury is actionable.

Stewart v. Arkansas Southern R. Co. 112 La. 764, 36 So. 676.

Mr. Robert O'Connor, for appellee:

Damage must be the proximate or immediate cause of injury or death.

Sherman v. Vermillion Parish, 51 La. Ann. 886, 25 So. 538; Dwyer Bros. v. Tulane Educational Fund, 47 La. Ann. 1232, 17 So. 796.

The rule giving courts and juries great discretion in allowing and assessing damages not apparent applies exclusively to cases involving breach of contract.

Graham v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 109 La. 1070, 34 So. 91; Lindsey v. Tioga Lumber Co. 108 La. 469, 92 Am. St. Rep. 384, 32 So. 464; Downing v. Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. S. Co. 104 La. 522, 29 So. 207.

Land, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit for damages grounded on the alleged unlawful and malicious arrest and incarceration of two minor sons of the plaintiff, without a warrant, at the instance minor child resulting from negligence has been discussed in a number of cases, all of which have denied the right. Flemington v. Smithers, 2 Car. & P. 292; Bube v. Birmingham R. Light & P. Co. 140 Ala. 276, 103 Am. St. Rep. 33, 37 So. 285; Covington Street R. Co. v. Packer, 9 Bush, 455, 15 Am. Rep. 725; Black v. Carrollton R. Co. 10 La. Ann. 33, 63 Am. Dec. 586; Hartford County v. Hamilton, 60 Md. 340, 45 Am. Rep. 739; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Kelly, 31 Pa. 372; Oakland R. Co.

of the defendant. The petition alleges that the only pretext for such arrest was that said children, with a number of others, had carried away a few pieces of old and decayed boards from an abandoned shanty which was being demolished by the defendant. The petition further alleges that the plaintiff offered to restore said boards, besides paying any value that defendant might place on them, at the same time protesting that the children were innocent of the violation of any law or ordinance, and had acted under the belief that they were at liberty to take the boards, since the men, women, and children of the neighborhood were doing the same thing. The petition further alleges that on the next day the defendant made an affidavit charging said two children and others with malicious mischief, and subsequently threatened to charge them with larceny if a moneyed settlement was not made, and that finally his children were tried and acquitted.

It is alleged that the boys, aged thirteen and eleven years respectively, were arrested by a police officer and placed in a patrol wagon in the presence of their mother, "who was so shocked and affected thereby that she became ill as the result, and suffered both bodily and mental pain and anguish from the time of said arrest until the 7th of March, following, when petitioner was compelled to remove her to the Louisiana Retreat, where she continued to suffer, and where on the 18th day of March she died of a hemorrhage of the brain after seven weeks of the most excruciating bodily pain and mental anguish."

The petition further alleges that, at the time of the arrest, the wife and mother was in perfect health, and that the shock then received by her and her subsequent suffering and death were the direct result of the unlawful and malicious acts of the defendant.

The petition alleges damages to the husband in the sum of $10,000 and to his nine children in the sum of $10,000, occasioned by the death of the wife and mother.

v. Fielding, 48 Pa. 320; Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Barker, 33 Ark. 350, 34 Am. Rep. 44; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Tindall, 13 Ind. 368, 74 Am. Dec. 259; Galveston v. Barbour, 62 Tex. 172, 60 Am. Rep. 519; St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Gregory (Tex. Civ. App.) 73 S. W. 28; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Bowen, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 165, 81 S. W. 80.

The theory of most of these cases is that the parent's right of action for injury to his child is based on his right to the child's services and the pecuniary loss he has sustained because of the injury, and hence that his recovery must be limited to compensation for such pecuniary loss only.

Thus, in McGarr v. National & P. Worssted Mills, 24 R. I. 447, 60 L.R.A. 122, 96 Am. St. Rep. 749, 63 Atl. 320, where an instruction that damages may be awarded for loss of the child's society was held erroneous, the court said: "In an action of this sort the proper measure of damages is the pecuniary value of the child's services from the time of the injury until it attains its majority, less its support and maintenance, together with the necessary costs and expenses incident to the care and cure of the child. . . . But the jury are not at liberty to consider the fact that the plaintiff has been deprived of the comfort and society of the child, nor can they consider any physical or mental suffering or pain which may have been sustained by the parent by reason of the injury to the child. . . . The measure of damages in such a case is the same as that which obtains in a case brought by a master for the loss of services of his servant or apprentice. It is therefore practically a business and commercial question only, and the elements of affection and sentiment have no place therein."

In some cases, however, the courts have given as a reason for refusing damages for 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the parent's mental suffering that such damages are too remote and too difficult to estimate.

A distinction has sometimes been made between a wrong which results from negligence merely and one which results from a wilful act.

For instance, in Magee v. Holland, 27 N. J. L. 86, 72 Am. Dec. 341, where it was held that in assessing the damages in an action by a father for the abduction of a minor child the injury to his feelings as a father by losing his child might be considered, the court said that such a case was very different from a case of injury arising from an act of mere negligence.

And in Stowe v. Heywood, 7 Allen, 118, which was an action by a father for harboring and secreting his minor daughter and persuading her to remain absent from her home, the plaintiff was held entitled to recover damages for his mental suffering, though evidence thereof distinct from and in addition to that showing the nature and extent of the principal injury was held inadmissible.

And damages for injury to the parent's feelings were allowed in Trimble v. Spiller, 7 T. B. Mon. 395, 18 Am. Dec. 189, in case of an assault and battery upon a minor child. The court said there was no distinction between such a case and that of seduction. It is well settled that in case of seduction the parent's mental anguish may be an element of damages, and therefore such cases have not been included here.

But in Cowden v. Wright, 24 Wend. 429, 35 Am. Dec. 633, it is held that wounded feelings of a parent cannot be taken into consideration in assessing damages for an assault and battery upon his minor son; and the court in this case distinguished an action for seduction as being sui generis.

The petition further alleges damages to the children as heirs of the mother, in the sum of $5,000, for bodily pain and mental anguish by her suffered.

The petition further alleges damages to the husband in the sum of $500 for medical and funeral expenses. The petition finally alleges that petitioner was entitled to recover the sum of $2,500 as exemplary damages for the wanton and malicious acts of the defendant.

Plaintiff's petition was dismissed on an exception of no cause of action, and he has appealed. On the face of the petition the two minor sons of the plaintiff were the parties injured. The mother was a third person, and if she had lived could not have recovered for mental distress and shock. This very question was decided in Black v. Carrollton R. Co. 10 La. Ann. 33, 63 Am. Dec. 586, in well-considered opinions, in which all the justices agreed that a father could not recover damages for mental shock and anguish caused by the mutilation of his minor son in a railroad accident. Slidell, Ch. J., dissenting on another point, concurred in the opinion of the court that the father could not recover damages for mental suffering, and, after stating the general rule that actions for injury to the person are personal, said: "Moreover, let us bear in mind the difficulty which would result from recognizing the mental suffering of the third party as an element of damage. Where is any but an arbitrary limit to be found in extending its benefit? Could an action for damages on that ground, if allowed to the father, be refused to the mother, the brother, the sister?"

The general jurisprudence on the same subject is thus stated: "As a general rule, the right of recovery for mental suffering resulting from bodily injuries is restricted to the person who has suffered the bodily hurt. Mental distress caused by sympathy for another's suffering is not a recoverable element of damages. A parent cannot recover for mental distress and anxiety on account of physical injury sustained by a child, nor can a parent recover damages for anxiety for the safety of his or her child placed in peril by the negligence of another. Similarly, it has been held that a husband's mental suffering caused by his wife's condition cannot be shown to increase the amount of damages." 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 664.

Hence, we are of opinion that the petition discloses no cause of action, in so far as damages are claimed for the consequences of the mental shock suffered by the mother.

The petition, however, discloses a cause of action for exemplary damages in favor of the two minor children, who were arrested and prosecuted for malicious mischief.

Under the allegations the arrest was unlawful and the prosecution was malicious.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be reversed as to the minors, Lawrence and Alexander Sperier; and it is now ordered that, as to the demand of said minors for exemplary damages, the exception of no cause of action be overruled, and this cause be remanded for further proceedings according to law; and it is further ordered that as thus amended the judgment appealed from be affirmed; costs of appeal to be paid by the defendant and appellee.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

ISAAC WOODS, Plff. in Err.,

v.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS.

Gas—larceny.

1. A gas consumer who, by false connections, carries gas consumed on his premises around the meter so that it is not registered, may be prosecuted for larceny, notwithstanding a statute providing for the punishment of persons tampering or making false connections with gas pipes so that gas might be consumed without being registered by a meter.

Same—degree of crime.

2. To determine the degree of the crime of one who, by means of false connections, conveys gas around his meter and consumes it upon his property without having it measured, the taking during each day is not to be regarded as a separate offense, but the value of the gas wrongfully consumed during the period during which the false connection is in use at one time will be considered.

Same—value of property.

3. The selling, and not the cost, price, is to be considered in determining the value of gas stolen, for the purpose of fixing the degree of the crime.

(June 14, 1906.)

Case Note.—When larceny deemed continuous:—This question may arise in those jurisdictions where the degree or manner of punishment is made to depend upon the value of the property stolen.

Thus, in Lacey v. State, 22 Tex. App. 657, 3 S. W. 343, it appeared that lumber of the value of $23.50 had been taken by a series of thefts extending over several nights. It ERROR to the Criminal Court for Cook County to review a judgment convicting defendant of grand larceny. Affirmed.

Statement by Hand, J.:

The plaintiff in error, with James Woods and Thomas Light, was indicted by the grand jury of Cook county for the crime of larceny. The indictment contained three counts. The first count charged the larceny of illuminating and natural gas from the People's Gaslight & Coke Company. The second count was, in substance, the same as the first, and the third count charged defendants with larceny as bailees. James Woods was not arrested, and on the trial in the criminal court of Cook county Thomas Light was acquitted and the plaintiff in error was convicted, and, the property taken having been found by the jury to exceed $15 in value he was sentenced to the penitentiary for an indeterminate period, and he has prosecuted a writ of error from this court to reverse said judgment.

It appears from the evidence that the plaintiff in error was a dancing master, and from March, 1903, to December, 1904, conducted a dancing academy in a building located at 3947 Michigan avenue, in the city of Chicago, which building was to be lighted and heated by gas furnished through meters located in said building under and by virtue of a contract between the plaintiff in error and said light and coke company; that at regular intervals during said period the plaintiff in error or his employees re-was held that each night's theft constituted a complete and distinct offense, and, there being no evidence that the lumber taken during any one night was of the value of $20 or over, the state would not be permitted to construct a felony (grand larceny) out of two or more misdemeanors (petit larceny).

In Scarver v. State, 53 Miss. 407, the court said: "It is true that, where there is one continuing transaction, the thief may be convicted of the final carrying away, although there may have been several distinct asportations in the view of the law; but where there are successive larcenies, each complete and distinct, and not constituting one continuous transaction, the mere retention and possession by the thief of the fruits of his petit larcenies does not make him guilty of grand larceny."

In Cody v. State, 31 Tex. Crim. Rep. 183, 20 S. W. 398, the court said the general rule was that property taken at one time and one place constituted one transaction and one offense; but, when several articles or things in bulk were taken by continuous acts, there being one purpose, one impulse, the act was one, without regard to time. This exception to the rule was illustrated by the case of one driving a wagon to a fence and carrying cotton by successive basketfuls from a pile in a field 30 yards off to his wagon, which he fills and drives away; and by the case of one breaking into a store at night and carrying out by successive trips as much goods as he wishes. In both such cases it was said that the amount stolen would be the amount taken in the aggregate.

In Weaver v. Com. 27 Ky. L. Rep. 743, 86 S. W. 551, it was held that, if the articles were taken as the result of a single purpose or impulse, though the asportation was at intervals the better to suit the thief's convenience, the degree of the offense would not be lessened by the fact that he could not or did not carry away all the articles at one load; but, if he took at one time certain articles of less aggregate value than $20, and later determined to and did take others, also of less value than $20, but altogether being of the value of $20 or more, nevertheless the two larcenies could not be added together so as to sustain the charge of grand larceny.

In Monoughan v. People, 24 Ill. 340, the proof showed that 4 sheep were stolen on the same night from three different parties, but no more than 2 were taken at one time and from the same owner. The court said: "It was not proper for the jury to aggregate the value of the property stolen at several times for the purpose of finding the value of the property stolen to be over $5. A party may be guilty of several larcenies, but, if the value of the property taken at any one time amounts to less than $5, he is not liable to be sent to the penitentiary."

In Flynn v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 83 S. W. 206, it appeared that defendant, by successive orders for beer, during an hour or an hour and a half, induced the prosecutor to hand him $80, which he appropriated. It was held that this was such a continuous act as to constitute it one theft.

In King v. Petrie, 1 Leach, C. C. 294, it appeared that the prosecutor's servant had at different times purloined his master's property to a very considerable amount, but it did not appear that he had ever taken to the amount of 40 shillings at any one particular time, death being the punishment for stealing this amount from a dwelling house. It was held that property stolen must not only be, in the whole, of such a value as the law requires to constitute a capital offense, but it must be stolen to that amount at one and the same time; that a number of distinct petit larcenies cannot be combined so as to constitute grand larceny; nor can any distinct number of grand larcenies be added together so as to constitute a capital offense.

But in Rex v. Jones, 4 Car. & P. 217, it was held that, if the servant stole the articles one at a time, no one article being of the value of £5, but carried them out of the house all together, the articles amounting in all to more than £5 value, it was a capital offense.

In Rex v. Birdseye, 4 Car. & P. 386, it ap-moved the meters, and by rubber hose connections caused the gas to pass from the gas-service pipes of said light and coke company in said building direct to the gas burners in said building, where it was ignited and burned by the plaintiff in error for illuminating and heating purposes without being registered; his scheme being to remove the meters and substitute the rubber hose connections each month immediately after the meter reader had visited said premises and read the meters, and to allow said rubber hose connections to remain in place for about twenty days, or until about ten days before the reader of meters would return to said building, when he would replace the meters, and allow them to remain in position until the meter reader had read them, when he would again remove said meters, and substitute the rubber hose connections therefor; that some time prior to the 14th day of December, 1904, he substituted for the rubber hose connections a system of pipes, which were concealed in the walls of the building and which connected the gas burners within the building with the regular service pipes of said light and coke company which entered said building, and which concealed pipes were fitted with a stopcock, which, when turned, prevented the gas flowing through the meters and caused the same to flow direct to the gas burners, where it was ignited and used for illuminating and heating purposes in said building. The larceny of plaintiff in error was discovered by the inspectors of the light and coke company on the evening of December 14, 1904, at which time gas was passing through the concealed pipes in the wall to the burners in the building and being consumed in large quantities for illuminating and heating purposes without being registered. The plaintiff in error at that time admitted gas had been passing through said concealed pipes for three or four days prior to December 14th, and the evidence shows that the plaintiff in error had used gas for lighting and heating purposes in said building, admitted through the said rubber hose and without the same passing through the meters and being registered, for stated periods of about twenty days in each month from April, 1903, to December, 1904. There is therefore no question but that the plaintiff in error was properly convicted, if the taking of gas in the manner above described constitutes the crime of larceny, and no reversible error was committed on the trial.

Messrs. John E. W. Wayman and Elijah N. Zoline for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Frank Crowe, with Messrs. William H. Stead, Attorney General, and John J. Healy, for defendant in error:

The stealing of gas from day to day, or from month to month and during a certain portion of each succeeding month, constitutes one continuous act of larceny, and the amounts stolen during the whole period of time of such continuous taking may be added together in fixing the value of the total amount taken.

Queen v. Firth, L. R. 1 C. C. 172, 11 Cox, C. C. 234; Reg. v. White, 6 Cox, C. C. 213; Ferens v. O'Brien, 15 Cox, C. C. 332; State v. Wellman, 34 Minn. 221, 25 N. W. 395; State v. Martin, 82 N. C. 672; Com. v. Shaw, 4 Allen, 308, 81 Am. Dec. 706; Reg. v. Bleasdale, 2 Car. & K. 765.

The statute of frauds against a gas company (1 Starr & C. Anno. Stat. § 234, p. 1288) does not take the act of larceny of gas out of the operation of the general law, peared that the prisoner, having taken the first article, returned in about two minutes and took the second, and then returned in half an hour and took the third. It was held that the taking of the first and second articles was one continuing transaction, but that half an hour was too long a period to admit of that construction, and the taking of the third article was, therefore, a distinct offense.

Queen v. Firth and Reg. v. Bleasdale, cases in point, are sufficiently set out in WOODS V. PEOPLE.

It is obvious that the question here discussed may also be raised by plea of former acquittal or conviction when defendant is arraigned under another indictment for the larceny of goods other than those named in the first indictment and not taken at the precise time.

In Hudson v. State, 9 Tex. App. 151, 35 Am. Rep. 732, the question was thus raised, and it was held that, when various articles are stolen at the same time and place, the transaction is not divisible, but is one transaction; and that a prosecution for the theft of a portion of the articles so taken would bar a prosecution for the theft of another portion of the same articles whether the property belonged to or was in the possession of the same person or different persons. But the court said: "If a thief should enter the room of one lodger at a hotel, and should there perpetrate a theft, and should then pass to the room of another lodger and there commit another theft, these would be different thefts, and each might be prosecuted separately, and a conviction or an acquittal for the one would be no bar to the prosecution for the other."

In Weaver v. Com. supra, it was held that whether the offense was one, or whether it was a series of offenses, must be determined by the nature of the transaction; and this question should be submitted to the jury.

and does not preclude a prosecution and conviction for stealing gas.

The uniform selling price of gas in supply of a general demand is the market value; and in fixing the value the material question is its selling price to the consumers in the district where it is supplied.

Hand, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The first contention made by plaintiff in error is that the offense made out against him by the evidence falls within the special statutory crime created by § 117 of the Criminal Code (1 Starr & C. Anno. Stat. 2d ed. ¶ 234, chap. 38, p. 1288), and not under § 167 of the Criminal Code (Starr & C. Anno. Stat. 2d ed. ¶ 305, chap. 38, p. 1316), which defines the crime of larceny; and that he should have been prosecuted for a violation of said § 117, and not for the crime of larceny. We do not agree with such contention. The law is well settled that gas used for illuminating and heating purposes may be the subject of larceny. Com. v. Shaw, 4 Allen, 308, 81 Am. Dec. 706; State v. Wellman, 34 Minn. 221, 25 N. W. 395; Reg. v. White, 6 Cox, C. C. 213. In the Shaw Case it was said (page 309, 4 Allen, page 706, 81 Am. Dec.): "There is nothing in the nature of gas used for illuminating purposes which renders it incapable of being feloniously taken and carried away. It is a valuable article of merchandise, bought and sold like other personal property, susceptible of being severed from a mass or larger quantity and of being transported from place to place. In the present case it appears that it was the property of the Boston Gas Light Company; that it was in their possession by being confined in conduits and tubes which belonged to them, and that the defendant severed a portion of that which was in a pipe of the company by taking it into her house and there consuming it. All this, being proved to have been done by her secretly and with an intent to deprive the company of their property and to appropriate it to her own use, clearly constituted the crime of larceny."

Section 117 of the statute above referred to does not undertake to punish a person who unlawfully abstracts gas from the pipes of a gas company; but that section of the statute was passed with a view to protect gas, water, or electric meters from being tampered with or false connections being made with gas or water pipes or electrical conductors, so that gas, water, or electricity might be consumed or utilized without passing through or being registered by a meter. The crime of larceny and the crime created by that section of the statute are therefore entirely separate and distinct offenses, and the doctrine announced in Stoker v. People, 114 Ill. 320, 2 N. E. 55, and kindred cases relied upon by plaintiff in error has no application to the case at bar. The plaintiff in error might have been guilty of a violation of said § 117 without obtaining any gas from said light and coke company. The two offenses are not the same, and the evidence which would support a conviction for a violation of said § 117 of the statute would not necessarily even tend to show the plaintiff in error guilty of larceny. The trial court did not, therefore, err in holding that the plaintiff in error was not entitled to his discharge on the ground that he was being prosecuted for the wrong offense.

It is next contended that, conceding the plaintiff in error was guilty of larceny, the evidence does not show him to be guilty of grand larceny, as it is said there is no evidence in the record that the value of the gas converted by him to his own use at any one time exceeded in value the sum of $15. The correctness of this contention depends upon whether the evidence shows the plaintiff in error to have been guilty of a continuing offense. If the gas abstracted on each day is a single and complete offense, then the contention of the plaintiff in error would be correct, as the evidence failed to show that more than $15 worth of gas was consumed at 3947 Michigan avenue during any one day while the plaintiff in error was in possession of said premises. On the contrary, however, if it be the law that all the gas which was consumed by the plaintiff in error during any one period while the service pipes of said light and coke company were connected with the burners in said building by said rubber hose or the concealed pipes should be treated as one continuous taking, then clearly the evidence shows the plaintiff in error to have been guilty of grand larceny. In 2 Bishop on Criminal Law, 7th ed. p. 799, it is said: "Illuminating gas may be the subject of larceny; and the asportation is sufficient where the prisoner, receiving gas of a gas company, diverts some of it to his burners without its passing the meter to be measured, the means employed being to use a pipe running directly from the entrance to the exit pipe. While the pipe remains thus connected there is held to be one continuous taking."

The above statement of the law is based mainly upon Queen v. Firth, L. R. 1 C. C. 172, which was an indictment for larceny for abstracting gas from a gas main by means of a pipe which drew off the gas from the main without allowing it to pass through the meter. The prisoner had for several years supplied a portion of his manufactory with gas which was thus abstracted, and it appeared the gas obtained was burned during the day at a large number of burners and was turned off at night. It was ruled there was but one taking, and therefore but one offense. In support of that conclusion the learned judge who delivered the opinion referred to Reg. v. Bleasdale, 2 Car. & K. 765, as a clear authority on the point, in which case the prisoner was indicted for stealing coal from the mines of a number of different landowners. The taking of the coal had continued for a number of years, and all the coal was taken through one shaft, and it was objected that there were a number of different takings and that the charge should be restricted to one special act. Erle, J., held that the taking was one continuous act. Also Queen v. Shepherd, L. R. 1 C. C. 118, was referred to, where the question was whether damage done by the prisoner to a number of trees should be considered as one single act. The question was left to the jury, who found the act was continuous. The prisoner was convicted and the conviction was affirmed. The writer of the opinion further illustrated his view that the taking was a continuous one, by the following illustrations: He said: "Take the case of a granary at a railway station, and a man bringing two wagons close to the granary and taking sacks from time to time, and extending this taking over four or five days. Here there would be different takings at different times, but it would be impossible to treat the taking otherwise than as one continuous act. Another case might be suggested of a man at work in a house, stealing, on different days, out of different rooms, and taking one article out of one room and another out of another at intervals of a quarter of an hour or an hour, or longer, all during the same job of work. I should rather suppose that this would be one continuous act and might be included in one indictment."

The trial court in this case instructed the jury "that, if they believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendants, or either of them, are guilty of stealing gas as charged, and that they, or either of them, had been stealing gas for any number of days continuously prior to the 14th day of December, 1904, in fixing the value of the property stolen you may add together the various values of the amounts of gas stolen from day to day during the time preceding the discovery of the false connections, if any, on the 14th day of December, that such takings from day to day were continued. That is, you may judge, from all the surrounding facts and circumstances as shown by the evidence, how long the said gas, if any, had been unlawfully taken through said false connections prior to the 14th day of December continuously, and you may add together the total sum of the various amounts taken on the different days continuously before the said 14th day of December."

This instruction left the question of whether the taking was continuous, and from day to day, to the jury, and authorized them, in fixing the value of the stolen property, in case they found the taking was continuous and from day to day, to add together the various amounts taken on the different days continuously before the 14th day of December, under which instruction the jury found the plaintiff in error had continuously taken gas to an amount in value in excess of $15. We are of the opinion the findings of the jury were amply supported by the evidence, and that they were not misdirected as to the law by the court.

It is finally contended that the court erred in directing the jury that in fixing the value of the gas stolen, if any, they should be guided by the selling price of the gas in question to consumers in the district in which the gas was abstracted, and not by the cost value of the material from which the gas was made. We are of the opinion the court did not err in so instructing the jury. The ordinary test of the value of the property is the price it will command in the market if offered for sale, which in this case was the selling price of gas to consumers in the vicinity where the plaintiff in error wrongfully converted the gas of the light and coke company to his own use.

Finding no reversible error in this record, the judgment of the Criminal Court of Cook County will be affirmed.

CLARENCE F. FRENCH
v.

RICHARD A. JONES.

Street railway—sale—right of purchaser.

1. That a statute providing for receiver's sale of the property of a street railroad company contains provisions contemplating the continued operation of the road by the purchaser does not prevent a purchaser from becoming the absolute owner of the property, and therefore entitled to remove the tracks from the street.

Same—duty to continue operation.

2. No duty to continue the operation of a street railroad purchased at receiver's sale is imposed by a statute providing that the purchaser shall take the property subject to the same duties and liabilities of the original company, where it also provides that, upon failure for sixty days to organize a company to operate the road, the right of the company to do so shall cease.

Mandamus—street commissioner—petition to tear up street.

3. A street commissioner who has refused to permit the tearing up of a street for the purpose of removing the rails of a street-railway system therefrom, actuated merely by the hope that someone will operate the road, without considering the only questions within his power, as to the interference of the tearing up of the street with public travel and its effect upon the pavement, may be compelled by mandamus to hear and determine such questions.

Case Note.—Character and extent of relief by mandamus against an officer vested with discretion who has rendered a decision upon a ground not within his discretion:

—The mere circumstances that an officer vested with discretion has rendered a decision adverse to the relator upon a ground, or for a reason, not within the domain of his discretion, furnishes no exception to the general rule that mandamus will not lie to interfere or control the discretion of a public officer. It does not necessarily follow, however, that a writ may not issue in such a case commanding a decision in favor of the relator. When, as in FRENCH v. JONES, the original decision, though formally based upon a ground beyond the officer's discretion, does not show that the discretion vested in him was in fact exercised in favor of the relator and that but for the officer's misapprehension his decision would have been in the relator's favor, the writ is undoubtedly to be confined, as it was in that case, to a command to act with an added direction not to permit the ground upon which the original decision was rendered to influence the new decision. In most of the cases of this kind the writ does not even include an express direction to this effect, though it is, of course, clearly implied.

Thus, in Mobile Mut. Ins. Co. v. Cleveland, 76 Ala. 321, the writ was allowed to require a circuit-court clerk to consider and pass upon the sufficiency of an attachment bond, but was denied to command him to approve the bond, though it appeared that he admitted the sufficiency of the bond in all other respects, but declined to approve it solely because it was not signed by a solvent resident of the county, residence within the county not being by law required of sureties on such bonds. The court said that, if the clerk refused to consider the sufficiency of a bond tendered for his approval, either for no reason, or for an assigned insufficient reason, mandamus would lie, "not to compel him to approve the bonds; that is a matter of his own enlightened judgment. It will lie to compel him to consider and pronounce on the sufficiency of the bond. This involves an inquiry into its form . . . and whether the sureties tendered are sufficient. This is a duty cast on him which he alone can perform, and suitors who may be required to give such bonds have the clear legal right to demand its exercise."

So, in People ex rel. Slater v. Smith, 83 Hun, 432, 31 N. Y. Supp. 749, mandamus was allowed to compel a town board to assemble and audit the account of the commissioner of highways, which it had refused to audit upon the ground that no authority had been given that officer to incur such account, a conclusion which the court held to be erroneous. In this case the trial court had directed that the writ should command the board to "audit and allow the claim of the relator," but the appellate division modified this order by striking out the words "and allow," and by inserting in the place thereof "on the merits." Such an order, of course, necessarily implied that the board should disregard the erroneous ground of their first decision, and was also equivalent to commanding them to exercise a discretion, and refusing to permit them to allow the claim.

Again, in People ex rel. McKown v. Green, 50 How. Pr. 500, the court granted a peremptory writ to compel a city comptroller to pass upon the sufficiency of a bond with sureties, given by a contractor for the performance of a contract to do certain public work for the city, where that officer had refused to approve the same, not because it was not in proper form, or the sureties were insufficient, but on the ground that there was a deficiency in the assessed value of the property along the line of the proposed work; but refused "to compel him to determine the question of sufficiency in a particular way; otherwise the judgment of the court would be substituted for that of the comptroller."

But the Wisconsin court has declined to Street—permit to tear up—refusal.

4. A street commissioner cannot refuse to permit the tearing up of a street to remove rails therefrom merely because he hopes that someone may be found to continue the operation of the railway.

Same—mandamus to compel issuance of permit.

5. One who has purchased the rails of a street railway imbedded in the street, knowing that, under the municipal ordinance, he cannot remove them without authority from the street superintendent, cannot compel the issuance of such permit by mandamus, since the officer has a discretionary power to issue it or not according to its effect upon the interests of the public in the street.

interfere, even to this extent, where relief has been sought by mandamus against a public officer clothed with discretion. In State ex rel. Comstock v. Joint School Dist. No. 1, 65 Wis. 631, 56 Am. Rep. 653, 27 N. W. 829, the writ was refused to require the board of a school district to admit the child of a nonresident to its public school, where the board refused to do so unless the relator should first pay a tuition fee, which he declined to do. The court said: "Because it is so absolutely in the discretion of the respondent school district to refuse the admission of appellant's son to the privileges of its school, the writ of mandamus cannot properly go to compel it to admit him; and it is quite immaterial if the district has refused to admit him on untenable grounds. The absolute power to deny him admission, without assigning any reason therefor, still remains to the district. Were this court to adjudge that the district cannot lawfully exact tuition fees as a condition of admitting appellant's son to its school, still it could not properly send the writ of mandamus to the district, ordering it to do so, for the writ might be defeated by an unconditional refusal of the district to admit him; or it might admit him, and immediately thereafter expel him. If the district has no power to charge tuition fees to nonresident scholars, the only mandate the court could consistently send would be that, if the district should, in the exercise of its discretion, admit the scholar, it should do so without requiring him to pay tuition fees. It is scarcely necessary to say that the writ of mandamus performs no such office, and cannot properly be issued in any such case. The books abound with cases which assert and enforce the rule that mandamus will not lie to control the exercise of discretion or official judgment."

Only one case can be found in which a writ was granted to compel an officer clothed with discretion to render a decision in the relator's favor, upon the ground that the former had decided against the latter 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

RESERVATION by the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County for the opinion of the full bench of a petition for a writ of mandamus to compel the superintendent of the streets of Waltham to issue a permit to petitioner to tear up the surface of a street to remove rails therefrom. Granted.

The fact are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Powers & Hall, for petitioner:

Rails laid in the streets are personal property, which, under proper circumstances, the owner may remove.

for a reason beyond the domain of his discretion, in which it did not appear that the officer had exercised his discretion and would have rendered a decision in the relator's favor but for his consideration of the matter beyond the scope of his discretion. In State ex rel. Dalrymple v. Stockwell, 7 Kan. 103, a district-court clerk was compelled to approve the bond filed by an elector of the county for the purpose of contesting the election relocating the county seat, it appearing that the clerk had refused to approve the bond because "not made out in compliance with the statutes relating to appeal in contest cases," although it did not appear that the sufficiency of the sureties was admitted by the clerk, and the court itself was compelled to take testimony upon that question before satisfying itself of their sufficiency. This cannot be characterized by any other name than a usurpation of the power lodged with the clerk to pass upon the sufficiency of such bonds. It is true that the clerk rendered a decision against the relator upon a ground not within the scope of his discretion; but, nothing more appearing, non constat that if he had confined himself within the legitimate field of his decision, he would have decided in relator's favor.

As before stated, it does not necessarily follow that, where an officer clothed with discretion has made a decision based upon an erroneous ground, he will not be compelled to render a decision in favor of the relator. And those decisions which grant such relief against such officer might at first glance seem to be opposed to the principle recognized in FRENCH v. JONES, and to support the relator's contention in that case, that the officer should be required to render a decision in his favor because he had given an improper reason for his previous decision. But a closer analysis of these cases will make it clear that none of the courts deny the efficacy of the rule that the discretion of a public officer cannot be controlled by mandamus; though they evidently differ somewhat from some of the cases just reviewed in their conception of what constitutes a ministerial act. In these decisions the relief is granted, not because the circumstances furnish an exception to the general rule, but because the officer who refuses to act has, in fact, not only exercised and exhausted his discretion, but has decided all questions properly within its scope in favor of the relator, and bases his refusal entirely upon some matter which should not have been considered by him at all; and that therefore, in view of his decision upon those matters which he was right to take into account, there remains to him but a mere ministerial duty to do that which his own judgment has shown him to be his next duty. In short, these cases "only check the exercise of discretion when assumed in regard to matters not properly within it, or when mistake is made in law not germane to the discretion." State ex rel. Moody v. Barnes, 25 Fla. 298, 23 Am. St. Rep. 516, 5 So. 722.

Thus, in United States v. Schurz, 102 U. S. 378, 26 L. ed. 167, mandamus was awarded commanding the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent for land claimed by a pre-emptor, where it appeared that all the proceedings had been gone through, the right of the applicant affirmed, and the patent fully executed and recorded, but its delivery was refused because it had been discovered that the land conveyed by the patent belonged to a town site. The court reasoned that this was an insufficient ground for refusing to deliver the patent, and that the Secretary of the Interior was charged with a mere ministerial duty to deliver the patent.

And in Butterworth v. United States, 112 U. S. 50, 28 L. ed. 656, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 25, mandamus was granted to compel a commissioner of patents to issue a patent, where it appeared that the commissioner had decided in favor of the applicant's right, and had adjudged that the patent should issue, but refused the actual issuance thereof because an appeal was taken to the Secretary of the Interior, who reversed the commissioner's decision, which officer the court held had no jurisdiction in the matter. The court therefore directed the patent to issue in accordance with the commissioner's decision, and held the mere issue of the patent to be a ministerial matter only, since all deliberation had ceased, the right of the applicant had been adjudged, and there was nothing to be done but to deliver the patent. The court said: The commissioner of patents "had fully exercised his judgment and discretion when he decided that the relators were entitled to a patent. The duty to prepare it, to lay it before the Secretary for his signature, and to countersign it were all that remained, and they were all purely ministerial. These duties he had failed and refused to perform merely out of deference to the claim of the Secretary to reverse and set aside the decision on the merits in favor of the relators. This we have held not to be a valid excuse."

And in Gilchrist v. Collector, 5 Hughes, 1, Fed. Cas. No. 5,420, it was held that mandamus would lie to compel a collector of a port, to whose absolute discretion the granting of clearances to vessels was left by act of Congress, to grant a clearance, where he refused to do so solely because so instructed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and he himself admitted that, if he had had no other rule of conduct than the act itself, he would have cleared the vessel.

So, in Thomas v. Armstrong, 7 Cal. 286, a peremptory writ of mandamus was allowed against a board of supervisors to compel them to renew a ferry license, where it appeared that by statute everyone to whom a license to keep a ferry had been granted, and who had kept the same in accordance with law, was entitled to have his license renewed; that the plaintiff, who had been operating a ferry, applied to the supervisors for the renewal of his license, and made the necessary proof that he conducted the ferry according to law; and that the supervisors

The respondent's refusal was absolute, and was not based on the failure to observe the required conditions. Under those circumstances, the existence of such a condition will not prevent the granting of a writ of mandamus commanding the respondent to act on the fulfilment of the condition.

The discretion of a public officer is ordinarily not to be exercised arbitrarily or capriciously, but reasonably and in good faith; and when these limits are exceeded the courts may interfere.

Lafayette County Court*, 41 Mo. 226; Stockton & V. R. Co. v. Stockton, 51 Cal. 338; McCarthy v. Street Comrs. 188 Mass. 338, 74 N. E. 659; Com. v. Hampden County Justices, 2 Pick. 414.

Where the duty of the officer is to receive evidence and render a decision thereon, and he erroneously refuses to do so on some ground not within his discretion, the writ will direct him to consider the evidence and render some decision.

Dodge v. Essex County, 3 Met. 380; Nourse v. Merriam, supra; Osborn v. Lenox, 2 Allen, 207; People ex rel. Johnson v. Delaware County, 45 N. Y. 196; People ex rel.

refused his application upon the sole ground that his franchise had been sold on execution. To quote from the opinion: "If it were a case in which there was any doubt, and the supervisors had exercised their discretion, and had determined on testimony that the ferry had not been properly kept, there would be no authority to interfere with their determination; but when they act under a mistake of law their orders may be reached and the error corrected by mandamus."

And in Daniels v. Miller, 8 Colo. 542, 9 Pac. 18, the writ was issued to a clerk of court requiring him to approve an appeal bond, where he admitted that the bond was good and sufficient, but based his refusal to approve it upon a ruling of the trial court that the order appealed from was not appealable.

So, in Illinois State Dental Examiners v. People, 123 Ill. 227, 13 N. E. 201, mandamus issued to the Illinois state board of dental examiners commanding them to issue to the relator, without examination, a license to practise dentistry, though by law such examiners were required to issue licenses without examination only to regular graduates of reputable dental colleges; where it appeared that to an inquiry by the relator why no license was issued to him, the secretary of the examiners replied that the matter had been referred to the national association of dental examiners, and that no license could issue until such association had decided in regard thereto. The court said that, as the board had not refused to grant the license upon the ground that the relator's college was not reputable, but solely upon the ground that it should be referred to another organization upon whom no authority was conferred by law, it would be presumed that the members regarded that college as reputable. "They had no discretion as to any other matter than the character of the college issuing the diploma, as to its being reputable or not reputable. When that matter was decided and out of the way their judicial or discretionary power was exhausted. The duty to issue the li-

And in Indiana the rule is well established that mandamus will lie to compel the approval of a bond by an officer clothed with the duty of approving the bonds of other officers, where he refuses to approve a bond with sufficient sureties for the sole reason that the officer offering the bond was not elected to the office that he claims. The court here held that these officers were mere ministerial officers, and, in respect to the approval of bonds, had no discretion other than to determine whether the security offered was sufficient. Gulick v. New, 14 Ind. 93, 77 Am. Dec. 49; Copeland v. State, 126 Ind. 51, 25 N. E. 866. The same result was accomplished in State ex rel. Taylor v. Warrick County, 124 Ind. 554, 8 L.R.A. 607, 25 N. E. 10, where the refusal to approve a good and sufficient bond was based upon the ground that the officer tendering it had been elected by means of a corrupt agreement entered into by him and another officer.

To the same effect is Harwood v. Quinby, 44 Iowa, 385, in which mandamus issued to compel the trustees of a township to certify to the county treasurer that a railroad company had in all respects complied with the statute in relation to a certain tax voted by the township to aid in the construction of the railroad, where the reason given for the refusal to act was that certain documents, required by law to be filed with the county treasurer before the amount of the tax should be paid over, had been fraudulently obtained. The discretion of the trustees was limited to the duty of determining whether the road was completed, and whether the documents in question had been presented to the county treasurer. The court thought that the trustees were seeking to justify their action by reason of something they had no right to take into consideration, and arbitrarily refused to certify as by law required to do, which was "not judicial discretion or anything like it."

Sheldon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The first question presented in this case is whether the petitioner has become the absolute owner of the rails and tracks laid by the street railway company and now lying on and imbedded in the surface of one of the public streets. He purchased all the property of the company at a sale properly made by duly appointed receivers of the company, and the receivers made a proper transfer to him. It is provided by Rev. Laws, chap. 112, § 12, that "a receiver of the

Mo. 139, 33 S. W. 1137, a peremptory writ was awarded to compel a city comptroller to approve the relator's bond as superintendent of waterworks, where the respondent's refusal to approve the bond was based upon the contention that the relator had not been legally appointed to such office, and that the form of the bond had not been approved by the city counselor, such approval not being made a prerequisite by law. In this case there was no claim made by the respondent that the bond was insufficient either in amount, or in sureties, or that it was not in legal form. The court said: "The bond seems to be in proper form, and the sureties entirely responsible for the amount of its penalty; and, as no sufficient reason is shown by the return why respondent should not perform an act purely ministerial and which he alone is clothed with power to perform, the demurrer must be sustained and peremptory writ awarded."

And in State ex rel. Johnston v. Lutz, 136 Mo. 633, 38 S. W. 323, mandamus issued to compel the state board of health to issue to the relator a certificate to practise medicine and surgery, which had been refused him upon the ground that the medical college from which he had received his diploma had not complied with the resolution of such board requiring medical colleges to furnish the board with a list of its matriculates and the basis of their matriculation, where it appeared that the relator had graduated before the college had received notice of such resolution. The state board of health was, by law, required to issue certificates to anyone who could furnish satisfactory proof of having received a diploma from a medical school in good standing. The court conceded that, if the certificate had been refused upon the ground that the relator's college was not of good standing, mandamus would not lie to compel the board to issue it, as that was a question within the judgment and discretion of the board to determine.

So, in State ex rel. Stokes v. Camden County, 35 N. J. L. 217, mandamus was ordered to require the board of chosen freeholders to accept from the relator an official bond, where no objection was made to the sufficiency of the bond, to the amount of the penalty, the ability of the sureties, or any other such matter, but it was rejected solely on the ground that the relator had not been duly elected to the office which he claimed. Here the court deemed the rejection of the offered bond for this reason to be equivalent to an absolute refusal to accept any bond from the relator.

And this principle seems to have been also recognized in Re Prickett, 20 N. J. L. 134, where mandamus was refused to compel the township committee to accept the bond tendered to them by the relator as constable, upon the ground that the relator had failed to establish his election to the office by proper and sufficient proof, in view of the fact that the respondents denied the relator's election, and had refused to accept the bond for that reason. The court said that, even if there were no dispute about the relator's election, mandamus could not be granted "in the shape applied for. We never direct in what manner the discretion of an inferior tribunal shall be exercised; . . . though in a proper case we will require such tribunal to proceed to a decision; to the end that that decision may be reviewed in due course of law. Nor will I say that in a clear case of an election to office and where the constable offered the most unexceptional securities (as it is admitted was done by Prickett), but which the committee unreasonably and capriciously rejected, that this court would not issue an alternative mandamus and ultimately compel a reception of the bond."

And in People ex rel. Ziegler v. Collis, 17 App. Div. 448, 45 N. Y. Supp. 282, a peremptory writ was granted requiring the commissioner of public works to issue to the relator a permit to repair a vault under the sidewalk in front of his premises, where the permit had been refused because the applicant would not pay a fee therefor not required by law. To quote from the opinion: "The situation then was as follows: The commissioner of public works had de-property of a street railway company may, by order of the court, sell and transfer the road and property of such company, its locations and franchises, on such terms and in such manner as the court may order. The purchasers from such receiver, and a corporation organized under the provisions of the following section, if such road has been transferred to it, shall hold and possess said road, all its rights and franchises and all property acquired in connection therewith, with the same rights and privileges and subject to the same duties and liabilities as the original street railway company; but no action shall be brought against such purchaser or such new corporation to enforce any liability incurred by said original corporation, except debts and liabilities owing from said original corporation to any city or town within which the road is operated and taxes and assessments for which said original corporation is liable under the statutes relating to street railways, which shall be assumed and paid by said new corporation. The provisions of this section shall not impair the powers of the holders of an outstanding mortgage to enforce their rights by suit or otherwise."

Section 13 of the same chapter provides that the purchasers at such a sale shall within sixty days thereafter organize a corporation for the purpose of holding, owning, and operating the street railway purchased, and that, if they fail to organize such a corporation in the manner therein prescribed, all rights and powers to operate the road shall thereupon cease. The respondent contends that the petitioner, never having organized or intended to organize such a corporation, and never having intended in any way to operate the street railway or cause it to be operated, but having made his purchase for the purpose only of removing and selling the rails, was not such a purchaser as is contemplated by the statute, and did not acquire any right to the property. We think, however, that the title of the property sold by the receivers did pass to the petitioner. It may be granted that the sections of the statute to which we have referred contemplate the continued operation of a street railway which has been sold under the authority that they give. But no such requirement is made in terms; and the provision in § 13, that, upon failure to form a corporation to hold and operate the railway, the right and power to operate it shall cease, is far from being tantamount to a provision that the purchasers shall suffer the further penalty of being deprived of the terminated that the relator was entitled to the permit upon payment of a sum of money which the commissioner deemed right to exact. But it appears that he was without right to exact any sum. That legal question, being decided adversely to the commissioner's contention, entitled the relator to the permit upon the strength of the commissioner's decision. Whatever of discretion the commissioner had in the premises had been exercised. His decision to grant the permit had been made. He withheld it because he thought the law made it his duty to exact a fee. A mandamus proceeding, therefore, pointed the way for a speedy and effective determination of that legal question, and, because it happened to be determined adversely to the commissioner's view, it is now urged that by mandamus the court attempted to control the commissioner's discretion. Not so. The commissioner exercised such discretion as he had, and said so, and, the court having decided that the exaction of . . . [a fee] was without lawful authority, it necessarily followed that a peremptory writ should issue." But see the New York cases reviewed above.

In Com. ex rel. Century Co. v. Philadelphia, 176 Pa. 588, 35 Atl. 195, mandamus was allowed to compel the comptroller of the respondent city to sign warrants for the payment of a certain sum for dictionaries contracted for by the board of education, where the comptroller based his refusal upon matters without his discretion, viz., that no contract had been entered into between the city and the relator as required by law; that the binding of the dictionaries was unsuitable for a book destined for public-school use; and that the relator was paying a very large commission to the agent who had secured the contract for it. The court said that the comptroller's "grounds of objection, set out at length in his answer, show that none of them was founded on matters within his discretion. Had any of them been valid, the court would not review his decision in regard to the facts, but, when, admitting all the facts, none of the reasons is sufficient, the courts, and not the official, must determine the rights of the parties. This is the rule even in cases of discretion vested in strictly judicial tribunals (Johnson's License, 156 Pa. 322, 26 Atl. 1066; Gross's License, 161 Pa. 344; Gemas's License, 169 Pa. 43, 32 Atl. 88), and a fortiori must it be the rule where the discretion, though ample and exclusive, is reposed in a tribunal or an official who is only quasi judicial within prescribed limits."

To the same effect is People ex rel. Workman v. Board of Education, 18 Mich. 400, where a writ of mandamus was allowed to compel the respondent board to admit the relator's child into a public school under their control, from which the child had been excluded because of his negro blood. The court admitted that the board was "vested with large powers to make rules and regulations respecting the schools and the attendance of pupils therein," and it was contended for the respondent that the exclusion property which they have bought and paid for. The receivers have full power to make the sale; it is their duty to do so when ordered by the court which has appointed them; they have no right or duty to inquire into and no means of ascertaining the motives or intentions of bidders or purchasers. We are of opinion, accordingly, that the petitioner is the absolute owner of the property in question.

But his right to remove the rails and other materials which are imbedded in the surface of the public street, and for that purpose to break and dig up the street, depends upon other considerations. It has been decided by this court that these rails and materials remain personal property. Lorain Steel Co. v. Norfolk & B. Street R. Co. 187 Mass. 500, 73 N. E. 646. But they were laid by a street railway company in pursuance of a location granted to it and accepted by it and with the obligation to operate its road and thus to perform certain public duties; and they cannot be removed without digging up the surface of the street and making the public highway, at any rate partially and temporarily, impassable. The petitioner does not contend that he has any right to remove the rails if he or the voluntary association which he represents is under any duty to operate this line as a street railway; and accordingly it becomes necessary to determine whether he is now under such a duty.

A street railway company, like a railroad corporation, has no power to alienate its franchise without permission of the legislature. Richardson v. Sibley, 11 Allen, 65, 87 Am. Dec. 700. Our earliest statute upon this subject provided that "no street railway corporation shall sell or lease its road or property unless authorized so to do by its charter or by special act of the legislature." Stat. 1864, chap. 229, § 24, p. 161. And "any alienation either in fee or for the period of its corporate existence or for any less term, of substantially all its real and personal property, so as to disable it from carrying on the business which it had been chartered to do for the benefit of the public, is clearly within the terms and meaning of this prohibition." Gray, J., in Richardson v. Sibley, ubi supra. And subject to certain limitations not material to the decision of this case, the same prohibition has since remained in force (Pub. Stat. chap. 113, § 56; Stat. 1897, chap. 269, p. 241, Rev. Laws, chap. 112, §§ 85 et seq.), except that in 1900 power was given to the receiver of a street railway company to make such a sale of its

of the child was in exercise of this discretion. This argument was not specifically noticed by the court, and the only reference to it is found in the following language: "The application for the writ did not show affirmatively that the child possessed the necessary qualifications for admission to the school. It shows, however, that the father applied for his admission and offered to submit him to all the rules, examinations, and regulations of the board with regard thereto, and was refused because of the child's color. The board having made this the sole objection, the relator, if this fails, is presumptively entitled to the writ."

From this review of the authorities, it may be laid down as a general rule that, if the officer against whom the relief is sought is clothed with discretion in regard to the act which he has refused to perform, and of which performance is sought to be compelled, and he has failed to exercise that discretion for a reason which the court holds to be invalid because beyond the domain of the officer's discretion, a writ of mandamus will be granted to compel him to exercise his discretion in a proper and legal manner, sometimes with an express direction to disregard the improper basis of his previous decision,—a direction necessarily implied in those cases where it is not expressly included in the writ granted; but a writ will be refused to command him to do the particular act in the performance of which he is called upon to exercise such discretion,—that is, he will not be required to make a decision in the relator's favor; but if he has exercised and has exhausted his discretion, and has thereby decided all the questions which come properly and legally within his discretion in the relator's favor, and has refused to perform the act for a reason neither legally nor properly within the scope of his discretion, the writ will lie to compel him to do the specific act which his own judgment has shown him he should do, upon the ground that the act remaining to be performed by him is a mere ministerial duty.

It is apparent that this note is confined to those cases where it is sought to have a writ of mandamus issued against an officer clothed with discretion, commanding him to make a decision in the relator's favor, upon the ground that his decision against the relator was based upon a reason beyond the domain of his discretion. A different question is, of course, presented where the officer against whom the relief is sought offers no reason for his nonperformance other than that, in regard to the matter in controversy, he is clothed with discretionary power, with which, for that reason, it is claimed that the court cannot interfere. Nor are those cases included where relief by mandamus is sought from an abuse of discretion, as distinguished from a case in which the officer's decision rested upon a ground entirely outside the domain of his discretion.

road, property, locations, and franchises as is here in question. Stat. 1900, chap. 381, p. 322, Rev. Laws, chap. 112, §§ 12-14. The petitioner's rights accordingly depend upon the provisions of these sections.

The respondent contends that as it is expressly provided by § 12 that the purchasers at such a sale "shall hold and possess such road, all its rights and franchises, and all property acquired in connection therewith, with the same rights and privileges and subject to the same duties and liabilities as the original street railway company;" and by § 13 that they shall within a limited time organize a corporation for the purpose of holding, owning, and operating the street railway,—they are under the same obligation to operate the railway and to carry passengers as rested upon the original company; and that this obligation can be terminated only by an order of the board of aldermen or selectmen ordering the street to be cleared of the tracks under Rev. Laws, chap. 112, § 36, or revoking the location under Rev. Laws, chap. 112, § 32. Springfield v. Springfield Street R. Co. 182 Mass. 41, 48, 64 N. E. 577. But under the last clause of § 13, ubi supra, the petitioner has now no right or power to operate a street railway over these tracks; and we cannot construe the statute as continuing the existence of this duty after its performance has been forbidden by the very terms of the statute. The language of these sections is indeed mandatory; but, looking at the object to be attained, the realization of all the property of an insolvent corporation for the payment of its debts, considering the fact that the penalty imposed for the failure of the purchasers to organize a corporation and operate the railway is merely the loss of the right and power to carry on such operation, and the practical impossibility of continuing to operate a railway whose gross receipts are insufficient to meet its operating expenses, we are of opinion that the petitioner is not now under any duty to use these tracks for the operation of a street railway.

We have, then, the case of an owner of personal property which is so imbedded in the surface of a public way that it cannot be removed without breaking and digging up the surface. This way is situated in Waltham; and the ordinances of that city provide that "no person, unless authorized by law, shall break or dig up any part of any street, or erect thereon any staging for building, place thereon any lumber, brick, or other building materials, without a written license from the superintendent of streets. Any person intending to erect or repair any building upon land abutting upon a street shall give notice to the superintendent of streets, who may, at the owner's request, set apart such portion of the street as he may deem expedient for such use. Such person shall, when required by the superintendent of streets, construct and maintain a suitable sidewalk around the obstruction, and shall, before the expiration of his license, remove all rubbish and restore such street to its former condition, to the satisfaction of the superintendent of streets. Every person so licensed shall, in writing, agree to indemnify the city against all damage or loss to the city accruing from the doing of any act or thing under such license, and sureties may be required in the discretion of the superintendent of streets, any every person who, when so licensed, shall obstruct or render unsafe any public street or sidewalk, shall guard the same by a proper fence or railing and by lights during the nighttime, subject to the approval of the superintendent of streets. Such license may be revoked at any time by the superintendent of streets." Without a license granted by the superintendent of streets under this section, the petitioner cannot break or dig up any part of the way, and so cannot remove these rails. They have a value for a resale of more than $6,000; but they are valueless to the petitioner unless they can be removed. The operation of a street railway line over these tracks never has produced, and there is no reason to believe that it ever could produce, sufficient income to pay the bare expenses of operation. The petitioner has made proper application to the respondent, who is superintendent of streets of the city of Waltham, for a license to take up these rails, and the respondent has refused and refuses to grant it. It has been found at the hearing before a single justice of this court that the respondent's refusal to issue the license did not result from the exercise of his judgment or discretion as to the proper care of the streets, or from the adverse determination of any question connected with such care or with the protection of the public travel, but from a desire to keep the rails in the streets in the hope that some person or corporation would operate street cars over them; and that the rails could have been removed and could now be removed without any permanent injury to the street or unreasonable disturbance of public travel. The petitioner asks this court to issue a mandamus commanding the respondent to grant such a license to the petitioner.

The office of superintendent of streets in Waltham is created by the charter of that city (Stat. 1893, chap. 361, § 36, p. 1002), which provides that he "shall have the powers of a road surveyor and all the powers of road commissioners not herein otherwise conferred." He is charged with the duty of seeing that the streets are kept safe and convenient for travel; and he is to exercise his best judgment and discretion for the performance of this duty. He is vested with the power of determining in any particular case whether or not a license shall be issued to authorize the digging up of any part of a street or the erection thereon of any staging for building, the placing thereon of any building materials, or the temporary use of any portion of the street for the erection or repair of buildings abutting thereon. Many occasions may arise when either public or private interests, or both, would be seriously affected by his issuing, or refusing to issue, such a license; and it is for him to consider in each case the nature and magnitude of the interests involved, the extent and probable duration of any interference with public travel, and the effect which may be produced upon the structure or paving of the way, and to determine whether or not, in view of all the circumstances, and in the proper exercise of his discretion as a public officer charged with the care of the streets, the license asked for ought to be granted. This he has not done in the case at bar, but has refused to issue the license prayed for merely from a hope and desire which ought not to have influenced his decision. He has not heard and determined the petitioner's application in the manner in which he ought to have heard and determined it; and we have no doubt that a mandamus may properly issue to compel him to do so. Osborn v. Lenox, 2 Allen, 207; Dodge v. Essex County, 3 Met. 380; Nourse v. Merriam, 8 Cush. 11. It was his duty to hear and consider this application without regard to other considerations than those which we have stated, and not to base his action upon any such desire as has guided him. People ex rel. Johnson v. Delaware County, 45 N. Y. 196; State ex rel. National Subway Co. v. St. Louis, 145 Mo. 551, 42 L.R.A. 113, 46 S. W. 981. He has a right to refuse to grant the license asked for if, in the proper exercise of his judgment and official discretion, he decides that it ought not to be granted; but he has not the right to refuse it merely for a reason which lies outside the scope of his duty. Similar questions have often arisen in other jurisdictions; and, so far as we are aware, this doctrine always has been maintained. Missouri ex rel. Laclede Gaslight Co. v. Murphy, 170 U. S. 78, 42 L. ed. 955, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 505; Re Refusal of License, 72 N. Y. S. R. 822, 38 N. Y. Supp. 425; People ex rel. First Nat. Bank v. Herkimer Coun- ty, 56 Barb. 452; People ex rel. Osterhout v. Perry, 13 Barb. 206; State ex rel. Eastman v. Warren County, 17 Ohio St. 558; Zanone v. Mound City, 103 Ill. 552; Gulick v. New, 14 Ind. 93, 77 Am. Dec. 49; Harwood v. Quinby, 44 Iowa, 385; Mobile Mut. Ins. Co. v. Cleveland, 76 Ala. 321; State ex rel. Johnston v. Lutz, 136 Mo. 633, 38 S. W. 323; State ex rel. Cameron v. Shannon, 133 Mo. 139, 33 S. W. 1137; State ex rel. Moody v. Barnes, 25 Fla. 298, 23 Am. St. Rep. 516, 5 So. 722; Stockton & V. R. Co. v. Stockton, 51 Cal. 328; Thomas v. Armstrong, 7 Cal. 286; Reg. v. Fawcett, 11 Cox, C. C. 305; King v. Cumberland Justices, 4 Ad. & El. 695.

But the petitioner contends that he is entitled to a mandamus commanding the respondent to issue the license prayed for. He contends that in acting upon such an application the superintendent of streets performs a purely ministerial duty, that his discretion goes no further than to see that proper indemnity is given to the city against any damage or loss, and that proper precautions are taken against accident, and to determine whether sureties shall be required from the licensee. But we have been referred to no authority in the statutes or ordinances for such a contention; and we are not aware that support can be found for it in any judicial decision. It has, indeed, been held that one who has an absolute and paramount right to do an act which necessarily involves the digging up of public streets may by mandamus compel the officers who are charged with the care of the streets to allow him to exercise that absolute right in a proper manner and with suitable safeguards. Com. ex rel. Bell Teleph. Co. v. Warwick, 185 Pa. 623, 40 Atl. 93; State ex rel. National Subway Co. v. St. Louis, supra; State ex rel. Baltimore, C. & P. B. R. Co. v. Latrobe, 81 Md. 222, 31 Atl. 788. In the case at bar, however, no such absolute right can be found to exist. The petitioner bought the property with full notice of its character and position, and knowing that his power to remove it depended upon his ability to obtain a license from the superintendent of streets. It well may be that this officer cannot refuse a license upon wholly immaterial reasons or for mere wantonness or caprice; and that is all that was decided in People ex rel. O'Brien v. Keating, 55 App. Div. 555, 67 N. Y. Supp. 413; People ex rel. Ziegler v. Collis, 17 App. Div. 448, 45 N. Y. Supp. 282, and Missouri ex rel. Laclede Gaslight Co. v. Murphy, ubi supra. And it may be that he would not have the right to shut his eyes to proved facts, and rest a decision upon an alleged failure to find such facts, as was held in Stockton & V. R. Co. v. Stockton, ubi supra, though there might be a practical difficulty in reviewing his action in such a case. But none of these decisions support the petitioner's present contention.

We are of opinion that the correct rule to be followed in such a case as this was declared in Keough v. Holyoke, 156 Mass. 403, 31 N. E. 387. It appeared in that case that the petitioner had been duly elected collector of taxes for the city of Holyoke, but the board of aldermen denied his right to the office, claimed that another person had been elected, and upon that ground refused to accept the petitioner's official bond; and it was held that he was entitled to a writ of mandamus, declaring that he had been duly elected, and commanding the board of aldermen to consider the bond presented by him, and to accept or reject it as it might or might not be found to be satisfactory to them and in the form required by law; but that, although the board had put their refusal to accept his bond directly upon the ground that he had not been duly elected, yet they could not be required to accept his bond, for the reason that the bond must be in such sum as they should require and with sureties to their satisfaction. It is true that in that case the record of the board of aldermen had subsequently been amended by adding the statement that their refusal to accept the bond was for other reasons also; but the court, in its opinion (page 408 of 156 Mass., page 387 of 31 N. E.), declined to pass upon the validity of this amendment, and rested its decision upon the general ground which has been stated. The same doctrine is affirmed in the well-reasoned opinion of the court in State ex rel. Baltimore, C. & P. B. R. Co. v. Latrobe, 81 Md. 222, 31 Atl. 788, relied on by the petitioner, in which it is expressly declared that whenever the performance of a duty is dependent upon the exercise of judgment and discretion on the part of the person to whom its performance is assigned, that judgment and discretion will not be interfered with or controlled by the writ of mandamus, and this for the reason that there is no warrant of law justifying the substitution of the judgment of the court for the judgment and discretion of the individual exclusively intrusted with the performance of that particular duty. To the same effect are Lunt v. Davison, 104 Mass. 498; Rice, B. & F. Mach. & Iron Co. v. Worcester, 130 Mass. 575; Deehan v. Johnson, 141 Mass. 23, 6 N. E. 240; Provident Sav. Life Assur. Soc. v. Cutting, 181 Mass. 261, 92 Am. St. Rep. 415, 63 N. E. 433; Rice v. Highway Comrs. 13 Pick. 225; Re Ipswich, 24 Pick. 343; Re 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Prickett, 20 N. J. L. 134; High, Extr. Legal Rem. §§ 80, 88, 91, 92, 97.

It is not necessary to consider in detail the different requests for rulings which were made by the petitioner. They are all disposed of by what has been said. In our opinion the petitioner is entitled to have a writ of mandamus issue, commanding the respondent, as he is superintendent of streets of the city of Waltham, to hear and determine the petitioner's application without regard to any hope or desire that some person or corporation will operate street cars over the tracks in question, but exercising in the manner hereinbefore stated his sound discretion as an officer charged with the care of the streets, in view of the fact that the petitioner is the owner of the property in question and is not under any duty to use it for the operation of street cars.

ED. TANNER, Respt.,

v.

J. R. BOWEN, Appt.

(— Mont. —, 85 Pac. 876.)

Assignment—satisfied claim—effect.

Payment by a livery-stable keeper, to whom a horse has been loaned for use, of a claim by the owner against himself and his bailee for the value of the horse, which was killed by the negligence of the latter, will preclude further proceedings against the bailee upon the owner's claim, although the stable keeper takes an assignment of it for the purpose of enforcing the primary liability of the bailee.

Case Note.—Effect of assignment of a claim ex delicto to one against whom it was asserted, to enable him to maintain an action thereon against a third party: —

It is apparent from the opinion in the foregoing case that the decision was based upon the ground that the plaintiff was attempting to recover by virtue of the assignment of the claim that originated in favor of the owner of the horse, and that that claim had been satisfied, and therefore could not be asserted as the basis of an action. This position is opposed to the decision in Rindge v. Coleraine, 11 Gray, 157, where a suit to recover for injuries to a horse, caused by a defective highway, was brought against a town by the bailee of the horse in the name of the owner, whom the bailee had paid in full with the agreement that a suit might be brought against the town in the name of the owner, but at the risk and for the ben-

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Teton County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of a horse. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. S. Bishop for appellant.

Holloway, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts disclosed by the record are that John H. Devlin was the owner of a certain horse, and let it to the plaintiff, Tanner, who was a livery-stable keeper at Conrad, Teton county, for use in his livery business. The defendant, Bowen, hired a team and buggy from Tanner on December 1, 1904, to drive to Chouteau, and the Devlin horse and another were furnished to him by Tanner. Bowen made the trip with the team to Chouteau, and on the following morning it was ascertained that the Devlin horse had died. Devlin asserted a claim for the value of the horse against both Tanner and Bowen, and demanded a settlement for the same from each. Upon the trial it was made to appear that Tanner admitted Devlin's claim, acknowledged his own liability, paid to Devlin the value of the horse in satisfaction of Devlin's claim, took an assignment of Devlin's cause of action as against Bowen, and as such assignee brought this action to recover from Bowen the value of the horse, alleging in his complaint that the death of the horse was caused by negligence on the part of Bowen. The answer denies any negligence of the bailee. It was there held that such an arrangement did not bar the action. The court said: "As to this proceeding, it is objected that it operates as a payment and discharge of the defendants. But we think that it is not to be so held. Such was not the design of the parties; but, on the contrary, Baldwin [the bailee] was to have the right to prosecute a suit in the name of Rindge [the owner] to recover these damages for his own use, which is inconsistent with the idea of discharging the defendants. The only ground for giving such effect to the arrangement between Baldwin and Rindge is that it must necessarily result therefrom. The court does not adopt that view of the case."

Another case, apparently in direct conflict with TANNER v. BOWEN, is Buchholz v. Damick, 101 N. Y. Supp. 17, where the driver of an express wagon, having failed to secure a receipt from the defendant, to whom certain goods were delivered, was compelled by the express company to make good the amount which it had been obliged to pay to the consignor for the value of the goods, and took an assignment of their claim for the goods against the consignee. In an action on this assigned claim, the trial court found that the goods had been delivered, and gave the plaintiff judgment for the amount. On appeal it was contended by the defendant that, as a matter of law, the plaintiff could not recover on the assignment. The court, in holding that the action might be maintained, said: "If it be said that the assignment was made after Podworsky [the consignor] had been paid and had nothing to assign, we reply, even if that be conceded, that the plaintiff was then entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the express company and of Podworsky."

Several other cases, however, hold with TANNER v. BOWEN, that one against whom a claim ex delicto is asserted cannot, by paying the amount of the claim and taking an assignment thereof, acquire a right of action over against a third person upon the assigned claim. Thus, in Upham v. Dickinson, 38 Mich. 338, where one of the parties to a joint trespass paid the claim of the injured party and took an assignment of his right of action against the other trespassers, it was held that when one joint wrongdoer satisfied the claim of the party injured, he could not take an assignment of the right of action and recover upon that assignment from his cotrespassers. And where one of a board of directors of an insurance company paid a judgment taken against the board jointly for the misappropriation of funds, in Boyer v. Bolender, 129 Pa. 328, 15 Am. St. Rep. 723, 18 Atl. 127, it was held that he could not enforce contribution against his fellow directors; nor would an assignment of the judgment to his son be effective for that purpose, when it appeared that the son was a mere straw man, and the real actor was the father.

The principle upon which the decision in TANNER v. BOWEN rests, and the distinction which serves to limit the operation of that principle between an action based upon the claim originally accruing to the owner of the property and the attempted assignment thereof, and an action based upon a claim accruing directly to the plaintiff, are well illustrated by the opinion in Simpson v. Mercer, and Williams v. Mercer, reported together in 144 Mass. 413, 11 N. E. 720. It there appeared that a constable satisfied a judgment recovered against him for conversion under a writ, and took an assignment of such judgment, together with any right of action the judgment creditor might have, against the person who placed the writ in the constable's hands and whose agent, with the permission of the constable, seized the property in question. The constable thereafter, by virtue of the assignments, brought an action against such person in the name of the judgment creditor. It was held that such action would not lie, for the reason that the claim upon which it was based was extinguished by the satisfaction of the judgment. The constable, however, having brought another action in his own name to recover from such person the sum paid by on Bowen's part. A verdict was returned in favor of the plaintiff, a judgment entered thereon, and from the judgment and an order denying him a new trial, the defendant appealed.

The only error assigned in the brief of appellant is that the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury to return a verdict for the defendant as requested by him. In discussing his alleged error, counsel for appellant makes three distinct contentions, only one of which it will be necessary to consider. It is said that plaintiff, Tanner, having paid to Devlin the amount of Devlin's claim in satisfaction of the same, thereby discharged Bowen from liability. As to whether Tanner was in fact liable might be a question, but this liability was admitted. The payment by Tanner to Devlin and the attempted assignment of Devlin's cause of action operated as a complete satisfaction of Devlin's claim and a release of Tanner from any further liability. In Leddy v. Barney, 139 Mass. 394, 2 N. E. 107, it is said: "The validity and effect of a release of a cause of action do not depend upon the validity of a cause of action. If the claim is made against one and released, all who may be liable are discharged, whether the one released was liable or not." The principle underlying this decision is that if, when the release was given, Devlin was asserting against Tanner a liability for the same act for which Tanner now asserts the liability of Bowen, the two causes of action are the same and the release of one discharges the other. The decision above is referred to with approval, and the doctrine there announced is again asserted, in Miller v. Beck, 108 Iowa, 575, 79 N. W. 344, and numerous other cases are cited in support of the conclusion reached. 1 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 317.

him to satisfy the judgment against him, it was held that that action would lie, the parties not being in pari delicto.

Where the charter of a city provided that judgments for certain torts, taken against the city and a person or corporation jointly, should be enforced against the city only, when they could not be enforced against the other defendant, it was held, in Campbell v. Pope, 96 Mo. 474, 10 S. W. 187, that the fact that the city paid such a judgment and took an assignment thereof in order to keep it alive did not amount to a satisfaction so that it could not thereafter be enforced against the codefendant. This case is not necessarily opposed to the principle enunciated in TANNER v. BOWEN, as the court distinctly held that it was only the special provision of the charter that took the case out of the general rule.

Another case which may be noted, although not strictly in point, is Crook v. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

If Devlin, instead of merely presenting his demand against Tanner and Bowen separately, had sued each, as he might have done, and had recovered a judgment against each, and if Tanner had then paid the judgment against himself and had taken an assignment from Devlin of the judgment against Bowen, the situation would not have been different from that which is presented by this record; and under those circumstances it is quite clear that the judgment against Bowen could not have been enforced. A case directly in point is Gross v. Pennsylvania, P. & B. R. Co. 65 Hun, 191, 20 N. Y. Supp. 28. The plaintiff recovered separate judgments against the Pennsylvania, etc., Railroad Company, and the Central New England, etc., Railroad Company for an injury caused by the negligent acts of those companies. The New England company paid the judgment against it and took an assignment of the judgment against the Pennsylvania company. The Pennsylvania company then moved the court to cancel the judgment against it. In reversing the trial court for refusing this motion, the supreme court of New York said: "It is claimed by the assignee of the judgment that, as between it and the defendant [the Pennsylvania company], it was the negligence of the latter that caused the injury, . . . and that hence it is not precluded from recovering indemnity or contribution from its co-tortfeasor. This may well be, but has no effect on this application. On this motion, the Central New England, etc., Company has but the same rights as its assignor, the plaintiff. As the plaintiff could not collect anything from the defendant after satisfaction by the other company, his assigns cannot."

Section 571 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "In the case of an assignment of Gruell, 82 Iowa, 736, 47 N. W. 1081, where the owner of a horse which had been killed by the negligence of the hirer's servant secured a judgment against the hirer, and, in satisfaction of that judgment, took an assignment of the hirer's right to recover over from the servant "on account of damages sustained . . . by reason of said above judgment." His right to maintain an action against the servant by virtue of that assignment was denied upon the ground that it was not an assignment of the cause of action against the servant for his negligence in allowing the team to run away, but merely of the damages sustained by reason of the judgment.

Cases in which a joint tortfeasor, having paid the full claim, seeks to enforce contribution or compel indemnity from his co-tortfeasors, present a different question from that raised where an assignment of the injured party's claim is relied on.

a thing in action; the action by the assignee is without prejudice to any set-off or other defense existing at the time of, or before, notice of the assignment," etc. If, then, when Devlin assigned his pretended cause of action against Bowen to Tanner, he (Devlin) had been paid by Tanner for all damages sustained by him, under the circumstances of this case the defense of payment or satisfaction could have been interposed by Bowen; and when these facts were developed upon the trial, the defendant's request for an instruction for a verdict in his favor should have been granted. Devlin, having been paid and satisfied by Tanner, did not have any cause of action against Bowen which he could assert in court himself, and, of course, if he could not assert it, his assignee could not.

The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings. Reversed and remanded.

Milburn, J., not having heard the argument, takes no part in the foregoing decision.

RAY JOHNSTON, Respt.,
v.

JAMES C. FARGO, President of American Express Company, Appt.

(184 N. Y. 379, 77 N. E. 388.)

Contract—exempting master from liability for negligent injury.

A contract by an employee relieving the employer from liability for injuries due to the latter's negligence is against public policy and void.

(April 3, 1906.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of the Onondaga County Court which affirmed a judgment of the Municipal Court of Syracuse in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Willard A. Glen, for appellant:

The consideration expressed in the contract was sufficient.

There is nothing in its terms contravening public policy.

What public policy is, or should be, is not a matter of private opinion, but rather a matter for the legislature to determine.

Kenney v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 125 N. Y. 422, 26 N. E. 626.

Case Note.—Validity of contract exonerating master in advance from liability for negligent injuries to servant:—

There is some conflict of authority upon the point, but the weight of authority is clearly in accord with the doctrine declared and applied in JOHNSTON v. FARGO. There is, perhaps, an opportunity to make a distinction bearing upon this point between an injury due, as in the JOHNSTON CASE, to the neglect of a personal duty resting upon the master, e. g., the duty to provide proper appliances or a safe place in which to work, and the duty resting primarily upon other employees for the neglect of which the master is not actually or morally responsible, but which may be legally imputed to him either because the negligent employee was not technically a fellow servant of the injured employee within the common-law fellow-servant rule, or because the fellow-servant rule has been modified by a local statute. The 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

only case, however, in which such a distinction is clearly suggested seems to be Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Eubanks, 48 Ark. 460, 3 Am. St. Rep. 245, 3 S. W. 808.

The court, in that case, while intimating that it may be competent for a railroad company to exonerate itself in advance from statutory liability for the negligence of co-servants if it has exercised proper care in the selection of competent servants, held that a stipulation undertaking to exonerate a railroad company in advance from liability for breach of duty to furnish a servant a safe track, safe cars, machinery, etc., is void as against public policy. The distinction suggested is that the negligence of a fellow servant is not in fact and in morals the negligence of the master, even though by virtue of a statute it may be imputed to him.

The phraseology in the opinion in Blanton v. Dold, 109 Mo. 64, 18 S. W. 1149, suggests that possibly that court may have had the same distinction in mind. The court, in holding that a servant does not impliedly assume the risk from unknown perils due to the master's neglect in respect to machinery, said arguendo, that "an express contract in most solemn form by an employee exempting his master from liability for negligence in the performance of his personal duties toward the former has been often declared in American courts illegal, its subject-matter being considered as contrary to a sound public policy." (Italics ours.)

Public policy requires and encourages the making of contracts by competent parties, upon all valid and lawful considerations.

Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co.*

While, as already said, the other cases on the subject do not recognize the distinction, for the purpose of enabling the reader to examine the cases in the light of the possible distinction, the annotator has indicated the character of the negligence charged against the master as a defense to which the contract purporting to relieve the master from liability was relied upon.

In Hissong v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 91 Ala. 514, 8 So. 776, it was held that a stipulation in a contract of employment for service on a railroad that the regular compensation shall cover all risks, and that, if the employee is disabled by accident or other cause, the right to claim compensation for injuries will not be recognized, is opposed to public policy, and does not avail to secure nonliability for an injury caused to an employee by defendant's own negligence or the misconduct of coemployees in the cases specified in the statute rendering the employer liable for the negligence of the coemployees. In this case the complaint charged that the injury was due to defects in the defendant's track and coupling appliances, and also to the negligence of coemployees; and the case therefore seems, impliedly at least, to repudiate the distinction suggested in the Arkansas case.

In Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Jones, 92 Ala. 218, 9 So. 276, also, the doctrine that a stipulation by an employer to exonerate himself from liability for injury to the servant on account of negligence is void as contrary to public policy was applied by sustaining a demurrer to a plea setting up 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) a rule of the company to the effect that, if an employee is disabled by accident or any other cause, the right to claim compensation will not be recognized, against a complaint which alleges defects in the condition of the ways, works, machinery, or plant of the defendant, and also negligence on the part of the employees who had charge and control of the train by which the plaintiff was injured.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Orr, 91 Ala. 548, 8 So. 360, where a brakeman was killed in consequence of an improper appliance on a car, the court held that it was not improper to exclude a rule of the railroad company warning employees to see for themselves, before using them, that the machinery or tools which they are expected to use are in proper condition for the service required. The court said that a rule which imposes upon an employee the duty to look after and be responsible for his own safety contravenes the law itself which fixes the liability of railroads for negligence causing injury or death to their employees. If this case stood alone, it is apparent that the decision might be reconciled with the distinction suggested in the Arkansas case. That is also true of Roesner v. Hermann, 16 Biss. 486, 8 Fed. 782, where a servant was injured by defective and unsafe machinery, a stipulation in the contract of employment exonerating the master from liability by reason of his own negligence or that of his employees was held to be void as against public policy; and of Chicago, W. & V. Coal Co. v. Peterson, 39 Ill. App. 114, holding that a stipulation exonerating the master from liability for nonperformance of the duty enjoined upon him by statute with reference to furnishing materials to support the roof of a mine is contrary to public policy and void. In Maney v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 49 Ill. App. 105, which seems to have been an action against a railroad company to recover for the death of an employee in consequence of the negligence of other employees in charge of a locomotive in failing to give the signals required by statute when approaching a street crossing, the court stated the general principle that exemption cannot be secured by contract against liability for the consequence of gross negligence or a wilful act.

It will be observed that the court, in Kansas P. R. Co. v. Peavey, 29 Kan. 169, 44 Am. Rep. 630, in holding that a railroad company cannot contract in advance for the release of a statutory liability for injury to a servant from the negligence of a coemployee, applies the doctrine that such contracts are void as against public policy to the very case which the Arkansas court suggested might be an exception to the rule. Indeed, the Kansas court based its decision largely upon the legislative declaration of public policy by the passage of the statute modifying the common-law rule.

The doctrine of the last case was applied in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Fronk (Kan.) 87 Pac. 698, where a student brakeman was killed by the negligence of coemployees, by holding that a contract by the deceased, exempting the company from all liability for damages which he might sustain in consequence of the negligence of the company, its agents, servants, or employees, was against public policy and void. It was also held in that case that a student brakeman, who, in consideration of being permitted to ride on a railroad company's train to observe and learn the duties of a freight brakeman, agreed to perform services on its engines, trains, and cars while learning such duties, was an employee of the company for the purposes of the doctrine under discussion.

An agreement by the father of a minor child employed by a railroad company never to trouble the company if the son should be injured cannot be given the effect of exempting the company from the consequence of the negligence of an engineer operating an engine who was not a fellow servant of the son. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Putman (Tex. Civ. App.) 63 S. W. 910. The court said that the parent might consent or agree to the assumption of the ordinary risks and dangers of the minor's employment, but 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that to give effect to any act, course of conduct, or agreement on the part of the parent exempting the company from the consequence of negligence alleged and proved in the case at bar would be contrary to public policy.

In St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Arnold, 32 Tex. Civ. App. 272, 74 S. W. 819, where a section hand was injured in consequence of the joint negligence of other employees of the railroad company and of a contractor in throwing or permitting timbers to be thrown from a moving train, the court said that a railway company cannot, by contract or otherwise, relieve itself of the duty it owes to the public and its employees to exercise ordinary care to operate its trains safely.

In Tarbell v. Rutland R. Co. 73 Vt. 347, 56 L.R.A. 656, 87 Am. St. Rep. 734, 51 Atl. 6, it was held that a contract by which the next of kin of one about to be employed by a railroad company released and discharged the company from all damages that might accrue to the next of kin by reason of the company's negligence was void as contrary to public policy, where the employee was killed by coming in contact with cars standing upon a side track while descending a ladder which, in violation of a statute, was placed on the side of the car. Defendant contended that, though such a contract between itself and the injured employee might not be upheld, yet the contract being with the next of kin did not contravene public policy. The court, however, said that, as the purpose of the contract was to exempt the defendant from the statutory liability for its negligence, and thus to defeat the statute, it was an immaterial fact that one of the contracting parties was the next of kin, and not the employee.

In Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Spangler, 44 Ohio St. 471, 58 Am. Rep. 833, 8 N. E. 467, a stipulation exonerating a railroad company from liability for injury to a brakeman from the neglect of any other employees of the company, including those superior to him in authority, as conductor or Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, while in the employment of the American Express Company, the defendant, sustained personal injuries, for which he has recovered this judgment in the municipal court of the city of Syracuse, which has been affirmed by the county court of Onondaga county and by the appellate division of the supreme court in the fourth de-foreman, was held void as contrary to public policy. The injury in this case was caused by the negligence of a conductor.

In Newport News & M. Valley Co. v. Eifert, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 575, where the court declared that a contract whereby a railroad employee assumes all risk from accident from any cause while in the defendant's service is void as against public policy, the character of the negligence charged against the defendant does not appear.

In Johnson v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 86 Va. 975, 11 S. E. 829, a stipulation exempting a railroad company in advance from liability for injuries to a member of a firm of contractors for the removal of a granite bluff on the right of way, or their employees, from the negligence of the railroad company, was held void as contrary to public policy.

The case of International & G. N. R. Co. v. Hinzle, 82 Tex. 623, 18 S. W. 681, did not pass upon the validity in general of contracts to relieve the master from liability for future negligent injuries, but merely held that a contract by stepparents purporting to release the master from any liability for any injury the employee might sustain, and for the value of his services during the term of his minority, even if such stepparents were considered to have the rights and duties of natural parents, could operate to waive only what they were entitled to,—that is, the value of the labor and services of the minor until his majority; and did not exempt the company from responsibility to the minor for a permanent injury.

The doctrine of the foregoing cases which condemns a contract to relieve the master from liability for negligence as contrary to public policy has been applied in a number of cases in which a railroad company has sought to divest itself of a duty resting upon it by procuring a contract from the employee to assume that duty himself, or to assume the risk incident to its nonperformance. Thus, in Bonner v. Bean, 80 Tex. 152, 15 S. W. 798, it was held that the failure of a switchman to use a coupling knife as he had stipulated to do would not protect the company from liability for injuries due to dangerous deadwoods if its use would not have removed the danger. The court said: "The defendants could not shield themselves directly nor indirectly from the consequences of their negligence by any form of contract."

It is not permissible for a railroad company to bind a brakeman by contract not to attempt to couple or uncouple a car, unless he knows the coupling is in a proper condition. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Wood (Tex. Civ. App.) 35 S. W. 879.

But a stipulation by a brakeman waiving all liability of the company for injuries resulting from disobedience of a rule requiring the use of a coupling stick is not void as contrary to public policy. Russell v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 47 Fed. 204. The court said that it was unnecessary to decide whether a railroad company can, in advance, contract with its employee for exemption from the consequences of its own negligence, since the stipulation in question was not of that nature.

Rules promulgated by a mining company are void as against public policy so far as they attempt to throw upon the employee the duty of ascertaining whether or not the places in which he is required to work are safe before entering them, and to relieve the master from the duty resting upon him to guard against danger from loose coal or bad roofs. Consolidated Coal Co. v. Lundak, 196 Ill. 594, 63 N. E. 1079; Himrod Coal Co. v. Clark, 197 Ill. 514, 64 N. E. 282.

So, a stipulation by a railroad employee to inform himself of obstructions near the track and use due care to avoid injury thereby is an attempt by the railroad company to divest itself of its duty to exercise care in providing a reasonably safe track, and to warn the plaintiff of the proximity of structures which it had negligently placed so near the track as to be dangerous, and as such is contrary to public policy. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Darby, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 413, 67 S. W. 446. The assumption in the last case, that the defendant was negligent partment. The latter court was divided in opinion, and has permitted the defendant to further appeal to this court, upon the ground that there was a question of law in the case which ought to be reviewed by us. The injuries were occasioned by the plaintiff's falling with an elevator, or lift, in the barn of the express company, while it was being used for carrying down some vehicles, and the complaint charges that it was in a defective condition and that the occurrence was due to the fault or negligence of the defendant. The evidence upon the trial was such as to raise questions of fact as to the negligence of the defendant and as to the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, and those questions were properly submitted by the trial court for the determination of the jury. They demand no further consideration by us. The one question for discussion upon this appeal is the sufficiency of the defense made by the company upon an agreement which the plaintiff, upon entering the defendant's employment, executed and delivered to it. It was in these words: "I do further agree, in consideration of my employment by said American Express Company, that I will assume all risks of accident or injury which I shall meet with or sustain in the course of such employment, whether occasioned by the negligence of said company, or any of its members, officers, agents, or employees, or otherwise, and that, in case I shall at any time suffer any such injury, I will at once execute and deliver to said company a good and sufficient release, in permitting the structure so near the track, possibly distinguishes that case from Quinn v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 175 Mass. 150, 55 N. E. 891, holding that an agreement, in a written application to a railroad corporation for employment, to make, as soon as possible, a careful examination of all things near the track so that dangers attending them may be understood, is not contrary to a statute forbidding an employer to contract with an employee for an exemption from liability for injuries, since in the latter case the defendant does not seem to have been chargeable with negligence in permitting the structure in question near the track, but merely in failing properly to warn the plaintiff of the danger.

In Sedgwick v. Illinois C. R. Co. 73 Iowa, 158, 34 N. W. 790, it was held that an objection to the admission in evidence of a stipulation by which a brakeman assumed all the risks incident to the disobedience of a rule forbidding any attempt to uncouple moving cars, upon the ground that it was in conflict with Iowa Code, § 1307, and in contravention of public policy, was not well taken. The decision, however, was upon the ground that, if the injury was sustained in consequence of the violation of the rule, unless there existed some necessity which imposed upon the injured employee a higher duty than that created by the rule there could be no recovery; that the fact that the injured employee contracted to hold the defendant harmless was quite immaterial; but that the defendant had the right to introduce the stipulation in evidence because it showed not only the existence of the rule and that it constituted one of the conditions of the employment, but also that its existence was known to the injured employee.

There is some express authority in favor of the validity of contracts exonerating the master in advance from liability even for injuries negligently inflicted.

Thus, in Griffiths v. Dudley, L. R. 9 Q. B. Div. 357, it was held to be competent for a workman to contract with his employer not to claim compensation for personal injuries under the employer's liability act of 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

1880. The purpose of this act, as stated in the opinion, was to obviate the injustice to workmen that employers should escape liability where persons having superintendence and control in the employment were guilty of negligence causing injury to the workmen. This injury in this case was caused by the negligence of an inspector of machinery in the defendant's employment. The decision is put upon the broad ground that the public policy evidenced by the act does not involve a restriction of the freedom of contracting.

In Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Mahoney, 148 Ind. 196, 40 L.R.A. 101, 62 Am. St. Rep. 503, 46 N. E. 917, 47 N. E. 464, the court states as a general rule that a contract by which an employee assumes all liability for injuries by reason of the employer's negligence or otherwise is not against public policy. The case is cited here for the sake of such statement. The ultimate question decided in the case as to the validity of stipulations the purpose of which is to exonerate a railroad company in advance from liability for injuries to an express messenger employed by the express company involves considerations foreign to the purposes of this note, and is therefore not treated herein.

In the original opinion in Peterson v. Seattle Traction Co. 23 Wash. 615, 53 L. R. A. 586, 63 Pac. 539, it was held, in effect, that a contract made as an incident to the principal contract of employment, whereby a section hand agreed to exonerate a railroad company from responsibility for loss or injury received while riding to and from work on a free pass, was not void as against public policy. This was upon the assumption that the plaintiff was not in the employ of the company during transportation to and from work. Upon a rehearing (23 Wash. 643, 53 L.R.A. 596, 65 Pac. 543), the court modified its former opinion on this point, saying that the question whether the plaintiff and defendant could so contract was not involved; and that the point might still be considered open and undecided, for the reason that, under the pleadings, the plain-under my hand and seal, of all claims, demands, and causes of action arising out of such injury, or connected therewith, or resulting therefrom; and I hereby bind myself, my heirs, executors, and administrators, with the payment to said express company, on demand, of any sum which it may be compelled to pay in consequence of any such claim, or in defending the same, including all counsel fees and expenses of litigation connected therewith." In submitting the case to the jury, the trial judge charged as follows with respect to this defense: "There is a clause in the contract which provides that the plaintiff shall release the defendant from any injuries which he might suffer by reason of the negligence of the defendant. I shall hold, as matter of law, that that clause in that contract is void as being without consideration and as against public policy." At the appellate division the judgment was upheld on this point upon the ground that the agreement was contrary to public policy, and therefore invalid, and Mr. Justice Hiscock, who delivered the opinion of the court, has presented the reasoning in support of that view very fully and ably.

tiff was being carried gratuitously without any consideration, and not in pursuance of any contract express or implied.

The validity of such contracts is upheld in Georgia, with the exception that they cannot operate to exonerate the master from liability for injuries due to criminal negligence. As subsequently shown, this exception is of especial importance as applied to actions against railroad companies for injuries to employees. The doctrine, with the exception thereto, was first declared in Western & A. R. Co. v. Bishop, 50 Ga. 465, and was applied in that case by upholding the validity of a contract stipulation by which an employee of a railroad company agreed to assume all risks connected with or incident to his position on the road, and agreed that in no case should the company be liable for any damages he might sustain by accidents or collisions on the road, or which might result from the negligence of himself or any other employee. The injury in this case resulted from defective appliances used in coupling cars. The court, in support of its decision, said: "He [the plaintiff] deliberately and for a consideration undertook what he knew to be a dangerous service, and contracted that he would not hold the company liable for the negligence of its servants, or even for the negligence of the company itself." The doctrine of this case was applied, and a contract exonerating the employer upheld, in Western & A. R. Co. v. Strong, 52 Ga. 461, where a railroad employee was injured in consequence of a defective appliance furnished by the company. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The question is one upon which this court has not pronounced itself, and it is of considerable importance, touching, as it does, the principle of freedom of contract. In the case of Purdy v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 125 N. Y. 209, 21 Am. St. Rep. 736, 28 N. E. 255, such a contract to release the employer from liability for injury through negligence was involved; but it was held to have been void for being without the support of any consideration. It was said that no intimation was intended that it would have been valid if there had been a consideration for it, and that "it might even then be urged that public policy forbids the exaction of such a contract from its employees by railroad and other corporations; and upon that question we desire to express no opinion at the present time." In Kenney v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 125 N. Y. 422, 26 N. E. 626, the contract for exemption from liability was between the defendant and the plaintiff's employer, an express company, under which the former sought to defeat the plaintiff's action. This question was not passed upon; nor was it in the case of Dowd v. New York, O. & W. R. Co. 170 N. Y. 459,

In Fulton Bag & Cotton Mills v. Wilson, 89 Ga. 318, 15 S. E. 322, the doctrine of the Bishop Case was expressly reaffirmed, and was applied by upholding a stipulation whereby the employee agreed to relieve the employer, not a railroad company, from liability for any injury or damage he might sustain while thus employed "whether it arises from explosion, or the machinery, or accident, or the negligence or misconduct of himself or any other person employed by the company, or from any other cause." The injury in this case was sustained in consequence of the defendant's negligence in putting the plaintiff at work at defective machinery. In the official headnote to the case the court states that the acquiescence of the legislature in the principle established in the Bishop Case for so long a time was strong, if not decisive, evidence of the public policy of the state touching the question,—especially as legislative attention must have been called to the subject when the act of 1876 was passed, which deals with criminal negligence of railroad employees, but forbears to interfere with the prior law as to other employees, or as to employers generally. Under these circumstances, the court declined to overrule its previous decisions, but, on the contrary, affirmed the same in so far as they were unmodified by the statute referred to touching railroad employees.

In 1876, and after the decision in the Bishop Case, the legislature passed an act declaring that any person employed in any capacity by a railroad company, who shall be guilty of negligence in relation to the matter about which he is employed, by which any person is injured, shall be guilty of the offense of criminal negligence, and subject to punishment. In the case of Cook v. Western & A. R. Co. 72 Ga. 48, which arose after the passage of that statute, the court—in consequence, as subsequently shown, of a misapprehension as to the exact scope and effect of the statute—held that a stipulation identical with that in the Bishop Case was invalid and inoperative in an action to recover for the death of a railroad employee caused by the negligence of a coemployee.

In New v. Southern R. Co. 116 Ga. 147, 59 L.R.A. 115, 42 S. E. 391, the court, following the doctrine laid down in the Bishop Case, upheld the validity of a contract by which a father agreed to exonerate a railroad company from any liability to him for damages or injuries that might be sustained by his minor son while in the employment of the company, and held that it prevented the father from recovering for loss of services of the son, who was killed while in the company's employ. The case was taken out of the exception to the doctrine which obtains in case of injuries due to "criminal negligence" upon the ground that the act of 1876, which declares that the negligence of railroad employees shall be criminal, expressly exempts cases in which death ensues, and applies only to cases of serious bodily injury not followed by death. The court said that a grave error was committed in making Cook v. Western & A. R. Co. supra, which was an action by a widow for the homicide of her husband, turn upon the act of 1876; and that decision was overruled. The court said that in an action like

R. Co. 49 Ill. App. 105; Newport News & M. Valley Co. v. Eifert, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 575; Blanton v. Dold, 109 Mo. 64, 18 S. W. 1149; Johnson v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 86 Va. 975, 11 S. E. 829. In the supreme court of this state we find, in addition to what has been held below in this case, a similar view taken by the general term of the second department in Simpson v. New York Rubber Co. 80 Hun, 415, 30 N. Y. Supp. 339. The preponderance of authority adverse to the validity of such contracts is such as greatly and properly influences our view of the question. In Griffiths v. Dudley, supra, where such an agreement was held to be quite consistent with public policy, the view of the English court, as expressed by Justice Field, was that "the interest of the employed only would be affected," and not that of "all society," and "that workmen, as a rule, were perfectly competent to make reasonable bargains for themselves." It is to be observed, however, with respect to the situation in England, that subsequently, in 1897, an act of Parliament was passed, entitled the "workingmen's compensation act" which in effect declares the case at bar against a railroad company for homicide, in which a contract exonerating the company from liability is set up, its efficacy should be made to depend upon whether or not the act causing the death was criminal without regard to the statute referred to.

Some of the statutes defining the master's duty and liability toward employees include an express prohibition against contracts exonerating the master from liability in the event contemplated by the statute. The constitutionality, construction, and effect of such provisions are beyond the scope of this note.

Assuming, as some of the cases above cited do, that a contract exonerating the master in advance from liability for negligent injury to the servant may be valid, the question may arise, as it did in Griffiths v. Dudley, supra, whether such a stipulation by the employee will prevent an action for his death, under Lord Campbell's act or other statutes giving a cause of action for death. That question, however, is not within the scope of this note.

Cases involving the validity of the release of an employer from liability for an injury already sustained are, of course not in point here; and the numerous class of cases involving the validity and operation of agreements by railroad employees to the effect that acceptance of benefits from a relief department, to the support of which the company contributes, shall operate to release the company from liability, are also excluded, as they present a distinct question which will be treated as the occasion arises.

the public policy of the state. By that act, in reality, though not in form, the right of the workman to contract away his right to recover compensation from his employer is nullified, inasmuch as such a contract is only valid when, as between employer and employed, there exists a general scheme for compensation which secures to the workman benefits as great as those he would derive from a proceeding under the compensation acts.

The attitude of this court, with respect to the freedom to contract for immunity from the consequences of negligence has been from an early day very firm where the contracts of common carriers are concerned, as may be seen by reference to Kenney v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. supra, where the cases establishing the rule were reviewed; but to extend the application of the doctrine in such cases to the relations of the employer and the employed involves considerations so closely touching the general welfare of the community that the state must be necessarily deeply concerned. This court has not been in agreement with the Supreme Court of the United States upon the right of common carriers to contract against their negligence; but recently, in Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Voigt, 176 U. S. 498, 44 L. ed. 560, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 385, the doctrine of New York C. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. ed. 627, seems to have been somewhat departed from. As that decision touches in a degree upon the question we are considering, I shall briefly refer to it. In that case Voigt was an express messenger, and was injured as a consequence of a collision upon the railroad. The company showed, in defense of a claim for compensation, a contract made between it and the express company, relating to the latter's business, which agreed to protect it from liability to messengers by reason of accidents occurring through negligence, and a further contract between Voigt and the express company, by which he assumed the risk of all accidents from negligence, sustained by him in the course of his employment, and agreed to hold his employer harmless from any claim for personal injuries. It was held that the contract did not contravene public policy. Though the distinction was made that Voigt was not a passenger, within the meaning of the Lockwood Case, supra, and that his contract exonerated the railroad company from liability to him, it might, perhaps, be said that the decision affords some support, in doctrine, to the appellant's argument.

Contracts are illegal at common law, as being against public policy, when they are such as to injuriously affect or subvert the public interests. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 260n; Chesterfield v. Janssen, 2 Ves. Sr. 125, 156. If it were true that the interest of the employed only would be affected by such contracts as the present one, as it was held by the English court in Griffiths v. Dudley, supra, it would be difficult to defend, upon sound reasoning, the denial of the right to enter into them; but that is not quite true. The theory of their invalidity is in the importance to the state that there shall be no relaxation of the rule of law which imposes the duty of care on the part of the employer towards the employed. The state is interested in the conservation of the lives and of the healthy vigor of its citizens, and, if employers could contract away their responsibility at common law, it would tend to encourage on their part laxity of conduct in, if not an indifference to, the maintenance of proper and reasonable safeguards to human life and limb. The rule of responsibility at common law is as just as it is strict, and the interest of the state in its maintenance must be assumed; for its policy has, in recent years, been evidenced in the progressive enactment of many laws which regulate the employment of children and the hours of work, and impose strict conditions with reference to the safety and healthfulness of the surroundings of the employed in the factory and in the shop. The employer and the employed, in theory, deal upon equal terms; but practically that is not always the case. The artisan or workman may be driven by need, or he may be ignorant, or of improvident character. It is therefore for the interest of the community that there should be no encouragement for any relaxation on the employer's part in his duty of reasonable care for the safety of his employees. That freedom of contract may be said to be affected by the denial of the right to make such agreements is met by the answer that the restriction is but a salutary one, which organized society exacts for the surer protection of its members. While it is true that the individual may be the one who directly is interested in the making of such a contract, indirectly the state, being concerned for the welfare of all its members, is interested in the maintenance of the rule of liability and in its enforcement by the courts.

To a certain extent, the internal activities of organized society are subject to the restraining action of the state. This is evidenced by the many laws upon the statute books, in recent years, which have been passed for the purpose of prohibiting, restricting, or regulating the conduct of a private business, either because regarded as hurtful to the health or welfare of the community, or because deemed from its nature or magnitude affected with a public interest. It has been observed that it is still the business of the state, in modern times, to defend individuals against one another, and, though the proposition is a broad one, when considered with reference to penal legislation, and all legislation intended for the promotion of the health, welfare, and safety of the community, it is not without truth. It is evident, from the course of legislation framed for the purpose of affording greater protection to the class of the employed, that the people of this state have compelled the employer to do many things which at common law he was not under obligation to do. Such legislation may be regarded as supplementing the common-law rule of the employer's responsibility, and is illustrative of the policy of the state. Therefore it is, when an agreement is sought to be enforced which suspends the operation of the common-law rule of liability and defeats the spirit of existing laws of the state, because tending to destroy the motive of the employer to be vigilant in the performance of his duty towards his employees, that it is the duty of the court to declare it to be invalid and to refuse its enforcement.

I think that the judgment below was correct, and should be affirmed, with costs.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

T. M. KIMBERLY et al.

v.

R. S. HOWLAND, Appt.

(Two cases.)

(— N. C. —, 55 S. E. 778.)

Blasting—evidence.

1. Evidence that one attempted to use dynamite in blasting, though inexperienced, without smothering the blasts, in consequence of which a rock was cast upon a neighboring house, is sufficient to carry to the jury the question of his negligence.

Same—proximate cause.

2. That one attempting to use dynamite in blasting without smothering the blasts cannot foresee the exact consequences of his act does not absolve him from liability for an injury to an occupant of neighboring property, where the neighborhood is populous, and he ought, in the exercise of ordinary care, to know that he is subjecting the occupants of the dwellings in the vicinity to danger.

Negligence—fright—right of action.

3. Impairment of health, or loss of bodily power, through fright which is the natural and direct result of the negligent act of another, is sufficient to sustain an action against the wrongdoer.

Damages—injury to wife—recovery by husband.

4. A man may recover compensation from one causing negligent injuries to his wife, for the loss of society, service, aid, and comfort resulting therefrom, including, if the injury is permanent, compensation for diminished capacity to labor in the future.

(December 18, 1906.)

A PPEAL by defendant from judgments of the Superior Court for Buncombe County in plaintiffs' favor in actions brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Statement by Brown, J.:

The plaintiffs brought two distinct actions for an injury to the feme plaintiff by reason of the negligence of the defendant in conducting certain blasting operations. The husband sued for the loss of his wife's services.

The two actions were consolidated and tried together upon the following issues:

(1) Was the defendant negligent as alleged?

A. Yes.

(2) If so, was the plaintiff Janie Kimberly injured thereby?

A. Yes.

(3) What damage, if any, is plaintiff Janie Kimberly entitled to recover?

A. $3,500.

(4) What damage, if any, is plaintiff T. M. Kimberly entitled to recover?

A. $700.

From the judgment rendered, defendant appealed.

Messrs. Merrimon & Merrimon, for appellant:

In order to warrant a recovery, the phys-

Note.—The right to recover for physical injuries resulting from fright caused by negligence is a much-discussed question, on which the decisions are in considerable conflict. Reason and justice, as well as the analogies of the law, seem to sustain the right to recover in 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

such a case, however, where the negligence and the resulting injury are clearly proved, and nothing (other than the fright) intervenes to break the chain of causation. A full review of all the cases which have considered the question will be found in a subject note in 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 49.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant excepted to the issues submitted by the court, and tendered the following: (1) Were the injuries alleged in the complaint the immediate, natural, and necessary consequences of the alleged blasting? (2) Were the alleged injuries to the plaintiff such as might naturally and probably occur from the alleged negligence, and were they such as should have been in contemplation of the defendant with reasonable certainty? (3) Was the alleged physical injury the natural and proximate result of the alleged fright? The issues submitted by the court presented every phase of the case, and are such as arise upon the pleadings, and are approved by precedent as appropriate in such cases. The defendant was given the opportunity to present every defense he had and every proposition of law and fact embraced in the issues tendered by him. Not only was he given a fair opportunity to present his view of the law and facts, but the record shows that he did so present them. The issues submitted are also a sufficient basis for the judgment rendered. Wright v. Cotton, 140 N. C. 1, 52 S. E. 141; Wilson v. Levi Cotton Mills, 140 N. C. 52, 52 S. E. 250.

The chief contention made by the learned counsel for the defendant in his argument is that in no view of the evidence can either plaintiff recover, and therefore the motion to nonsuit should have been sustained. As the right to recover anything on the part of the husband is dependent upon the liability of the defendant to the wife, we will consider her case first.

It is contended: (1) That the evidence discloses no negligent act. (2) That the defendant's agents could not reasonably have foreseen the consequences of their acts. (3) That the injury complained of by the wife was the result of fright only, for which no recovery can be had. The plaintiff offered evidence tending to prove that defendant was blasting rock with dynamite on the outskirts of the city of Asheville about 100 yards from Charlotte street and 175 yards from plaintiffs' residence, and in close proximity to other houses. A rock from one of the blasts, weighing about 20 pounds, crashed through a portion of plaintiffs' residence. It was further in evidence that defendant's foreman was not an expert blaster and that a part of the time when the blasting was going on he was absent, and that his assistants had but little experience. It was in evidence that the blasts were fired off without being properly "smothered," and that "smothering" is a safe method usually employed in such operations, and that, had it been properly done on this occasion, the injury to plaintiffs' residence could not well have resulted. We think the evidence of negligence amply sufficient to have been submitted to the jury. Blackwell v. Lynchburg & D. R. Co. 111 N. C. 151, 17 L.R.A. 729, 32 Am. St. Rep. 786, 16 S. E. 12. We think, furthermore, that a man of ordinary prudence should have foreseen the probable consequences of blasting with dynamite in such a neighborhood without properly smothering the blast. Persons using such an inflammable and powerful instrumentality as dynamite are charged with knowledge of its probable consequences which they could by reasonable diligence have acquired. The defendant knew he was blasting in a populous neighborhood, and that plaintiffs' dwelling was near by. If the evidence offered by plaintiffs is to be believed, the workmen were unskilful and the blasts deficiently smothered so as to fail to properly confine their effect. It is true defendant did not know, at the time he fired the blast, that the feme plaintiff was lying in bed in her home in a pregnant condition, but he or his agents knew it was a dwelling house and that in well-regulated families such conditions occasionally exist. While the defendant could not foresee the exact consequences of his act, he ought, in the exercise of ordinary care, to have known that he was subjecting plaintiff and his family to danger and to have taken proper precautions to guard against it. Gates v. Latta, 117 N. C. 189, 53 Am. St. Rep. 584, 23 S. E. 173; Watson, Damages for Personal Injuries, § 4; 19 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 7, and cases cited; Blackwell v. Lynchburg & D. R. Co. supra. The authorities seem to agree that, if the tort is wilful, and not merely negligent, the wrongdoer is liable for such physical injuries as may proximately result whether he could have foreseen them or not. We do not base our decision upon any evidence of a wilful wrong, for there is none. The defendant was engaged in a lawful act, and, if prosecuted with due care, he would not be liable, and due care means, in a case of this sort, a high degree of care. We bear in mind the distinction between wilful wrongdoing and those consequences flowing from simple negligence, so clearly stated by Mr. Justice Walker in Drum v. Miller, 135 N. C. 208, 65 L.R.A. 890, 102 Am. St. Rep. 528, 47 S. E. 424: "In the one case he is presumed to intend the consequence of his unlawful act, but in the other, while the act is lawful, it must be performed in a careful manner, otherwise it becomes unlawful, if a prudent man, in the exercise of proper care, can foresee that it will naturally or probably cause injury to another, though it is not necessary that the evil result should be, in form, foreseen." We therefore conclude that, while there is no evidence of a wilful wrong, the defendant should have reasonably foreseen the result of his negligence. No human being could foresee the exact form of the injury inflicted, but ordinary prudence could foresee that there was danger to the plaintiffs and their household unless the blast was securely confined.

It has been argued in this case by defendant's counsel with much earnestness and ability, backed by most respectable authority, that the feme plaintiff's injuries, if she sustained any, were the result of fright without any contemporaneous physical injury, and that she cannot recover for them. This brings us to the consideration of a question concerning which there is much conflict among the authorities. We will not undertake to either reconcile or review them. All the courts agree that mere fright, unaccompanied or followed by physical injury, cannot be considered as an element of damage. In a very exhaustive note by Judge Freeman to Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Hayter, 77 Am. St. Rep. 860, all the authorities are collected. But, where the fright occasions physical injury, not contemporaneous with it, but directly traceable to it, the courts are hopelessly divided. The testimony offered on behalf of the plaintiffs tends to prove that the wife was lying on her bed heavy with child at the moment the rock crashed through the roof; that, although it did not strike her, it greatly shocked her nervous system and nearly caused a miscarriage, and that she has never recovered from the effects of it. If this testimony is believed, the injury to the wife was a physical injury resulting from shock and fright and directly traceable to it. There is much conflict of evidence, but plaintiffs' testimony tends to prove that, had not the rock crashed through the roof, she would not have endured the nervous physical pain and suffering which has followed. The nerves are as much a part of the physical system as the limbs, and in some persons are very delicately adjusted, and, when "out of tune," cause excruciating agony. We think the general principles of the law of torts support a right of action for physical injuries resulting from negligence, whether wilful or otherwise, none the less strongly because the physical injury consists of a wrecked nervous system instead of lacerated limbs. Injuries of the former class are frequently more painful and enduring than those of the latter. A recent writer on the subject trenchantly says: "To deny recovery against one whose wilful or negligent tort has so terribly frightened a person as to cause his death, or leave him through life a suffering and helpless wreck, and permit a recovery for exactly the same wrong which results, instead, in a broken finger, is a travesty upon justice. The reasoning which can lead to such a result must be cogent indeed if it shall be entitled to respect." Case & Comment, August, 1906. A text writer of repute says: "The preferable rule on this subject is, in our opinion, that, if a nervous shock is a natural and proximate consequence of a negligent act, and physical injuries result directly from the mental disturbance, there should be a recovery for the anguish of mind and its consequent physical ills, irrespective of contemporaneous bodily hurt." Watson, Damages for Personal Injuries, § 405. We think the able judge who tried this case in the court below clearly stated the law, as we administer it, when he said: "While fright and nervousness alone do not constitute an injury within the meaning of this issue, if this fright and nervousness is the natural and direct result of the negligent act of the defendant, and if this fright and nervousness naturally and directly causes an impairment of health or loss of bodily power, then this would constitute an injury within the meaning of this issue. There must be an injury, as explained to you, and this injury must have been the natural and direct result of the negligent act of the defendant and one which should have been foreseen by the defendant by the 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

It is contended that the husband has sustained no injury, and as to him the motion to nonsuit should have been allowed. It seems to be well settled that, where the injury to the wife is such that the husband receives a separate loss or damage, as where he is put to expense, or is deprived of the society or the services of his wife, he is entitled to recover therefor, and he may sue in his own name. 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 861, and cases cited. In this case there is no evidence of an outlay of money in medical bills and other actual expenses, and the court so charged the jury, and directed them to allow nothing on that account. His Honor also correctly instructed the jury to allow nothing because of any mental suffering upon the part of the husband. There was, however, evidence as to the loss of the services of the wife and that the injury inflicted was of such a character as to deprive the husband of her society, services, aid, and comfort. The court further charged that, if the injuries are permanent, the husband could also recover such sum as will be a fair compensation for the future diminished capacity to labor on the part of the wife. This instruction we think is correct and supported by authority. 6 Thomp. Neg. §§ 7341, 7342. It is impossible to lay down a rule by which the value of her services and the loss of the wife's society can be exactly measured in dollars and cents. All the judge can do is to direct the jury to allow such reasonable sum as will fairly compensate the husband therefor under all the circumstances of the case.

We have carefully examined all the exceptions in the record, although we comment only on such as we think proper. The case appears to us to have been well and fairly tried, and we find no reversible error in any of the rulings or instructions of the court.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

J. A. WILLOUGHBY, Receiver of Capitol National Bank, Plff. in Err.,
v.

FIDELITY & DEPOSIT COMPANY OF MARYLAND.

(16 Okla. 546, 85 Pac. 713.)

Fidelity bond—representations—authority.

In an action upon contract, the party seeking to recover cannot claim the benefits thereunder, and at the same time repudiate the burden. So, in an action against a surety company to recover on the bond of a defaulting bank president, the bond must be construed as a whole, and the plaintiff's right to recover must depend upon such a construction; and, where such bond is issued by the surety company and accepted by the bank, upon the faith of certain statements and representations in writing, made by the assistant cashier of the bank, relative to the conduct, duties, employment, and accounts of the defaulting bank president, and such statements so made by the said assistant cashier are, by the terms of said bond, made a part of the bond itself, the bond and statements together form the contract, and they must be construed together, and upon their joint construction, or upon their construction as a whole, must depend the rights and liabilities of the parties thereto; and where the bond is issued by the surety company and accepted by the bank upon the faith of the statements and representations so made by the assistant cashier, the receiver of the bank, later appointed, in an action on the bond, cannot be heard to repudiate or question the authority of the assistant cashier to bind the bank by his statements and representations concerning the conduct, duties, employment, and accounts of the defaulting bank president, and at the same time be allowed to recover on the bond procured on the strength of the statements and representations so made by the said assistant cashier.

Headnote by GILLETTE, J.

ERROR to the District Court for Logan County to review a judgment in defend-

Case Note.—Right of beneficiary in bond insuring fidelity of officer or employee to repudiate authority of person who made the representations in reliance upon which the bond was issued:—It would seem to be a well-established rule of law that the beneficiary of a bond guaranteeing the fidelity of an employee will be bound by any statement which induced the issuing of the bond, even if made by a third person who had no authority to make such statement for the beneficiary, if the statement induced the issuing of the bond, and is by the terms thereof made the basis of that instrument. Upon this proposition, the few authorities that can be found are in accord with WILLOUGHBY v. FIDELITY & D. Co.: and in the learned and well-reasoned opinion in that case nearly all of them are fully set forth. In addition to the cases there found, the two following add further support to its position.

In Issaquah Coal Co. v. United States Fidelity & G. Co. 61 C. C. A. 145, 126 Fed. 80, the plaintiff was held to be bound by a certificate of its auditor that the accounts of its assistant treasurer had been examined and found correct, and all moneys handled by him accounted for, which statement was made for the purpose of renewing a bond insuring the fidelity of the assistant treasurer. It appeared that the plaintiff's board of directors had, by resolution, instructed the general manager and the assistant treasurer, who with the auditor had their place of business in a different state from that in which the board met, to procure surety bonds at the expense of the company, and that they were so procured, that of the assistant treasurer being issued on a statement in the name of the company by the general manager as such. It further appeared that it was to obtain a subsequent renewal of the assistant treasurer's bond that the statement in question was made by the auditor. The court said that, while there was no evidence that the board selected the surety of the assistant treasurer, or that the auditor acted in the matter with their actual knowledge or approval, or that they ever knew before the commencement of the action that the renewals had been made upon certificates signed by the auditor, yet "they must have known from the terms of the original bond that it was issued in reliance upon a statement made on behalf of their corporation to the surety company, and that, in the ordinary course, renewals must also be based upon further similar statements." The court was also of the opinion that the board, by directing the general manager and the assistant treasurer to procure bonds at the expense of the company, thereby committed to those officers the matter of the procurement of the bonds, and that the plaintiff, upon receiving the policy in question, "had notice, from the terms thereof, that in its corporate capacity it had delivered to the insurer a statement in writing relative to the duties, responsibilities, and check to be used upon its employee in said position and other matters. It thereby became chargeable with notice of everything that the statement contained. Among the other matters set forth therein, was the representation that the accounts of the secretary and assistant treasurer had . . . been audited and found correct, and that . . . he was not in default. It must have known that, in the ordinary course of business, the renewals must necessarily have been based upon similar statements made in their behalf relative to the duties, responsibilities, and check to be used upon . . . [the assistant treasurer], and the condition of his accounts. It is true that the first statement was signed by the general manager, whereas the subsequent statements were signed by the auditor. But in each instance they were signed in the name and on behalf of the corporation. Having notice that the bond was issued in the first instance upon a statement made in its behalf, it became the duty of ant's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a fidelity insurance contract. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Flynn & Ames for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Lawrence & Huston and Dale & Bierer, for defendant in error:

Where the assured, in a policy of life insurance, warrants the truth of the answers made by him to questions in his application, compliance with such warranty is a condition of the validity of the contract of insurance.

Dwight v. Germania L. Ins. Co. 103 N. Y.

the corporation thereafter to inquire of and to know upon what statements the renewals were made."

And in Warren Deposit Bank v. Fidelity & D. Co. 116 Ky. 38, 74 S. W. 1111, the plaintiff bank was held to have assented to those conditions of the bond guaranteeing the fidelity of its cashier, which provided that the representations made by the president relative to the duties and accounts of the cashier should constitute part of the contract. In this case the statement was made on a printed form sent to the bank by the surety company and purported to be signed by the bank by its president. The court said: "While it may be true that, as a matter of law, answering questions such as those propounded to the president in this case, and making the representations therein contained, were not within either the actual or the apparent scope of the duties of that office, and that the president was not authorized expressly, either by the charter or by anything appearing upon the minutes of the proceedings of the board of directors, to make such representations on behalf of the bank, yet it does not follow from these premises that the president did not act in the bank's behalf in making them. There is no principle of the law of agency truer or more familiar than that, although an agent may act in fact without authority, express or implied, from his principal, his act may become binding upon the latter by its ratification. . . . It is not claimed, nor is it attempted to be shown, that the board of directors acted at all in that matter, so far as any proceeding by their body is concerned. The action of . . . [the president], then, was that which represented the bank in that transaction. If the bank would avail itself of the benefit of his actions, it must take them subject to his representations and statements that induced the execution of the contract by the surety. . . . If the board examined the bond at all, they are bound to have taken notice of these statements, which is enough to have reasonably put them upon inquiry as to the character of the statements therein referred to. But, whether they actually examined the bond or not, they must in all fairness and reason be held to have assented to its statements, when appellant elects to claim a recovery upon it. It manifestly would not do to impose upon one party to a contract an obligation in favor of another, which was made to depend upon a condition stated in the contract, and yet relieve the latter from the condition because he had not noticed it. Having accepted the result of its president's action in procuring the bond for it, and being required to take notice of all material statements and conditions contained in the bond, appellant is as much bound by these statements and the concurrent representations made by its president and referred to in the bond as if his action and statements had been expressly authorized by the most solemn and specific entry of record upon the minutes of the board of directors' book of proceedings."

Of course, if two or more officers or employees of the beneficiary of a fidelity bond conspire together to defraud such beneficiary, and one of them, upon a statement by the other, by which the issuing of such bond is induced, procures the bond as a means to that end, and there is no reference in the bond itself that it is based upon such statement, by which the beneficiary, upon accepting the bond, would be put upon inquiry, the rule would not be applicable. All these circumstances were presented in American Surety Co. v. Pauly, 170 U. S. 133, 40 L. ed. 977, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 552, upon which the plaintiff in the WILLOUGHBY CASE relied, also quite fully set forth in the opinion in that case; and it is to be noted that the bond was not obtained by the bank, but by the cashier, who paid the premium therefor, and who also, in order to obtain the bond, procured and proffered to the surety company the statement of the bank's president. Nor did the policy, by its terms, make any reference to the statement of the president. It was further shown that the board of directors of the bank had no knowledge of the issuing of the certificate by the president, and that they did not authorize the same. It also appeared that the president of the bank was in collusion with the cashier to loot the bank, and that the statements made by the former on behalf of the latter were but a step towards consummating that end. It was held that the issuance

Gillette, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case, the plaintiff, J. A. Willoughby, as receiver of the Capitol National Bank of Guthrie, sues the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland upon the bond of the defendant company guaranteeing the faithful discharge of the duties of Charles E. Billingsley, as president of the Capitol National Bank. A copy of the bond with all its indorsements is attached to and made a part of the plaintiff's petition. The bond provides, among other things: "Amount, $10,000.00. Annual premium, $40.00. Baltimore, Md. Whereas Chas. E. Billingsley, Guthrie, Ok., hereafter called the 'employee' has been appointed to the position of president, in the service of the Capitol National Bank, Guthrie, Oklahoma, hereafter called the 'employer,' and whereas, the employer has delivered to the Fidelity Deposit Company of Md., a corporation of the state of Maryland, hereafter called the 'company,' certain of such statements, not being within the scope and the ordinary duties of the president of a bank, was but the gratuitous commendation of one individual by another, and the bank was not bound thereby. This decision, of course, proceeds upon the self-evident proposition that, where an agent steps aside from the duty enjoined upon him to commit a fraud upon his principal, his representations and acts in that affair cannot be imputed to his principal.

Very similar to the Pauly Case in the facts presented is Sherman v. Harbin, 125 Iowa, 174, 100 N. W. 629, where it was held that an employer was not bound by a certificate furnished by its secretary to the surety on its president's bond that the books and accounts of the president had been audited and found correct. Here the bond did not purport to be based on this statement, nor was the statement made a part of the bond. It also appeared that it was no part of the secretary's duty to make such statement, that he in fact made it without the authority of the board of directors or its executive committee, and that he acted in this matter merely for the accommodation of the president, with whom he had joined in the improper use of the company's funds. The court reasoned that, "as what he did was not within the scope of his agency, the association was not chargeable with notice thereof, or bound thereby."

The same conclusion has been reached in a few cases, even in the absence of any fraudulent conspiracy against the beneficiary, where the statement relied upon by the surety as a defense was made without the authority and knowledge of the beneficiary, and no reference thereto is contained in the bond itself. Thus, in United States Fidelity & G. Co. v. Muir, 53 C. C. A. 56, 115 Fed. 264 (certiorari denied in 187 U. S. 648, 47 L. ed. 348, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 847), what the court considered the fundamental principle in the Pauly Case was held to be controlling, and the bank not bound by the statement by its president accompanying an application to a surety company by its cashier for an indemnity bond running to the bank, where it appeared that the statement was signed by the president entirely on his own motion, at the request of the cashier, and without any authority from the board of directors of the bank, who never heard of it until made a defense in the case; and such statement was not referred to in the bond nor made a part thereof.

And in Independent School District Hubbard, 110 Iowa, 58, 80 Am. St. Rep. 271, 81 N. W. 241, the school district was held not to be bound by a statement of the president of its board of directors, made in reply to an inquiry of the surety upon the bond of the treasurer of the school district, that that officer had settled some months before the issuing of the bond, and that at that time the funds were counted and found correct. The court deemed that this representation was no part of the duty of the president, and therefore must be regarded as his individual act and not binding on the school district. The opinion fails to show whether there was any reference in the bond to the president's statement, but it is fair to presume that there was not.

And in Perpetual Bldg. & L. Asso. v. United States Fidelity & G. Co. 118 Iowa, 729, 92 N. W. 686, it was held that the plaintiff was not bound by a statement made by its president to the surety upon its secretary's bond that the accounts of the secretary were correct in every respect, where it purported to be simply his statement to the best of his knowledge and belief. In this case it was urged that the plaintiff, in ratifying an unauthorized contract by its president, could not insist upon the contract and repudiate that unauthorized representation of its agent which to some extent constituted an inducement to the defendant. The court said: "The ready answer is that the certificate does not purport to be a statement of other than the president, and then only to the best of his knowledge and belief. He pretended to speak for no one but himself. Making the certificate was not within his duties as president, and the association is bound only in so far as the contract is based upon his individual assertions. As these were referred to in the bond it was doubtless accepted subject to them."

statements in writing relative to the employee, his conduct, duties, employment, and accounts, the manner of conducting the business of the employer, and other things connected with the issuance of this bond, which, together with any other statements in writing, hereafter made by the employer to the company relating to any such matters, do and shall constitute the basis and form part of this contract, or any continuation thereof; and shall be warranted; and it is hereby agreed, that any such statement, made in writing by the president, cashier, or any officer or director of the employer, shall be considered the statements of the employer within the meaning hereof. Now, therefore, in consideration of the sum of $40.00 paid as premium for the period from January 1, 1904, to January 1, 1905, at 12 o'clock noon, and upon the faith of said warranties of said employer as aforesaid, it is hereby agreed that, subject to the obligations imposed by this bond, on the employer, the performance of which shall be condition precedent to the right on the part of the employer to recover under this bond, the company shall, at the expiration of three months next after proof of a pecuniary loss as hereinafter mentioned has been given to the company, reimburse the employer to the extent of the sum of $10,000.00, and no further, for such pecuniary loss of money, securities, or other personal property, as the employer shall have sustained by any dishonest act or acts committed by the employee in the performance of the duties of the office or position in the service of the employer hereinbefore referred to, or of such other office or position as employee may be subsequently appointed to or called upon to fill by the employer, as such duties have been or may hereafter be stated in writing by the employer to the company, and occurring during the continuance of this bond, and discovered at any time within six months after the expiration or cancelation of this bond, or in case of the death, resignation, or removal of the employee prior to the expiration or cancelation of the bond, within six months after such death, resignation, or removal."

Then follow conditions of the bond that are not material in the consideration of this case. The defendant surety company answered admitting the giving of the bond, but denying liability, because, as it claimed, the bond was procured by false and fraudulent representations made by the Capitol National Bank to the defendant surety company, concerning the said Charles E. Billingsley, his conduct, duties, employment, and accounts. A copy of the letter of the defendant surety company to the Capitol National Bank, asking for information, together with such of the questions, answers, and statements made by R. S. Briggs, the assistant cashier, as are necessary for the consideration of this case are as follows:

Baltimore, December 5th, 1903.

To the Capitol National Bank,

Guthrie, O. T.:

An application has been made to this company to issue to you a Fidelity Bond for Mr. C. E. Billingsley, as president in your service at Guthrie, O. T., to the amount of $——. Before passing on the said application the company must have answers to the following questions:

Very respectfully yours,
Edwin Warfield,
President.

5. (a) Is he now (C. E. Billingsley) or has been from any cause indebted to the bank or its officers?

A. No.

(b) If so, give particulars, stating amount, how incurred, and how payment is secured.

Not answered.

It is agreed that the above answers shall be warranties, and shall constitute the basis and form part of the bond, or any continuation or continuations of the same, that may be issued by the Fidelity & Deposit-Company of Maryland to the undersigned upon the person above named; and it is agreed that the duties, powers, and remunerations of the employee and obligations of the employer as stated in the above warranty shall remain unchanged during the currency of this bond, or any continuation or continuations thereof.

Dated at Guthrie this 22d day of December, 1903. Capitol National Bank, by R. S. Briggs, Ass't Cashier, Official Capacity.

This must be returned to the home office, Baltimore, Md., before bond will be issued.

The reply is an unverified general denial, and a special denial of the authority of R. S. Briggs, the assistant cashier, to bind the bank by his answers to said questions, and by the agreement he undertook to make on behalf of the bank. Upon the trial of the cause it was shown by the plaintiff, and by the proper cross-examination of plaintiff's witnesses, that, notwithstanding the statements of the said R. S. Briggs, the assistant cashier, in answer to question 5a, that Mr. Billingsley was not indebted to the bank, he was at the time the statement was made indebted to the bank on his own note of $5,150, and his own overdraft of $35,693.24. The bond given by the defendant surety company and accepted by the bank expressly provided that the statements in writing relative to C. E. Billingsley, his conduct, duties, employment, and account, and other things connected with the issuance of the bond, should constitute the basis, and form a part of the contract, and should be warranted; and that any statements made in writing by any officer of the bank should be considered the statements of the bank; and in consideration of the sum of $40, and upon the faith of such warranties of the said bank, the $10,000 bond sued on herein was given by the surety company, and accepted by the bank. When the plaintiff rested, the defendant surety company demurred to the evidence upon the ground that the plaintiff had failed to prove facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant. The demurrer to the evidence was sustained, and the case dismissed at the cost of the plaintiff, and he brings it to this court claiming that the trial court erred in sustaining the demurrer.

In this court the plaintiff contends that whatever his rights might have proved to be upon a full and final hearing, the demurrer to the evidence was not well taken, and should not have been sustained, based as it was on the pleadings and plaintiff's evidence alone. Let us examine for a moment the issues and status of the case when plaintiff rested, and the demurrer was interposed by the defendant, and sustained by the court. A copy of the bond sued on was attached to and made a part of the plaintiff's petition, and was admitted by the defendant in its answer, so it was fully before the court. The questions and answers thereto, as made by the cashier, and the statements attached to them, were attached to and made a part of the defendant's answer, and, not being denied under oath under § 3986 of our statutes of 1893, were taken as true, and therefore were fully before the court. By the terms of the bond itself these questions and answers, and the statement attached thereto were made a part of the bond, and constituted the basis of the contract, and were stipulated to be warranties; and upon the faith of such warranties the bond was issued by the surety company, and accepted by the bank. The pleadings and evidence also disclosed that in December, 1903, application was made to the defendant surety company for this bond for C. E. Billingsley, as president of the Capitol National Bank; that the surety company, by its letter of December 5th, submitted certain questions to the bank to be answered by it; that on December 22, 1903, the questions were answered by R. S. Briggs, the assistant cashier of the bank, and he answered them falsely, knowing at the time that the answers were false; that on December 30, 1903, the defendant surety company issued its bond, and the bank accepted it, upon the express written condition contained in the body of the bond itself, that the statements, answers, and representations so made should constitute the basis, and form a part of the contract; and that the bond was issued by the surety company and accepted by the bank upon the faith of the said warranty and representations; that during the years covered by the life of the bond the doors of the bank were closed, and it was placed in the hands of a receiver, and later the receiver brought this action to recover from the surety company on the bond in question, claiming that the said C. E. Billingsley, the bonded president, had defaulted in a sum far in excess of the amount of the bond. In this condition of the case, we think the question was fairly presented upon the demurrer to the evidence as to whether or not a cause of action had been proved in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant. A careful examination of the record has convinced us that the plaintiff did not make out his case, and that the demurrer to the evidence was well taken and properly sustained. We shall base our conclusion upon but one of the grounds urged in the court below.

Fidelity and guaranty insurance is of comparatively modern origin, and has not had the consideration in the books that has been bestowed upon fire and life insurance. But while it is of but comparatively modern origin, it is nevertheless already a thoroughly established and legitimate line of insurance that has come to stay, and indeed is filling a most important part in the modern business world. From reason and analogy, however, it is plain that many of the principles underlying and governing fire and life insurance must apply to fidelity and guaranty insurance. It has long been the settled law in fire and life insurance that where statements and representations have been made by the insured as the basis for the insurance, and by the terms of the policy, issued and accepted, said statements are made a part of the policy itself, any material, false, and fraudulent statement made by the insured will avoid the policy. The reason for this rule is sound. A person unsound in body and mind, who falsely and knowingly represents himself to be sound physically in order to secure life insurance, and stipulates that his false representations shall be treated as warranties, and as part of the policy itself, should not be allowed to recover. The man seeking fire insurance, who falsely and knowingly represents his property to be free from encumbrance when it is encumbered for more than its value, and such false representations are made a part of the policy of insurance, should not be allowed to recover for a loss by fire, for reasons too apparent to admit of consideration here. In the case of Dwight v. Germania L. Ins. Co. 103 N. Y. 341, 57 Am. Rep. 729, 8 N. E. 654, the court says: Where the assured, in a policy of life insurance, warrants the truth of the answers made by him to questions in his application, compliance with such warranty is a condition of the validity of the contract of insurance; and it must be assumed that any substantial deviation from truth in such answers is material to the risk and renders the policy void. Also, see the following cases, and cases cited therein: Price v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. 17 Minn. 497, 10 Am. Rep. 166, Gil. 473; Jeffries v. Economical L. Ins. Co. 22 Wall. 47, 22 L. ed. 833.

We are not entirely without precedent in fidelity guaranty insurance cases. In the case of American Credit Indemnity Co. v. Carrollton Furniture Mfg. Co. 36 C. C. A. 671, 95 Fed. 111, this language is used: "When there is a distinct agreement that an application for insurance is a part of the contract, and the statements in the application are expressly declared to be warranties, they are to be treated as such, and not merely as representations, and must be strictly true, or the policy will not take effect." See also Hunt v. Fidelity & C. Co. 39 C. C. A. 496, 99 Fed. 242, and authorities there cited. In the Hunt case the court says: "The promissory statement, having been made part of the contract between the parties, by the terms both of the policy and the declaration, was, in effect, a warranty, which the assured was bound to fulfil in substance and according to its meaning. Jeffries v. Economical L. Ins. Co. 22 Wall. 53, 22 L. ed. 835; Ætna L. Ins. Co. v. France, 91 U. S. 513, 22 L. ed. 402; Brady v. United Life Ins. Asso. 9 C. C. A. 252, 20 U. S. App. 337, 60 Fed. 727; Missouri, K. & T. Trust Co. v. German Nat. Bank, 23 C. C. A. 65, 40 U. S. App. 710, 77 Fed. 117. It is quite immaterial that the statement is not called a warranty. It is a stipulation embodied in the contract by the words of the policy for the performance of future acts, and, as such, is an express warranty." We are aware that many cases may be found in the books where doubts arise as to whether the warranties made by the assured were untrue as made, or were made in good faith, and doubts yet remain of their untruth. In such cases a disputed question of fact arises for the jury to determine. A few courts have gone so far as to hold that 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the fact that the warranties when made were false is not enough, but that it must be further shown that they were also known to be false by the assured; but the great weight of authority holds that proof of the material falsity of the warranties defeats the right of recovery.

In the case at bar, however, we are not called on to make any fine distinction. The representations of the assistant cashier, which were contracted to be warranties, were that C. E. Billingsley, the defaulting president, was not indebted to the bank in any sum. These warranties were outrageously untrue, and were known to be untrue by the assistant cashier when he made them, as shown by his evidence. At the time he represented that said Billingsley did not owe the bank, he, Billingsley, was indebted to the bank on his own note of $5,151, and interest, and on his own overdraft in the sum of $35,693.34. Slight or immaterial errors may be conceded not to avoid the liability of the surety company, but, with such glaring misrepresentations as the above, the court need only to look to the face of the transaction to detect its bad faith, when in connection with the testimony of the assistant cashier that he knew of the above indebtedness of C. E. Billingsley, when he represented to the surety company that said Billingsley was not indebted to the bank at all. But we are not confined, in the case at bar, to the authorities of life and fire insurance alone, as many cases have arisen and have been passed on, not only by the state courts, but by the Supreme Court of the United States, two of which will later be considered in the discussion of the second question presented in this case. Guarantee Co. of N. A. v. Mechanics' Sav. Bank & T. Co. 183 U. S. 402, 46 L. ed. 253, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 124; Fidelity & D. Co. v. Courtney, 186 U. S. 342, 46 L. ed. 1193, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 833.

This leads us to the second point necessary to our consideration. It is claimed by the plaintiff in error that, even though it be true that wilful, false statements made by one seeking fidelity insurance, which are made the basis of and form part of the bond itself, may defeat the plaintiff's rights to recover, yet such a proposition can have no application to the case at bar, and cannot affect the rights of the plaintiff in this action, for the reason that the said Briggs, the assistant cashier, had no authority to make said statements, or to bind the bank in any way; and that, as he was only the assistant cashier, no presumption arises that he acted with authority, and his authority to act was not shown in the trial of the case. This bond was issued by the defendant surety company, and accepted by the bank upon the faith of the correctness of the statements, and said statements were made warranties and became a part of the bond itself, and so became and were a part of the contract sued on by the plaintiff. It is the well-settled law that a party seeking to recover upon a contract cannot claim the benefits arising therefrom, and at the same time repudiate its burdens. To allow the receiver of the bank, while suing on the contract, to question the authority of the assistant cashier to make the statements and misrepresentations which are a part of the contract sued on, would be to allow him to accept its benefits and reject its burdens. To secure the bond on which its receiver sues, the bank, by its assistant cashier, made the representations which form a part of the bond itself, and it does not lie in the mouth of the receiver, while suing on the bond, to repudiate the statements and warranties made by the assistant cashier upon which the bond was secured. The Supreme Court of the United States has said: "The information solicited was such as was proper to be asked of and communicated by the bank; and, as the renewal was presumably made upon the faith of the statements contained in the certificate, the bank ought not to be heard, while seeking to obtain the benefits of the stipulation agreed to be performed by the surety, to deny the authority of its officer to make the representations which induced the surety to again bind itself to be answerable for the faithful performance by McKnight of the duties of his employment." Fidelity & D. Co. v. Courtney, supra; Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Keokuk & H. Bridge Co. 131 U. S. 371, 33 L. ed. 157, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 770.

The plaintiff in error lays great stress upon the case of American Surety Co. v. Pauly, 170 U. S. 134, 42 L. ed. 977, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 552. That was a case wherein George N. O'Brien, as cashier of the California National Bank, sought and secured an indemnity bond from the surety company in the sum of $15,000. In his negotiations for this bond he transmitted to the surety company a strong letter of recommendation from one J. W. Collins, the president of said bank. Collins also secured from said surety company a $25,000 bond for himself. During the life of these bonds O'Brien and Collins, acting together, wrecked the bank, and its doors were closed. The surety company refused payment, and suit was brought against it. It was contended that the president of the bank had made false representations concerning O'Brien, his conduct, his character, accounts, and integrity, in order to enable O'Brien to secure the bond, and that the receiver of the bank should not be allowed to recover on the bond secured by the fraud of the president; but the court held the surety company liable, and, upon the authority in that case, the plaintiff in error maintains that the surety company in this case should also be held liable. In that case the court said: "None of the cases cited embrace the present one. In the first place the procuring of a bond for O'Brien in order that he might become qualified to act as cashier was no part of the business of the bank, nor within the scope of any duty imposed upon Collins as president of the bank. It was the business of O'Brien to obtain and present an acceptable bond. And it was for the bank, by its constituted authorities, to accept or reject the bond so presented. The bank did not authorize Collins to give, nor was it aware that he gave, nor was he entitled by virtue of his office as president to sign, any certificate as to the efficiency, fidelity, or integrity of O'Brien. No relations existed between the bank and the surety company until O'Brien presented to the former the bond in suit. What, therefore, Collins assumed in his capacity as president to certify as to O'Brien's fidelity and integrity was not in the course of the business of the bank, nor within any authority he possessed. He could not create such authority by simply assuming to have it."

It will be noted that the court here decides that the recommendation of the president of the bank was not authorized by the bank itself, and that, being outside of the scope of the duties and authority of the president, the recommendation is held not to be that of the bank, and hence not binding upon the bank. But it will also be noted that the court says that no relationship existed between the bank and the surety company until O'Brien presented to the bank the bond in suit. Under such circumstances we think the conclusion of the court entirely in accord with the great weight of authorities; and, were the facts in the case at bar in accord with those in the Pauly Case, we would regard it as a case in point and controlling. But in the case now under consideration it is not true that no relations existed between the bank and the surety company until C. E. Billingsley presented his bond to the bank. On the other hand, application having been made to the surety company for a bond, the surety company, on December 5, 1903, wrote to the bank the letter of inquiry which we have hereinbefore set forth. The letter of inquiry, it will be noted, was addressed to the bank, and not to R. S. Briggs, the assistant cashier. The assistant cashier, on December 22, 1903, answered the questions and falsely stated that

C. E. Billingsley was not indebted to the bank in any sum. He also signed the agreement following the questions, and a part of the same document, agreeing that the answers to the questions should be warranties and constitute the basis and form a part of the bond to be issued by the surety company. All this occurred prior to the issuance of the bond, while in the Pauly Case no letter of inquiry was addressed to the bank, and it was not agreed that the statements of the president upon which the bond was obtained should constitute warranties and be the basis for the bond. In short, no relations existed between the bank and the surety company until O'Brien presented his bond to the bank. When the bond of C. E. Billingsley, in the case at bar, was later issued on the 30th day of December, 1903, it expressly provided that, in consideration of the sum of $40. and upon the faith of the warranties of the said bank (referring to the warranty signed by R. S. Briggs, cashier), the bond was issued. Not only, then, was the bond issued on the faith of the correctness of the answers and statements of the assistant cashier, but it was also accepted by the bank upon the faith of the correctness of said statements. We think that these facts take this case entirely outside of the rule laid down in the Pauly Case.

Nor are we alone in this conclusion, for the question has been twice before the Supreme Court of the United States in more recent cases than the Pauly Case, and in these subsequent cases that case has been distinguished to such an extent that it cannot, as we have heretofore said, fairly be regarded as a case applying here. In the case of Guarantee Co. of N. A. v. Mechanics' Sav. Bank & T. Co. 183 U. S. 402, 46 L. ed. 253, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 124, Chief Justice Fuller uses this language: "It also results that there can be no recovery at all on the cashier's bond. If the bank had observed the stipulation in the teller's bond, to which we have referred, it is obvious that there would have been no cashier's bond, and the question would not have arisen. But this it did not do, and the bond was given. The bond provided that the company covenanted with the bank, in reliance on the statement and declaration of the president on behalf of the bank, and on the bank's strict observance of the contract, that any misstatement of a material fact in the declaration should invalidate the bond; . . . that any written answers or statements made by or on behalf of said employer in regard to, or in connection with, the conduct, duties, accounts, or methods of supervision of the said employee, delivered to the company either prior to the issue of this bond or to any renewal thereof, or at any time during its currency, shall be held to be a warranty thereof, and form a basis of this guaranty or of its continuance. . . . The statements were required to be, and were, made on behalf of the bank, and the president acted for the bank in so doing; and the bonds were procured by the bank, and the bank paid the premiums. There can be no doubt that the bank was responsible for the representations of its cashier in the one instance, and its president in the other, in procuring these contracts of indemnity. The representations made in the declaration on which the cashier's bond was issued were clearly misrepresentations. . . . In Pauly's Case, the president and the cashier were confederates in the dishonesty of the cashier for the purpose of defrauding the bank; and also it was held no part of the duties of the president, under the circumstances there disclosed, to certify to the integrity of the cashier, as he did."

In the still later case of Fidelity & D. Co. v. Courtney, 186 U. S. 342, 46 L. ed. 1193, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 833, Justice White says: "In Guarantee Co. of N. A. v. Mechanics' Sav. Bank & T. Co. supra, this court recognize as binding upon the bank a certificate given by one of its officers, embodying replies to questions asked by the guaranty company respecting one of the employees of the bank, although no proof was introduced that special authority had been conferred upon the officer to make the certificate. Nor does the ruling in American Surety Co. v. Pauly, 170 U. S. 156, 42 L. ed. 977, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 552, warrant the claim that it is an authority against the admissibility of the certificate here in question. In the bond considered in the Pauly Case it was not agreed that the statement of the president, upon which the bond was obtained, should be the basis of the bond. The answers made by the person who was president of the bank to the interrogatories of the surety company were but mere commendations by one individual of another individual, at a time when, as said by the court, 'no relations existed between the bank and the surety company.' Again, in the Pauly Case, no letter of inquiry was addressed to the bank, unlike the practice pursued with respect to the renewal here in controversy, and the letter whose contents in the Pauly Case was claimed to be binding on the bank was written by one who was not charged with the duty of conducting the correspondence of the bank." Entertaining the views that we do, we think that the plaintiff clearly failed to establish facts sufficient to entitle him to recover, and that the demurrer to the evidence was well taken and properly sustained. The conclusions here reached make it unnecessary to pass upon other questions presented in briefs of counsel.

The judgment of the court below will be affirmed.

All the Justices concur, except Pancoast, J., who sat in the trial of cause in the court below, and Burford, Ch. J., who declined to take any part in said cause for the reason that he is a creditor of said insolvent bank.

STATE OF UTAH, Resp't.,
v.

ALBERT McBRIDE, Appt.

(30 Utah, 422, 85 Pac. 440.)

Handwriting—testimony by recipient of letter.

One who claims to have received letters from another, but who has never seen him write and is not an expert in handwriting, is not competent to testify that they were written by him, although she claims that he acknowledged that he wrote two of them, where that fact is disputed, so that there is no undisputed writing in evidence to form the basis of comparison.

Case Note.—Competency of nonexpert to testify as to authorship of writings when he bases his opinion upon letters purporting to come from the person whose handwriting is in question:—The original, and at first the only recognized, method of proving handwriting, was by the testimony of a witness who had seen the person write. But this rule was later broadened so as to permit other methods of proof, one of the most common of which is by means of witnesses who have carried on correspondence with the person whose writing is in dispute.

Proof of this kind was apparently allowed as early as 1722 in Layer's Case, 16 How. St. Tr. 93, and in 1781 in the case of Gould v. Jones, 1 W. Bl. 384, Bull. N. P. 236; and Lord Raymond, in deciding a similar point in Ferrers v. Shirley (1730) Fitzg. 195, said: "It is not necessary in all cases that the witness have seen the person write to whose hand he swears; for where there has been a fixed correspondence by letters, . . . that will entitle a witness to swear to that person's hand, though he never saw him write."

And it is now well established that where the parties have carried on a fixed business correspondence, the amount and length of which allow no question of the good faith and identity of the person with whom the Bartch, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was prosecuted for and convicted of the offense of carnally knowing a female over the age of thirteen and under the age of eighteen years, and was sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary. He thereupon appealed to this court. At the trial the prosecuting witness, so far as material here, testified, in substance, that she first met the defendant in March, 1904; that at that time she had a conversation with him, went buggy riding with him, and that when they returned he walked home with her; that she saw him again two days later. She says she saw him next at the postoffice April 1st; met him at the Johnston hotel, and saw him again at the same hotel on April 29th, between 8 and 9 o'clock in the evening; and that she walked with him to the depot, then back to the hotel and up to his room; that he told her his been expressly acknowledged by the correspondent, some act on his part from which an acknowledgment may be inferred is generally held necessary to stamp the transaction with sufficient certainty and render the witness competent. The courts have differed somewhat as to the degree of proof necessary to establish the genuineness of the letters in such case. And a greater degree of proof is required, apparently, in the case of letters not pertaining to business.

A letter purporting to come from one, and signed in his name, will not furnish a sufficient basis of knowledge to permit the one who received such letter to give an opinion respecting the genuineness of the signature of the putative writer to another instrument, unless the one whose name was signed to the letter in some manner subsequently acknowledged the signature to be his. A course of correspondence may amount to such acknowledgment, but a single letter or message will not, in the absence of further communication of some character. Talbott v. Hedge, 5 Ind. App. 555, 32 N. E. 788.

The mere receipt of letters purporting to be from a person never seen, with whom no subsequent relations existed which were based upon them as genuine, is held not sufficient to make the recipient competent to testify thereto. Pinkham v. Cockell, 77 Mich. 265, 43 N. W. 921.

And a witness who has received letters signed in the name of a person whose signature is disputed, and has answered one of them, but has received no reply to the answer, has been held not to have sufficient knowledge of the other's handwriting to be competent to prove his signature. Webb v. Mauro, Morris (Iowa) 329.

So, a witness who had never seen the person whose signature is in question write, but stated that he had once received a letter purporting to be written by him, and, in consequence of its abusive character, he paid much attention to the handwriting, was held incompetent, although a third person swore that the defendant had told him that he had written the letter addressed to the witness. Pope v. Askew, 23 N. C. (1 Ired. L.) 16, 35 Am. Dec. 729.

Where, in case of a dispute as to the indorsements on certain bills of exchange, a witness swore that he had written letters to the indorsers in relation to the bills, at the request of a third person, in the latter's name, and that later such third person showed him what he said were answers to those letters, the witness was held not to be sufficiently acquainted with the handwriting of the indorsers to swear to their signatures. Desbrow v. Farrow, 3 Rich. L. 382. The court said that, if the witness had stated that he knew the signatures of the letters to be genuine, by having afterwards conversed with the signers about the letters, then his evidence would have been sufficient; but that he knew nothing of the handwriting of the parties in question, except that the third person had shown him letters purporting to have been written by them, and that he had no knowledge that they had written the letters, except the word of such third person and the intrinsic evidence the letters themselves bore, with the postmark, the time of mailing them, and the contents.

And, while a person who has had business correspondence with another, acted upon by both parties, is competent to testify as to the handwriting of his correspondent, although he may never have seen him write, where the letters have no relation to business transactions, but are letters of mere friendly or polite intercourse, some acknowledgment of the handwriting in some way other than the letters themselves on the part of the supposed writer must be shown. Flowers v. Fletcher, 40 W. Va. 103, 20 S. E. 870. In this case the testimony of a witness that he had known the person in question for fourteen years, corresponded with her about fourteen years before, and received about a dozen letters in answer to his own, with her name signed to them, was held not to make a sufficient foundation for the admission of his opinion.

But knowledge of handwriting acquired through correspondence carried on between name was Jack McAuliffe; that on both occasions, April 1st and 29th, they had sexual intercourse; and that he accomplished his designs through force and persuasion. She identified four letters, exhibits C, D, E, and F, signed "Jack McAuliffe," as letters she had received, and claimed he had talked to her about two of them, but she never saw him write. The defendant, testifying in his own behalf, denied the truth of all the material statements of the prosecuting witness. He testified that he never knew her until he saw her in the court room, after this prosecution had been instituted; that he never had any association with her, and never wrote to her either over his own signature or that of Jack McAuliffe; that he did not write the letters which were introduced in evidence, and never admitted to the prosecuting witness that he had written them; and that he "never had anything to do with her, or say to her, in any relation whatever." In his testimony he also gave an account of his whereabouts during the evening of April 29th, the time when, it was charged, he committed the offense, and in this he is corroborated by several witnesses. As to the commission of the act, on either occasion, the statements of the prosecuting witness are not corroborated by any other direct evidence.

The principal question presented on this appeal has arisen out of the introduction in evidence of the letters referred to above. Counsel for the prosecution, upon offering in evidence those letters, interrogated the both persons in relation to the business of the company in which both were engaged is held sufficient to bring the case within the rule that, if a witness has received letters on subjects of business, which can be proved to have been written by a particular person, or letters of such a nature as makes it probable that they were written by the hand from which they profess to come, he may be permitted to speak of that person's handwriting. Southern Exp. Co. v. Thornton, 41 Miss. 216.

So, where a witness testifying to the handwriting of an indorser on a note, in an action by the indorsee against the maker, had written letters to the indorser and received replies on which both parties had acted, this rendered him competent to testify as a witness concerning the indorser's handwriting. Chaffee v. Taylor, 3 Allen, 598.

And the opinion of a witness who had mailed one or more letters to the person whose signature was in question, directed to his name and place of residence, and received replies purporting to come from that place, and to be signed by him, was held prima facie, and, in the absence of any denial of the authenticity of the letter in question, sufficient to establish the genuineness of the signature. Campbell v. Woodstock Iron Co. 83 Ala. 351, 3 So. 369.

The manager of a messenger company was held competent to testify in regard to the authenticity of disputed signatures, where he said that he knew the signatures of the parties by means of correspondence, and having seen their signatures upon telegrams and upon the tickets of the company, returned to the office by messenger boys, but admitted that he had never seen either of the parties write. Tyler v. Mutual Dist. Messenger Co. 17 App. D. C. 92.

So, where witnesses testified that they had corresponded with the persons purporting to have written a disputed letter, and had put money into their hands, and had drawn the money from them; and that the letter they produced was, they believed, in the same handwriting,—the letter was held 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

sufficiently proved. Reid v. Hodgson, 1 Cranch, C. C. 491, Fed. Cas. No. 11,667.

And knowledge of the handwriting of a person whose signature is disputed, derived from the fact that the witness has addressed a personal letter and received an answer to it, though not from the postoffice to which the first letter was sent, when followed by other correspondence and acted upon by that person, is held sufficient proof to support that person's testimony. Violet v. Rose, 39 Neb. 660, 58 N. W. 216.

A witness who had never seen the defendant, but had corresponded with a Samuel Fry, of Plymouth Dock, and had so addressed his letters, and had received answers from him, was held competent to prove his handwriting upon another witness swearing that the defendant, Samuel Fry, lived at Plymouth Dock, and that there was no other person of that name living at Plymouth Dock within his knowledge; this being held at least evidence for the jury to consider whether the letters alluded to by the witness were not written by the defendant. Harrington v. Fry, Ryan & M. 90, 9 J. B. Moore, 344, 2 Bing. 179, 1 Car. & P. 289, 3 L. J. C. P. 244.

And when a witness called to prove handwriting has declared as the ground of her belief and the cause of her knowledge the receipt of certain letters, proof as to the genuineness of those letters by the opinion of another witness is not objectionable upon the ground of raising a collateral issue, the proof being competent in corroboration of the first witness. Thomas v. State, 103 Ind. 419, 2 N. E. 808.

Williams, J., in Doe ex dem. Mudd v. Suckermore, 5 Ad. & El. 727, in discussing the rule that letters "must be acted upon" in order to form the basis of an opinion as to the handwriting of the author, says that if, by this expression, it be meant to imply that any business must be transacted, or in any sense of the word an act done, the observation is without foundation, for nothing of the sort is necessary; that anything from which the identity of the writer is established may suffice. And Patteson, J., in prosecuting witness as follows: "Referring again to this letter marked state's exhibit C, I will ask you as to whose handwriting this is." To this the defense objected upon the ground that no foundation had been laid, it not having been shown that the witness was competent; that it had not been shown that she knew the defendant's handwriting; nor that she was an expert; nor that she had ever seen him write. The objection was overruled, and the witness answered that it was his handwriting. Practically the same proceedings were had respecting each of the other letters. It is contended, in behalf of the appellant, that the court erred in permitting the witness to thus testify, and we are of the opinion that this contention is well founded. Her own evidence showed her incompetency to testify on the subject of his handwriting, for she admitted that she never saw him write, and that she was not an expert on handwriting. It is true that, as to two of the letters, she claimed he acknowledged to her that he wrote them or sent them, but this he positively denied, and there was nothing to corroborate her statement. To identify the several letters as those of the accused, the prosecution called the witness Brewerton, who claimed to know the defendant's handwriting, but the witness said: "I couldn't say positively that McBride wrote either the same case, says that the knowledge may have been acquired by the witness having seen letters or other documents professing to be the handwriting of the party, and having afterwards communicated personally with the party upon the contents of those letters or documents, or having otherwise acted upon them by written answers producing further correspondence, or acquiescence by the party on some matter to which they relate, or by the witness transacting with the party some business to which they relate, or by any other mode of communication between the party and the witness which in the ordinary course of the transactions of life induces a reasonable presumption that the letters or documents were the handwriting of the party.

And in Starkie on Evidence, 7th Am. ed. p. 514, footnote m, reference is made to the case of Doe v. Wallinger, cor. Holroyd, J., Dorchester Spring Assizes (1819), which is said to have held that handwriting is well proved by a witness who has received letters from the party in answer to letters written to him by the witness, although the latter has never done any act in consequence of the receipt of such letters.

It has also been held that the act following the receipt of letters from the person in question, from which their genuineness is to be assumed, may be the act of the witness, if such that its result is an implied acquiescence by the writer. Thus, in Tharpee v. Gisburne, 2 Car. & P. 21, the defendant's attorney, called to prove a signature to a paper, said that he had never seen the defendant write, but that he believed the instrument to be in his handwriting from having received letters from him upon which he, the witness, had acted; and it was held that this was quite sufficient for a witness to ground a belief upon, which was all that was required.

And in Rex v. Slaney, 5 Car. & P. 213, this case was followed on identical facts.

The decision in Tharpee v. Gisburne, however, is criticized in Cunningham v. Hudson River Bank, 21 Wend. 537, where the court says that the fact that the specimens of writing upon which the witness founds his 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

opinion are genuine must be proved; that it is not enough that they purport to come from the person whose handwriting is in question, and that, although when letters are directed to a particular person on business, and answers are received in due course, a fair inference arises that the answers were written by the person from whom they purport to come, yet in some way the fact that the specimens are genuine must be satisfactorily proved; that the fact that the recipient of the letters had acted upon them, standing alone, was of no importance, although it might be of value in a chain of circumstantial evidence; that it had no tendency to prove the letters genuine, but only proved, and that merely by inference, that the witness believed them authentic. The court, however, added that the acts done in pursuance of the letters might be followed by such acts of approval or acknowledgment on the part of the supposed author as could only be accounted for on the supposition that he was in truth the writer of the letters, and that there could be no doubt that in this way, as well as by direct admission, the fact of authenticity might be satisfactorily established.

Letters forming one side of a correspondence may enable others than the parties to whom they are written to express an opinion as to the handwriting of the persons writing them.

Thus, the opinion of a clerk of persons who had had long correspondence with one whose writing was in question, upon which correspondence both parties had acted, was held competent evidence. Reid v. Hodgson, 1 Cranch, C. C. 491, Fed. Cas. No. 11,667; Titford v. Knott, 2 Johns. Cas. 211; Reyburn v. Belotti, 10 Mo. 597; Doe ex dem. Mudd v. Suckermore, 5 Ad. & El. 740, dictum.

But a witness who had merely read certain letters which came to a business house at which he was clerk, purporting to have been written by the person whose signature was in question, and not being in reply to any letters which the witness had written or seen written, although his employers recognized them as genuine, and who does not one of those letters, because I don't know. Didn't see him write them, and don't know that he wrote them. My knowledge of his handwriting is so vague that the slightest little circumstance that I think he might not have been there would have a tendency to raise a serious doubt about whether he wrote a certain letter that is exhibited to me." In the opinions of other witnesses, familiar with the accused's handwriting, none of the letters were written by him.

To say the least, in view of such evidence, the authenticity of even the two letters above referred to, and which she claimed he acknowledged he had written, was in serious doubt, and hence could not become the basis of comparison which was her only means of determining the genuineness of the other two; for there was no other paper in evidence, nor did the witness, so far as appears, even have in her possession any instrument of any kind from the accused, the genuineness of which was not in dispute. The law is well settled that for the admission of such evidence it is essential that the authenticity of the paper, which becomes the standard of comparison, be established by positive proof, and not left in uncertainty and doubt. Therefore, "before a witness will be permitted to testify as to a person's handwriting from knowledge derived from seeing papers purporting to have been writ-state that he knows the hand, but says that from having read the letters he thinks the signature genuine, is held not to have such knowledge as complied with Ga. Code, § 3786, providing that one who testifies that he knows the hand in question is competent. Bruce v. Crews, 39 Ga. 544, 99 Am. Dec. 467. The court said that clearly, in order to be able to know handwriting, so as to be able to testify on the subject, the witness must have seen the party write, or have read papers expressly or by implication acknowledged by the party to be genuine.

For a full review of all the cases on the general question of competency of witnesses to handwriting, see note in 63 L.R.A. 963.

Since the competency of the witness in this class of cases depends upon the authenticity of the letters upon which he bases his opinion, decisions as to the sufficiency of letters received through the mails and purporting to come from a particular person as standards of comparison for use by experts in testifying to such person's handwriting are relevant to the subject of this note. The following cases are of that nature:

In order to establish a letter as a standard for comparison with a disputed signature, proof by a witness that he had received it through the mail, and that, as a result of receiving it, he presumed he had a conversation with the person purporting to have written it, about having written it, was held insufficient. Wilson v. Irish, 62 Iowa, 260, 17 N. W. 511.

So, evidence that a letter came through the mail, purporting to be from the person whose signature was in dispute, and believed to be such, was held not sufficient to establish it as a standard. Phillips v. State, 6 Tex. App. 364.

And, on an issue as to the genuineness of a will, letters purporting to be signed by the testator and addressed to a witness, which he testified that he received through the mail, and believed to have been written by him, some of which, specifying them, he testified that he received in answer to letters which he had written to the testator, and that they contained answers to inquiries in his letters, were held not established 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

by such clear and undoubted proof as to be admissible as standards of the handwriting of the testator for comparison with the will. McKeone v. Barnes, 108 Mass. 344.

Again, proof, by a witness who had no knowledge of the handwriting of the person whose handwriting was in question, that he had forwarded to that person, unsigned, a paper which was offered as a standard at the trial and purported to be signed by that person, and that it was returned to the witness signed, in a letter from a third person, was held insufficient to warrant its admission as a test paper. Brant v. Dennison, 1 Sadler (Pa.) 62, 5 Atl. 869.

And proof that a letter offered as a standard had been received by mail in reply to a letter sent by mail to the address of the person whose signature was disputed, and that it was signed in the name of such person, was held not such proof as to justify its use as a standard. State v. Horn, 43 Vt. 20.

But proof that a letter was received through the mail by a witness from the person whose handwriting is in question, and that the witness afterwards saw that person and talked to her about having written a letter to him, was held to establish it as a standard for comparison with the disputed writing. Manning v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 180, 39 S. W. 118.

So proof that a letter, offered as a standard of comparison and signed in the name of the person whose writing was in dispute, was the only letter received by the witness from such person, and that it was received in reply to a postal card written by the witness to a third person; together with proof by a second witness that the person purporting to have written it stated to him that he wrote a letter to the person who received it at the place where it was received,—was held to establish it as a basis for comparison. Walker v. State, 14 Tex. App. 609.

For a further discussion as to competency of handwritings as standards for comparison, see note in 63 L.R.A. 427.

ten by him, it must be clearly shown that such papers were in his handwriting." 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 257. "It is a prerequisite," says Mr. Wharton, "to the admission of such proof that the writings from which the witness has drawn his knowledge should be genuine. It will not be enough that the witness obtains his knowledge from letters whose genuineness is in dispute." Wharton, Crim. Ev. § 552. Mr. Rogers, in his work on Expert Testimony (§ 138), says: "The general rule, moreover, is that the proof of the genuineness of the instrument thus offered must be positive. It should be proved either by the admission of the party when the standard is not offered by himself, or else by the testimony of persons who testify directly and positively to having seen the party write the paper." In Martin v. Maguire, 7 Gray, 177, it was said: "The mode of proving the genuineness of the paper in controversy, by comparison merely with other documents, has often been questioned elsewhere, though with us it is always allowed. But the paper with which the comparison is to be made must be unquestionably a genuine paper, and that must be shown beyond a doubt." This court, in Tucker v. Kellogg, 8 Utah, 11, 28 Pac. 870, said: "The common law excludes a comparison of handwriting as proof of signature. But to the general rule there is this exception: That, if a paper admitted to be in the handwriting of the party, or to have been subscribed by him, is in evidence for some other purpose in the case, the signature or paper in question may be compared by the jury, with or without the aid of experts. The principal reasons given for the exclusion of evidence by comparison of handwriting are (1) the danger of fraud in the selection of specimens for comparison and (2) if admitted, their genuineness may be contested, and collateral issues introduced into the trial. These reasons do not apply against the introduction of writings conceded by the parties to be genuine as specimens, because, if either party entertains a suspicion that the writing offered is spurious, he will not concede it to be genuine; and if all the parties concede the specimen to be genuine, no collateral issue can arise upon it. Therefore, we think there should also be an exception to the general rule excluding evidence by comparison, admitting writings as specimens for comparison conceded by the parties to be genuine." McKeone v. Barnes, 108 Mass. 344; Cochran v. Butterfield, 18 N. H. 115, 45 Am. Dec. 383; Pavey v. Pavey, 30 Ohio St. 600; National Union Bank v. Marsh, 46 Vt. 443; Gibson v. Trowbridge Furniture Co. 96 Ala. 357, 11 So. 385; Cohen v. Teller, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

93 Pa. 123; Hyde v. Woolfolk, 1 Iowa, 159; Cunningham v. Hudson River Bank, 21 Wend. 557; Calkins v. State, 14 Ohio St. 222; Sartor v. Bolinger, 59 Tex. 411; Strother v. Lucas, 6 Pet. 763, 8 L. ed. 573.

In the case at bar, as we have seen, the genuineness of all the letters was in dispute; and, therefore, while it may be conceded that, in view of the testimony of the prosecuting witness, that they had been received by her, and that two of them had been the subject of conversation between her and the accused, the prosecution had a right to have the letters themselves, or at least the two which had formed such subject, admitted in evidence and read to the jury, it was not entitled to the admission of the testimony in question. Under the conflicting evidence it was the province of the jury to consider the letters in determining the question of the defendant's guilt or innocence, and to give them such weight, in connection with all the other evidence, as the jury, in its judgment, deemed them entitled to receive; but the testimony in question ought to have been excluded. Considering all the evidence, and the circumstances disclosed, with the fact that there was no direct testimony as to the commission of the act alleged as constituting the offense charged, except that of the prosecuting witness, we are unable to say that the admission of the testimony in question was not prejudicial to the rights of the accused. Having reached such conclusion, it is not deemed important to discuss any other question presented. The judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to grant a new trial.

It is so ordered.

McCarty, J., concurs.

Straup, J., dissenting:

I dissent. The prosecutrix testified that the defendant told her his name was Jack McAuliffe, and that she became acquainted with and knew him by that name; that he wrote and sent to her some seven different letters under such name. They were posted, and received by her in the regular course of mail. It was shown that the defendant was at the various places where, and at the times when, the letters bore their postmarks. Four of these letters, "C, D, E, and F," she produced at the trial. The first letter referred to a ring sent to her under a separate cover. After receiving the letter and the ring, she met the defendant, and he asked her if she had received the letter signed by the name of Jack McAuliffe, and the ring therein referred to. Upon her replying that she had, he told her that he wrote the letter, and sent the ring. Another letter referred to some handkerchiefs. After receiving that letter she had a conversation with him about it and the handkerchiefs, in which he told her that he wrote the letter, and gave the handkerchiefs, therein referred to, to her. The four letters were all identified by the witness as having been received by her from the defendant in the course of mail.

She then was asked by the state:

Q. Do you know his handwriting?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Referring again to this letter marked "C," I will ask you whose handwriting this is.

Here counsel for the defendant made the statement that the prosecution was qualifying the witness as an expert, and he desired to examine her on the voir dire.

He then asked her:

Q. You have studied handwriting a great deal?

A. I have studied it enough so I can tell his handwriting in that letter there.

Q. You have seen him write, have you?

A. No, sir.

Q. Do you pretend to be an expert on handwriting? You never saw him write?

A. He acknowledged to me that he wrote those letters.

Q. You say it is his handwriting; you pretend to be an expert on handwriting, do you?

A. No, sir.

Defendant's counsel: I object to her saying whose handwriting this is. She has not qualified as an expert. She hasn't seen him write, either.

The State: Did he acknowledge to you having written this letter?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you have any conversation with him about other letters that he had written to you?

A. Yes, sir. He asked me if I had received his letters during that time, and signed Jack McAuliffe, and I told him I had.

Q. Do you know the defendant's handwriting?

A. That is his handwriting. [Referring to exhibit C.] The signature is his handwriting.

Q. I call your attention to exhibit D, and ask you if you know the handwriting, the signature, and also the address?

A. Yes. It is McBride, the defendant's.

In like manner she testified concerning exhibits E and F, of course, all over the defendant's objection as heretofore set forth. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

She also testified that she had a conversation with the defendant about exhibit D, wherein she asked him why the letter was not stamped at American Fork, and he told her because it was mailed on the train.

The witness Brewerton testified that he had been acquainted with the defendant for more than a year, during which time he and the defendant both worked for the same wholesale house at Salt Lake City; that the defendant was a traveling salesman for the house; that the witness checked the defendant's orders, which were two or three a week and sometimes more; and that he also helped to fill some of them; and that at several times when the defendant was making out his expense account, the witness saw him write.

Then, on the part of the state, he was further interrogated:

Q. Now, I will ask you, Do you know the handwriting of McBride?

A. Yes, sir; I think I can recognize it all right.

Here defendant's counsel interrogated the witness on the voir dire:

Q. You say you know the handwriting of Mr. McBride?

A. Yes.

Q. Now do you know it from having frequently seen him write, or from claiming to be an expert on handwriting?

A. I know it more so by the orders that have come in.

Q. What do you have to do with his orders that come in; what is your business in relation to them?

A. I have filled some of them, but my real business with them was to check off the orders.

Q. In doing that, did you pay particular attention to the handwriting for any reason, or just take a casual glance at it?

A. Well, just by the way, I say, I don't know that I studied it, just by seeing them come in.

Q. You know his signature, do you?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You can't be mistaken as to that?

A. I don't think I can. No sir.

Q. Your familiarity goes to that extent that you think you know his handwriting and you know his signature?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You don't claim to be an expert?

A. No, sir.

The witness was then again interrogated by the state, and was shown the letters in question, and was asked if he knew whose handwriting they were, and he said that he did; and stated positively that they were in the handwriting of the defendant, except exhibit F, of which the witness said: "I am not sure but that it looked like the defendant's handwriting, and I should say that it was his handwriting." On cross-examination he said that he had no doubt about the letter being in the handwriting of the defendant, unless two persons could write so much alike.

Q. If one were trying to imitate, they might write a great deal alike, mightn't they?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You won't say, will you, without some kind of qualification, that McBride wrote either one of those letters?

Here considerable discussion followed between counsel, in which counsel for the defendant insisted that the most that could be claimed for the testimony of the witness was that it is his opinion merely that the writing is the defendant's.

The witness was then asked by the defendant's counsel:

Q. You wouldn't say, would you, positively, that McBride wrote either one of those letters?

A. Well, I couldn't say positively because I don't know.

Q. Well, that's what I am asking, and now you have answered.

A. As near as I know.

Q. Well, as near as you know. You didn't see him write them?

A. No, sir.

Q. You don't know that he wrote them, do you?

A. No, sir.

The witness was then asked why he hesitated about exhibit F, dated July 1st. He answered that the last day of July (he probably meant June) was pay day, and that one or two days after pay day he and the defendant took dinner together at Salt Lake City, and for that reason there might be a question as to whether the defendant was at the place where the letter purports to have been written, on July 1st.

Then follows the question, the substance of which is stated in the opinion by the majority court:

Q. Your knowledge of his handwriting is so vague that the slightest little circumstance that you think he might not have been there would have a tendency to raise a serious doubt about whether he wrote a certain letter that is exhibited to you?

A. Yes, sir.

It is apparent, of course, that these matters, on cross-examination, go merely to the weight of the testimony, and not to the competency of the witness. It is conceded 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

by the appellant that the witness Brewerton sufficiently qualified to express a belief or opinion as to the defendant's handwriting, because of the testimony of the witness that at different times he saw the defendant write. The appellant concedes, also, that all of the letters in question were sufficiently proved by the state to be the defendant's handwriting so as to entitle their admission in evidence. The particular complaint made in this regard is that the prosecutrix should not have been permitted to express an opinion or belief that the letters were the defendant's handwriting, because she at no time had seen him write, and because she was not an expert on handwriting. From the objections made in the court below by counsel for the defendant, and from their brief on appeal, they seem to entertain the view that there are but two ways by which a witness may qualify so as to express an opinion as to the handwriting of another. One is by having seen the person write. The other is by comparison. The majority court seem to entertain the same view; for they say: "Her own evidence shows her incompetency to testify on the subject of his handwriting, for she admitted that she never saw him write, and that she was not an expert on handwriting." It being conceded that the prosecutrix had not at any time seen the defendant write, her testimony in the prevailing opinion is considered from the standpoint of identifying handwriting by comparison, the collation of two papers in juxtaposition for the purpose of ascertaining by inspection if they were written by the same person. Of course, when that kind of testimony is sought, it is essential that the writing or standard, with which the disputed writing is compared, be proved or admitted to be genuine, and that the witness making the comparison must be shown to have special skill and experience in making it, before he is entitled to express an opinion. It is to that kind of evidence that the authorities cited and quoted by the majority court refer. But the prosecutrix was not called to give, nor did she give, that kind of testimony. The statement made by defendant's counsel that the state was qualifying her as an expert is erroneous. The state was not attempting to so qualify her, nor did she in the least qualify as such, and from that alone it is sufficient to say that she was not entitled to testify as an expert. But this witness, like the witness Brewerton, did not testify as to defendant's handwriting by comparing a disputed writing with another writing, and by expressing a belief that the writings were written by the same person, or that if the defendant wrote one he also wrote the other. They testified as to his handwriting from their knowledge of and familiarity with his handwriting. It may be said, in a very general sense, that all evidence of handwriting, except where the witness saw the disputed document written, is, in its nature, comparison. That is, it is the belief or opinion which the witness entertains upon comparing the writing in question was an exemplar in his mind derived from some previous knowledge. But that is not what is meant in law by proof of handwriting by comparison. Berg v. Peterson, 49 Minn. 420, 52 N. W. 37; Burdick v. Hunt, 43 Ind. 381; Travis v. Brown, 43 Pa. 9, 82 Am. Dec. 540; 6 Enc. Ev. p. 386; 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 263. I think we can well eliminate the question of expert testimony as to handwriting, for it is not involved in the case. The question here is, Was sufficient knowledge of or familiarity with the defendant's handwriting shown on the part of the prosecutrix to make her competent to express an opinion or belief as to whether the letters were in his handwriting? This leads to the inquiry, from what source or sources, other than seeing a person write, may a witness derive knowledge of, or familiarity with, the handwriting of such person so that the witness may be qualified to speak, from his knowledge and familiarity, as to such person's handwriting? In speaking of the qualifications and sources of knowledge of such a witness, in vol. 6, p. 370, Enc. Ev., it is said: "Any person who has seen the purported author write, and has thus acquired a standard in his own mind of the general character of his handwriting, is competent to testify as to the genuineness of the signature in question. In showing familiarity with handwriting the witness is not restricted to the single means of having seen the person write. It is sufficient that the witness may have acquired knowledge of the handwriting by having seen writings admitted by the purported author to be his, or with his knowledge acted upon as his, or so adopted in the ordinary business of life as to create a reasonable presumption of genuineness."

Mr. Jones, on the Law of Evidence (vol. 2, § 559), says: "It has also been held that a witness is competent to testify as to the handwriting of another, although he has not actually seen him write, if the witness has seen writing which such person has acknowledged or admitted to be his. Such acknowledgment may not only be in express terms, as where a person has formally acknowledged his signature or other writing to have been executed by him, but may be inferred as will be seen from other facts and circumstances or from the course of business. But when a witness has testified that he has neither seen a person write, nor any writing which he knew to be the writing of the person, his opinion as to the genuineness of such writing is not admissible." In the case of Flowers v. Fletcher, 40 W. Va. 107, 20 S. E. 871, it is said: "The law is that a witness who has any personal knowledge of a signature in controversy, however slight, has the right to give his opinion, and the weight of that opinion is a question for the jury, and not for the court. A witness who has seen a person write but once, and then only his abbreviated signature, may testify regarding the same; or if he has seen a signature admitted by the owner to be genuine." Illustrations are also given by the court in Redding v. Redding, 69 Vt. 502, 38 Atl. 231: "One is deemed to be acquainted with the handwriting of another person when he has seen him write, though but once, and then only his name; or when he has received letters or other documents purporting to be written by that person in answer to letters or other documents written by the witness or under his authority and addressed to him; or when he has seen letters or other documents purporting to be that person's handwriting, and has afterwards personally communicated with him concerning their contents, or has acted upon them as his, he knowing thereof and acquiescing therein; or when the witness has so adopted them into business transactions as to induce a reasonable presumption and belief of their genuineness; or when, in the ordinary course of business, documents purporting to be written or signed by that person have been habitually submitted to the witness." To the same effect, also, are the following: 1 Greenl. Ev. § 577; 1 Wigmore, Ev. §§ 700, 701; Berg v. Peterson, supra; Hammond v. Varian, 54 N. Y. 398; Kinney v. Flynn, 2 R. I. 319; Hammond's Case, 2 Me. 33, 11 Am. Dec. 39; Atlantic Ins. Co. v. Manning, 3 Colo. 224; Gordon v. Price, 32 N. C. (10 Ired. L.) 385.

The prosecutrix having testified that she saw, and had in her possession, writings, admitted to her by the defendant to have been written by him, and to be genuine; that she and the defendant conversed about matters and things therein referred to, the subject-matter of which the defendant, in effect, acknowledged; and that, from having seen such writings, she was able to and could identify the defendant's writing, thereby made herself competent, in my opinion, to speak upon the subject. Such sources gave her a means of knowledge, and afforded an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the defendant's handwriting, equally as well as if, at some time, she had seen him once write his name. When it is said that a person who has seen another write may testify to that other's handwriting, that is but an illustration of identifying handwriting from knowledge. The witness in such case is qualified to speak, not merely because he saw such other write, but because he knows his handwriting from having seen him write. When a witness shows personal knowledge, not from having seen another write, but from having seen writings admitted by him to be his, or with his knowledge acted upon as his, that is but another way of also identifying handwriting from knowledge. But it is claimed that the testimony of the prosecutrix shows that the defendant only admitted or acknowledged to her that letters "C" and "D" were written by him; and that inasmuch as he, in his testimony, denied making such admissions or of writing any of the letters, "C" and "D" could not become the basis of comparison, which was her only means of determining the genuineness of the other two—"E" and "F"—because of the essential that the standard of comparison must be established by proof of genuineness. But the prosecutrix did not testify by comparison, but from knowledge. Whatever may be the rule and the reasons therefor, in that regard, when evidence is sought by comparison, they do not apply when the witness speaks from personal knowledge of the handwriting. When a witness testifies that at some previous time he saw the defendant write, if only his name, and for that reason he knows his handwriting, that qualifies the witness to speak as to the defendant's handwriting of a document or signature exhibited to the witness. Because the defendant denies the fact that such witness ever saw him write, it does not render the testimony of the witness incompetent, nor is it essential before the witness is permitted to speak upon the subject that the admission of the defendant of such fact be first had. All that is necessary is that the fact of the witness having seen him write be proved, which generally is done by the witness himself. Now, when a witness qualifies himself by showing knowledge of the defendant's handwriting from having seen letters or writings acknowledged or admitted by him to the witness as his handwriting, the fact that the defendant may or does deny that he made such acknowledgment or admission, or that he wrote the writing with respect to which the admission is claimed, does not render the witness incompetent, in such instance, any more than in the other. All that is essential is that proof be made of such an admission or acknowledgment, which, of course, may be done by 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the witness. The competency of the witness is a matter for the court upon the showing made at the time when the witness is asked to express his belief. If sufficient knowledge on the part of the witness as to the handwriting of the purported author is shown, his testimony on the subject may be received. Whether the statements of the witness in regard to his knowledge are thereafter controverted by the defendant or by other testimony, goes merely to the weight of the testimony and to the credibility of the witness, and not to his competency in the first instance. It certainly was proper to have the prosecutrix state that the defendant admitted to her that he wrote exhibits C and D. That alone was sufficient proof that he wrote them. It also was proper for her to state that the defendant corresponded with her, and that she received letters purporting to come from him in the regular course of mail, and that after they were received by her, she and the defendant conversed about their contents; the subject-matter of which the defendant acknowledged and in which he acquiesced. From such sources sufficient knowledge on her part may be obtained to enable her to speak as to the defendant's handwriting, not only as to exhibits C and D, but also to E and F as well, or as to any other writing purporting to have been written by him. And the fact that the defendant thereafter, in his testimony, denied that he made any such admissions, or that he wrote the letters, or that he ever saw the witness until in the court room, or that because he was corroborated as to his alibi, or because the prosecutrix was not corroborated by any "direct evidence" as to the acts of sexual intercourse, did not, in my judgment, destroy her competency.

STATE OF WASHINGTON

v.

EDWARD PARSONS et al., Appts.

(— Wash. —, 87 Pac. 349.)

Robbery—pretended arrest—force.

1. The elements of force and putting in fear, within the statutory definition of robbery, are present where accused approached

Note.—The authorities upon the question as to the assumption or pretense of authority as a police officer, as supplying the elements, fear and force, essential to constitute robbery, are discussed in notes in 57 L.R.A. 441, and 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1024. an intoxicated person and pretended to arrest him, and, after compelling him to go a ways with them, searched and took from him his valuables, he making no resistance because he believed his assailants to be officers, and that they would "lick him" if he resisted.

Trial—neglect to instruct—error.

2. The court's neglect to instruct the jury of its own motion upon the lesser degrees of the crime for which accused is on trial is not error, in the absence of any exception or request for more specific instructions.

(November 9, 1906.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Chehalis County convicting them of robbery. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. H. Abel and E. A. Philbrick, for appellants:

There must be in robbery either actual violence inflicted on the person robbed, or such demonstrations or threats, and under such circumstances, as to create in him reasonable apprehension of bodily injury.

2 Bishop, Crim. Law, 7th ed. 1166.

There was not such exercise of force or violence as would warrant the submission to the jury of the question whether appellants had committed robbery by force and violence.

Hall v. People, 171 Ill. 540, 49 N. E. 495; Territory v. McKern, 3 Idaho, 15, 26 Pac. 123; Routt v. State, 61 Ark. 594, 34 S. W. 262; State v. Miller, 83 Iowa, 291, 49 N. W. 90; Williams v. Com. 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1850, 50 S. W. 240; Long v. State, 12 Ga. 293.

The evidence as to fear is meager, indefinite, and unsatisfactory. There must be such circumstances of terror, such threatening by word or gesture, as by common experience is likely to cause an apprehension of danger, and cause a man to part with his property for the safety of his person.

Mr. E. E. Boner for the State.

Fullerton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellants were convicted on an information charging them with robbery, and appeal from the judgment and sentence pronounced upon them. The acts constituting the offense charged took place at Hoquiam on the morning of February 14, 1906, between the hours of 12 and 2 o'clock. The evidence on the part of the state tended to show that the prosecuting witness some time between those hours entered a restaurant at that place and ordered a meal. He had been drinking the night before, and had not as yet fully recovered from its effects. While his meal was being prepared he leaned over the counter at which he was sitting and went to sleep. When the meal was ready he was awakened by the waiter, when he began eating, but seemingly did not become fully awake, and gradually dozed off to sleep again. The appellants came into the room in the meantime, ordered a meal, and, while eating it, jested with the waiter and restaurant cook over the prosecuting witness's condition. After they had finished one of them turned to the cook to settle for their meal, when the other took the witness by the shoulder and aroused him, telling him that he must pay for his meal and get out of doors, as that was not a lodging house. The witness then paid for his meal, when the appellant, still holding him by the shoulder, led him out of the door of the restaurant, and there told him that he and his companion were policemen, and were going to take him to jail for being drunk. The other appellant, who had remained talking with the cook until this time, then joined them, and the two took the witness down an alleyway into a saloon, where they told him to sit down. No one was in the saloon at the time except the bartender. After seating the witness in a chair, the appellants approached the bartender and held with him a whispered conversation, whereupon he took some keys from a hook, and went out into a room a short distance away. While the bartender was out of sight, the appellants again took hold of the witness, raised him up, and told him he must now go to jail, and that it was necessary to search him before going. They thereupon went through his pockets taking from him such money as he had, some $28, and then led him back through the alleyway to the main street, where they let him go, telling him to go to a certain saloon, and not let himself be seen on the street until morning. The witness went to his boarding house where he announced that he had been robbed by the night policemen of the town. His complaint caused an inquiry to be made which resulted in the arrest of the appellants within a few hours afterwards. The witness testified that he made no resistance or outcry for the reason that he believed the appellants to be policemen, and would "lick him" if he resisted or made an outcry; that they told him, while searching him, that he must keep still. The prosecuting witness was a Finlander by birth, who had been in the United States less than four years, and spoke the English language brokenly.

The statute (Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes, Supp. § 7103) defines robbery to be the forcible and felonious taking from the person of another, or from his immediate presence, any article of value by violence or putting in fear; and it is contended by the appellants that the evidence here fails to show such use of force and violence, or such putting in fear, in taking the property, as is necessary to constitute robbery under the statute. The courts generally hold that it is not robbery to merely snatch from the hand or person of another, or to surreptitiously take from another's pocket, money or some other thing of value, as such taking lacks the element of force, or putting in fear, one or the other of which being essential to constitute the crime of burglary. It is also generally held that where the property is obtained by some artifice or trick intended to, and which does, allay resistance and not arouse fear, such as inducing one to part voluntarily with his money or property under the belief that the taker has a lawful right to it, does not constitute robbery. But, on the other hand, it is generally held whenever the element of force or putting in fear enters into the taking, and is the cause that induces the owner of the property to part with it, the taking is robbery, no matter how slight the act of force or the cause creating the fear may be, nor by what other circumstances the taking may be accompanied. It is enough that the force or the putting in fear employed is sufficient to overcome resistance on the part of the person from whom the property is taken, and is the moving cause inducing him to part unwillingly with his property.

It seems to us that there was in the case before us both the element of force and putting in fear. There was a forcible seizure of the prosecuting witness, his forcible taking to a place where he had no desire to go, a command to keep silent, and a forcible taking against his will of his money from his person. True, these acts were accompanied by the false representations to the effect that the appellants were officers of the law having authority to compel him to accompany them, and to take from him his property; but these representations did not induce the prosecuting witness to part with his money. They were still compelled to take it from him. Nor was the mere false impersonation sufficient to enable them to thus obtain the property of the prosecuting witness. They were compelled to exercise their assumed authority by such threats of violence as to put him in fear. It may be that a man of more intelligence and resolution than the witness exhibited would have seen through the very flimsy pretext the appellants were making, and would have successfully resisted such an attempt as was here successful. But this is beside the question. The law must protect the weak and irresolute as well as those of stronger wills, and it is enough that the person assaulted was intimidated and yielded up his property because of the force used and threatened, be the same ever so slight.

The courts usually hold it robbery to obtain the property of another by means of the ruse used by the appellants in this instance. In McCormick v. State, 26 Tex. App. 678, 9 S. W. 277, the proof showed that the defendant met the prosecutor at night, and summoned him to throw up his hands, stating at the same time that he was an officer of the law, and would arrest the prosecutor for being drunk and noisy. On the prosecutor's yielding to him, he took from him a roll of bills. This was held to constitute robbery. In Williams v. State, 51 Neb. 711, 71 N. W. 729, defendants three in number conspired to unlawfully extort money from the prosecuting witness, pursuant to which one of them, falsely pretending to be an officer, took the prosecutor into custody for an alleged misdemeanor, and demanded money, at the same time taking hold of the prosecutor's collar. The prosecutor thereupon handed him $20, because, as he testified, he was so scared he did not know what he was doing. This money was immediately handed by the person receiving it to his associates. It was held that all three of the persons were guilty of robbery by putting in fear. In Bussey v. State, 71 Ga. 100, 51 Am. Rep. 256, the facts were that the defendant, who pretended to be marshal of the town, having on star designating the office, seized the prosecutor, to whom another was showing a trick at cards, and upon the exclamation of that other, "There's the marshal!" pushed him against the wall and threatened to put him in jail unless he paid money. The prosecutor, to keep from going to jail, and because he "did not want to be bothered," paid him $8. This was held robbery. See also Sweat v. State, 90 Ga. 315, 17 S. E. 273; Thompson v. State, 61 Neb. 210, 87 Am. St. Rep. 453, 85 N. W. 62; Seymour v. State, 15 Ind. 288.

The appellant has cited cases which maintain that it is not robbery to obtain the property of another by artifice or trick, or by falsely impersonating a police officer, where no element of force or putting in fear enters into the taking; and it may be that one or two of the cases so cited cannot be distinguished in their facts from the facts of the cases above cited or the facts in the case at bar. But we think the better rule is with the cases we have cited. There was no error in the charge of the court to the effect that the degree of force used was immaterial as long as it was sufficient to compel the prosecuting witness to part with his property; nor was it error for the court to refuse to give as part of his charge the requested instructions submitted by the appellants. These, in so far as they were proper, were substantially included in the charge given.

Finally, it is urged that the court erred in failing to charge the jury on its own motion as to the lesser offenses included in the offense charged in the information. It is conceded that no request was made to the court to give such an instruction as part of his charge, and that no exception was taken because such an instruction was not made a part of the charge. There are well-considered cases which sustain the appellants' contention, but we think the weight of authority is the other way. See 11 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 217; 12 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 639, 640. Mr. Thompson states the rule in the following language: "It is, then, a general rule of procedure, subject, in this country, to a few statutory innovations, that mere nondirection, partial or total, is not ground of new trial, unless specific instructions, good in point of law and appropriate to the evidence, were requested and refused. A party cannot, by merely excepting to a charge, make it the foundation for an assignment of error, that it is indefinite or incomplete. The rule rests upon the soundest foundation. The facts of the case come to the mind of the judge as matters of first impression, and it will often be extremely difficult for him, in the short time allowed for a trial before a jury, and in the midst of such a trial, to prepare a series of instructions applicable to all the hypotheses presented by the evidence. On the other hand, counsel are presumed to have studied their case beforehand; to come to the court with a fair understanding of the facts which will probably be proved, and with a full knowledge of the law applicable to those facts. It is, therefore, their duty to give attention to the charge of the judge, and if, in their opinion, it omits to give direction as to the law applicable to any essential feature of the evidence, to call his attention to the omission and to request appropriate supplementary instructions; and where they fail thus to call his attention to something which he may fairly be supposed to have omitted from inadvertence, they 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) ought not to be allowed to complain of the omission in an appellate court. A rule which would allow them to do so would be extremely inconvenient. It would multiply new trials and reversals, and often on grounds which have no connection whatever with the merits." § 2341; Thompson on Trials.

The judgment is affirmed.

GRAND LODGE OF IOWA LEGION OF

(— Iowa, —, 109 N. W. 1099.)

Benefit society—local secretary—agent.

1. The secretary of a local branch of a fraternal society, charged with the duty of collecting the assessments on benefit certificates issued by the grand lodge, is the agent of such lodge with respect to the business of such collections.

Same—waiver of rule.

2. Where the secretary of the local lodge of a mutual benefit society is frequently away from home on the last day prescribed for payment of assessments on certificates, and for a long time has been in the habit of accepting payments any time prior to the date of transmitting the assessments to the supreme body, a rule of the order that failure to pay assessments on or before the last specified day shall of its own force suspend the certificate will be regarded as waived.

Same—applicability of waiver.

3. The principle of waiver and estoppel applies in case of fraternal or lodge insurance.

Messrs. W. B. Ingersoll and Parslow & Peters for appellee.

Weaver, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts in the case are substantially without dispute. The defendant is a fraternal life association, doing business in this state, and, upon certain specified conditions and considerations, insures the life of each of its members in a sum not exceeding $2,000, payable upon his decease to a designated beneficiary. The membership of the association is organized into local societies, or lodges, under the general headship or government of a grand lodge, having jurisdiction of the order within the state. The fund from which benefit certificates are paid is accumulated by assessments made by the grand lodge not oftener than one each month. The by-laws of the association provide that notice of each assessment shall be sent out to the membership on the 1st of the month for which it is called, and that any member failing to pay the same on or before the 28th day of each month shall be held to be delinquent. Each local lodge has an officer known as the "financial secretary," whose duty it is to collect the assessments. The laws of the association are not fully disclosed in the record, but we draw the inference from what is shown that, in the regular order of business, it is made the duty of the financial secretary, on the 28th day of each month, to pay over the assessments collected by him to the local treasurer, who transmits the same to the proper officer of the grand lodge. It is also provided that any member of a lodge "in arrears in the payment of assessments or dues on the 28th day of the month upon which the same has been called shall, from that date, stand suspended from all rights and benefits under his or her certificate of membership; and it shall be the duty of the financial secretary to mark such members suspended upon his or her book from that date, without action of the lodge; and such member so in arrears shall remain suspended until he or she shall lawfully be reinstated." It is further provided that any member who has become thus delinquent may renew his certificate at any time within three months thereafter upon payment of all arrears and furnishing a proper certificate of health, if such certificate be required of him. After a suspension of three months, the delinquent desiring reinstatement is required to submit to a new medical examination. Another section provides that any member in arrears for the period of six months shall stand suspended from all benefits and privileges in the society, and that his or her certificate shall be reported to the grand secretary as annulled; and the member shall not be again admitted, "except as provided in this article." Immediately following this provision it is enacted that "any member suspended by reason of nonpayment of dues or arrearages or beneficiary assessments, applying to be reinstated, shall pay the amount he or she was in arrears at the date of the suspension, and all other arrearages, and, in addition thereto, a sum not less than $5." By still another section, it is provided that any member "neglecting to pay and in arrears to the lodge to the amount of three months' dues or more . . . shall stand suspended from all benefits and privileges until the payment of all arrearages up to the time of reinstatement," in accordance with the rules. Upon admission to the lodge, each member is required to pay one advance assessment. It is made the duty of the financial secretary to keep a correct account between the lodge and its members, receive all moneys for the lodge, pay the same over to the local treasurer, taking vouchers therefor, and report the same to the recording secretary. He is also required to notify all members in arrears to the amount of three months' dues, and notify the local president of the fact. By § 5, art. 9, of the laws of the association, it is made the duty of the financial secretary, on the 28th day of the month, to "mark and report to the recording secretary the names of the members who are in arrears on such assessments; and the recording secretary shall place the same on the records of the lodge, and mark such certificates suspended on the certificate register book, affixing the date thereto. The financial secretary shall, upon receipt of any arrearages from the assessments, pay the same into the treasury (said amount from arrearages to be forwarded to the grand secretary upon the first order thereafter), and notify the recording secretary of the same; and the recording secretary shall so place it on the records of the lodge, and mark the certificate so paid 'renewed' on the certificate register book, affixing the date thereto."

The foregoing requirements of the association are all which the record before us contains, bearing upon the questions raised by the appeal. It appears that a local lodge of the association was organized at Shenandoah, in Page county, Iowa, on October 27, 1880, and the deceased, George E. Trotter, became a charter member. For some time prior to the death of said Trotter, this lodge had been reduced to six members, four of whom, it is alleged, had removed from said town, leaving but two to transact the business of the lodge. Of these two the deceased acted as president of the lodge, and W. P. Ferguson as its financial secretary. There was, and for some years had been, no recording secretary or treasurer or other officer of such lodge, except the president and financial secretary above named. In this situation, it had been the custom, if not the duty, of the financial secretary to collect the assessments as they were made from time to time upon the membership of the lodge, and remit them direct to the grand secretary. This remittance was required to be made not later than the 15th of the month following the maturity of an assessment. Mr. Ferguson, the financial secretary of the lodge for a period of ten years prior to death of Trotter, is a practising lawyer, and frequently away from home on the 28th of the month, and very frequently the assessments upon the deceased and other members were not paid until after the date, when, according to the letter of the by-laws, they were in arrears. But in all cases they were paid in time to be forwarded to the grand lodge within the time allowed for such remittance. The fact that these payments were frequently made after the 28th of the month was shown upon the books kept by the financial secretary. In no instance of such delinquency was the member treated as suspended, or as having forfeited his rights in the association, and no mark or entry of any suspension on account of such delinquency, or of restoration or reinstatement to membership, was ever entered upon any of the books or records of the lodge.

The deceased was in the mercantile business in Shenandoah, and it was the habit of the financial secretary to call at his store on or about the time he wished to make remittance to the grand secretary and receive payment of the assessment from the deceased, or from his partner or clerk. All assessments upon the deceased prior to June, 1904, were paid and remitted. On the morning of June 27, 1904, Mr. Ferguson left Shenandoah and went to St. Louis, Missouri, where he remained until July 5, 1904. During his absence there was no one left in charge of his business who was authorized to receive or receipt for the assessments due from the lodge members. On the morning of July 6, 1904, Trotter, who had been in good health up to that time, died without having paid the assessment which became due on June 28th. On the following day the plaintiff, or the partner of the deceased, paid the amount of the June assessment to the financial secretary, who included the same in his report and remittance to the grand secretary. Formal proofs of the death of Trotter were furnished the grand lodge on July 13, 1904, but were not approved because the financial secretary had failed to sign and swear to a so-called "supplementary affidavit," which had been called for, stating in effect that the June assessment had been paid on or prior to June 28, 1904. The grand secretary again called for said affidavit from the financial secretary, who declined to make it, and, on October 8, 1904, the amount of the assessment, which had been remitted on July 7, 1904, as aforesaid, was returned by the grand lodge to the financial secretary, who tendered its return to plaintiff, but the same was refused.

1. As we understand the record, and the arguments presented, it is the theory of the appellee, and was the theory on which the trial court proceeded, that, upon the failure of the deceased to pay the June assessment on the 28th day of that month, he was by the automatic operation of the laws of the association at once suspended from membership therein, and his certificate became forfeited; and that this result is in no manner avoided by any practice, custom, or habit, which may have prevailed between him and the local lodge or its officers, as to the time when or the manner in which the assessments had been collected during the previous history of the lodge. We are not prepared to go to that length. What was the legal relation in which the financial secretary stood to the parties? Upon the answer to this inquiry depend very largely the force and effect of the conceded facts in the case. If he was simply the agent of the member paying the assessments, then, of course, the dealings between him and his principal could have no effect to avoid a forfeiture of the member's certificate for a neglect to observe the conditions on which it was issued; but, if he was the agent of the grand lodge, his habitual practice as to the time and manner of collecting the assessments may operate as a waiver or estoppel to prevent insistence upon such a forfeiture after a loss has occurred. It must be borne in mind that, no matter how stringent the condition upon which the continued validity of the contract of insurance is made to depend, the company or association is under no obligation to enforce it. If, then, such company or association itself, or by its agent (and it can act only by agents), adopts a method of business by which premiums or assessment are habitually collected and received for a period of several days after they become delinquent according to the strict letter of the contract, and no forfeiture or suspension is declared thereon, but such members are recognized as being at all times in good standing; and by this course of business members have reason fairly to conclude that the insurer does not insist upon literal compliance with the terms of the contract in this respect,—then it will not be heard to deny the good standing of a member who has depended upon the custom observed by the agent, and has paid, or offered to pay, his assessments in accordance therewith. *Cline v. There is no magic in the mere name of a thing; and, if an act done or performed by one person or party for or in behalf of another is in its essential nature one of agency, then the former is the agent of the latter. This principle has been often enforced as between the insurer and insured, and the person appointed or designated to receive payment of premiums and assessments, held to be the agent of the insurer, even where, by the terms of the contract, it is provided that he shall be regarded as the agent of the insured. Ancient Order of P. v. Drake, 66 Kan. 538, 72 Pac. 239; Supreme Lodge K. of P. v. Withers, supra; Supreme Lodge, K. of H. v. Davis, 26 Colo. 252, 58 Pac. 595; Continental Ins. Co. v. Pearce, 39 Kan. 396, 7 Am. As is well said by Mr. Justice Brown in the Withers Case, supra: "The position of the secretary must be determined by his actual power and authority, and not by the name which the defendant chooses to give him. To invest him with the duties of an agent and to deny his agency is a mere juggling with words. Defendant cannot play fast and loose with its own subordinates." The question involved in that case, as in this, turned largely upon the proposition whether the local secretary, in collecting assessments made by the grand lodge upon members of local lodges, was acting as the agent of the latter. This question the court answered in the affirmative, in a very vigorous opinion, which cites many of the cases, and takes note of the tendency of the courts, generally, to discountenance forfeitures of insurance on merely technical grounds, and to hold such forfeiture waived where the insurer, or its agent, by a course of business or conduct, has given the insured reasonable ground to believe that strict observance of the time and manner of paying recurring instalments, as required by the letter of the contract, will not be insisted upon. The authorities are substantially unanimous that in schemes of co-operative life insurance in which the authority to issue benefit certificates, prescribe terms of membership, and levy assessments is vested in a grand or supreme lodge, or council, or other central governing body, which central body exercises jurisdiction over local lodges or societies through which the membership is recruited, and by the officers of which assessments are collected and remitted, the local organization and its officers to whom the duty of making such collections is committed are to be considered the agents of the governing body. *Bragaw v. That this agency is subject to the operation of the ordinary rules applicable to 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) agencies of the same general character in the business of ordinary life insurance is also well settled. Railway Pass. & F. C. Mut. Aid & Ben. Asso. v. Tucker, 157 Ill. 194, 42 N. E. 398, 44 N. E. 286; McCorkle v. Texas Benev. Asso. 71 Tex. 152, 8 S. W. 516. As to the effect of the act of the collection agent in extending the time of payment of assessments and premiums, especially where such indulgence is so frequent or so often repeated that the member may reasonably rely thereon, there are numerous decisions, and, with very few exceptions, they sustain the contention of the appellant. Without any attempt at an exhaustive citation, we may note the following:

An officer of a subordinate lodge, charged with the duty of collecting and forwarding assessments, is an agent of the supreme lodge. Supreme lodge, K. of H. v. Davis, supra.

In Wallace v. Fraternal Mystic Circle, 121 Mich. 263, 80 N. W. 6, the deceased and other members had frequently failed to pay their assessments promptly on the prescribed day, and on some occasions the payments were not made until they were several weeks past due. An assessment which became due July 18th was not paid, and a member so in default died August 11th. In an action upon his certificate, plaintiff asked the court to instruct the jury that, if payment of assessments had been frequently allowed to be made after due, and the officers of the local lodge had, by their course in conducting business, caused the deceased to believe that strict performance on his part would not be exacted, then a forfeiture could not be insisted upon because of the nonpayment of the last assessment, and plaintiff would be entitled to recover. This request was refused, and the jury was instructed according to the contention of the appellee herein, that failure to pay on or before the day fixed by the contract operated to work the suspension of the deceased without any declaration or affirmative action to that effect on part of the lodge, and that deceased was bound to know the laws and rules of the society, and must be held to have understood that his failure to pay served to relieve the society from all obligation upon his certificate. On appeal it was held that the charge given was erroneous, and that the jury should have been instructed as requested by the plaintiff. This doctrine was approved and applied in Johanson v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W. (Utah) 86 Pac. 494. It was also approved by this court, in Loughridge v. Iowa Life & Endowment Asso. 84 Iowa, 141, 50 N. W. 568. We there say: "Nor can it be doubted that a general practice and course of business which would lead the plaintiff to rely upon the acceptance of payment for assessments after failure to pay in the time prescribed by the policy will operate as a waiver of the forfeiture. Insurance companies cannot lead customers to rely upon their usages, course of business, and the declarations of their officers which disarm vigilance, overcome watchfulness, and remove stimulus to promptness in payments provided by their policies, and then rigidly enforce the conditions of payment." See also Walsh v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 30 Iowa, 133, 6 Am. Rep. 664.

In the case of Mayer v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 38 Iowa, 304, 18 Am. Rep. 34, we held that an agent's custom of sending out written notices, or reminders, to policy holders, calling attention to the date when their premiums would be due, operated as a waiver of the right to forfeit a policy, where the notice was omitted, and the insured thereby led to omit prompt payment. In the same case we approved an instruction to the jury to the effect that, if the agent had been in the habit of receiving payment of premiums after they were due; or if the agent had informed the insured that he would call at the latter's place of business and collect the premium and had in fact pursued that practice in the past,—these circumstances "would excuse the deceased from going to the agent's office and paying such premium the day it was due." In upholding this instruction, the opinion says: "The vast increase in the business of insurance, and the many interests which it involves, have demonstrated that many of the decisions heretofore made respecting it are unwise, and have created a necessity for innovation. Every law should be reasonable, and it is reasonable only when it is adapted to human conduct. . . . Now, it must strike every reasonable mind that a majority of ordinarily prudent persons, who had been customarily notified of the time when premiums upon their policies became due, and who had received no notice of an intention to abandon the customary course, would, in a particular case, expect and await a like notice. And, if such is the reasonable and natural result of the previous dealings of the company, it must govern its future conduct, so as to accord with the reasonable expectation thus created." See also Warnebold v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 83 Iowa, 26, 2d par., 48 N. W. 1069.

In the recent case of Alexander v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W. 119 Iowa, 519, 93 N. W. 508, we again had occasion to consider the effect of the act of the financier of a local lodge upon the governing body of the association. There the policy or certificate had been issued under circumstances which made it subject to be avoided for fraud on the part 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) of the insured. Thereafter, with knowledge of the fraud, the financier of the local lodge advised the beneficiary to continue paying the assessments and keep the certificate alive, and this was done. This we held to operate as a waiver of the defense, saying: "One asserting the right to pay under a valid certificate, and allowed to do so by the officer having authority to determine whether or not such payments should be received, is certainly justified in relying on the statements of such officer; and the association is estopped from insisting, by way of defense, on any fact which would have been a proper ground for refusing, when the dues are offered, to recognize the certificate as valid; provided, such fact is known to the association through such officer, or there is such notice of the fact as to charge the association or its officer with knowledge thereof."

Under circumstances very similar to those in the case at bar, and upon a contract practically identical with the one here sued upon, the Wisconsin court was held that, where the local officer collecting assessments has been in the habit of receiving them after they were due, thereby leading the insured to believe that no forfeiture would be claimed if payments were made within a few days after maturity, the right to insist upon such forfeiture is waived; and where, under such circumstances, a member failing to pay an assessment due July 1st, died on July 10th, and on the same day a member of his family paid such assessment (a return of which was promptly tendered), there was no forfeiture, and a recovery upon the certificate was upheld. Reisz v. Supreme Council, A. L. of H. 103 Wis. 427, 79 N. W. 430. The same rule is applied in Mueller v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. D. 69 Minn. 236, 72 N. W. 48.

In Illinois, it has been repeatedly held that in organizations of this class the local lodge and its officers are agents of the grand lodge, and the latter is bound by notice to, or knowledge of, the latter. Coverdale v. Royal Arcanum, 193 Ill. 91, 61 N. E. 918; High Court I. O. of F. v. Schweitzer, 171 Ill. 325, 49 N. E. 506; Grand Lodge A. O. U. W. v. Lachmann, 199 Ill. 140, 64 N. E. 1022; *Germania L. Ins. Under this rule thus well established, and the undisputed facts in the case, we are clearly of the opinion that the association should not be permitted to insist upon a forfeiture of the contract. It is a universally recognized doctrine that forfeitures are not favored in law, and that the courts will be vigilant and quick to discover, and give effect to, any act or circumstance from which it may fairly be argued that the insurer has waived the right to strict and literal performance of the insured, or upon which an estoppel against such defense may be founded. Appleton v. Phenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. 59 N. H. 541, 47 Am. Rep. 220. Counsel seem to argue that, while waiver or estoppel may exist in a matter of ordinary insurance, a rule less favorable to the insured obtains in fraternal or lodge insurance. An occasional case may be found in which this doctrine seems to find support. Supreme Lodge, K. of H. v. Oeters, 95 Va. 610, 29 S. E. 322; Busby v. North America L. Ins. Co. 40 Md. 572, 17 Am. Rep. 634. But, as we have seen, it is contrary to the general trend and the great weight of the authorities, as, we think, it is also opposed to the principles of common right and justice. In addition to cases cited, see Helme v. Philadelphia L. Ins. Co. 61 Pa. 107, 100 Am. Dec. 621; Girard L. Ins. Co. v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 86 Pa. 236; Baxter v. Massasoit Ins. Co. 13 Allen, 323. Indeed, if there is to be any difference in the degree of strictness with which the insured shall be held to pay premiums, and assessments promptly on time, it would be in favor of members of fraternal and co-operative associations like the appellee. Murphy v. Independent Order, S. & D. of I. of A. 77 Miss. 830, 50 L.R.A. 111, 27 So. 624; Modern Woodmen v. Colman, 68 Neb. 660, 94 N. W. 814, 96 N. W. 154.

These societies are, as a rule, organized in an informal way. Their constitutions, rules, and by-laws, as is well illustrated in those on the record before us, are often crude, obscure, and confused, if not contradictory in their terms. The officers and members of each local lodge are neighbors, acquaintances, and personal friends, ordinarily without experience in the insurance business, and rarely, if ever, insisting upon strict technical compliance with all the written regulations by which they are supposed to be guided. The officer collecting the assessments generally knows the financial standing of the members on his list, and their desire with reference to a continuance in such membership; and, as he is generally given a period of grace in which to make remittance to the grand lodge (in this case at least two weeks), he very naturally continues to receive payments until such remittance is made, even though they be past due according to the letter of the rules. Indeed, it may often occur, as it sometimes did in this case, that delinquency and suspension of a member are prevented by the act of the collector in advancing the amount due, and thereafter being reimbursed by such member. It is incredible that such lenient tendencies and practices should not be well understood by the grand lodge. Indeed, the very fact that liberal time is given to the collector to make his remittance is strongly suggestive of the conclusion that an opportunity is thus afforded for the very purpose of enabling him to round up the delinquents and prevent wholesale suspensions from membership. If the doctrine contended for by the appellee is to be upheld, then the deceased, who had been recognized as a member of the association in good standing for nearly twenty-five years, and had from time to time paid the assessments made upon him in the belief that he held a valid and enforceable certificate, had, as a matter of law, been under the cloud of suspension for years without suspecting it, and his certificate was all the time of no more value than a piece of blank paper; for it is shown that during all this time he frequently did not pay until called upon after payment was due. To so hold is to set a trap for the feet of the unwary member; it is to receive his money without furnishing him any consideration therefor, and to enable the insurer to escape liability on its contract for no better reason than that it has itself misled the insured to his injury by its own course of business. It is not too much to say that technical defenses to actions upon insurance policies are not regarded with favor by the courts (Supreme Lodge, K. of P. v. Withers, supra), and that the professedly benevolent and charitable character of the so-called fraternal insurance societies is not regarded as exempting them from the application of this rule. Speaking of a claim for such exceptional consideration, the supreme court of Nebraska has well said: "This consideration would appeal to us with greater force, if these principles of mutuality and benevolence more frequently survived the holders of certificates, and were uniformly regarded by the associations as being applicable to and as including the persons named as beneficiaries. A charitable organization which collects its funds with avidity, but is astute in finding excuses for not bestowing them upon the designated objects of its bounty, is not entitled to any exclusive or special consideration at the hands of the court." Modern Woodman v. Colman, supra.

2. The conclusions arrived at in the preceding paragraph being decisive of the appeal, we shall not attempt any extended discussion of other issues presented. With reference, however, to the claim of waiver because of the absence from home of the financial secretary at the time when the assessment became delinquent, according to the rules of the association, we will say there is a good authority for the proposition that under such circumstances the member is entitled to a reasonable time after the return of such officer or agent, in which to make the payment. See Cotton States L. Ins. Co. v. Lester, and note thereto in 36 Am. Rep. 122 (62 Ga. 247). Also Sovereign Camp, W. of W. v. Hicks (Tex. Civ. App.) 84 S. W. 425. On the general subject of waiver, we may also note that, according to our decisions, the question whether waiver will be found in any particular case depends not upon the intention of the party against whom it is asserted, but on the effect which his conduct or course of business has had upon the other party. Tobin v. Western Mut. Aid Soc. 72 Iowa, 264, 33 N. W. 663; Bailey v. Mutual Ben. Asso. 71 Iowa, 689, 27 N. W. 770; Moore v. Order of Railway Conductors, 90 Iowa, 727, 57 N. W. 623. And this rule has been held applicable even where the insurer acts under a mistake. See Bailey Case, supra. It is to be noted, also, that this is a case in which an advance assessment is exacted of a member prior to his initiation, and we must presume that the deceased complied with the condition imposed upon his admission to membership. No claim is made that deceased failed to pay any of the subsequent assessments, except the one made for June, 1904. Since this litigation was begun, we have decided that, until the advance payment thus exacted has been duly applied upon some assessment, the member cannot be held to be in arrears (Rambousek v. Supreme Council, M. T. [Iowa] 106 N. W. 947; Sleight v. Supreme Council, M. T. [Iowa] 107 N. W. 183; Arrison v. Supreme Council, M. T. 129 Iowa, 303, 105 N. W. 580; *Hetzel v. W. 157), and, under the rule of these cases, there would seem to be no ground for holding the deceased to have been suspended or subject to suspension at the date of his death. A partial defense was pleaded by the appellee, to the effect that, by an amendment to the laws of the association, a lien had been imposed upon the certificate, which would reduce the amount recoverable thereon to $1,415.50. This issue does not appear to have been considered by the trial court, nor has it been argued by counsel, and we do not attempt to pass upon it.

For the reasons stated, the judgment of the District Court is reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings in harmony with this opinion.

Case Note.—Words as effecting false imprisonment, where plaintiff did not accompany the person using them:—In ordinary practice, words are sufficient to constitute an imprisonment if they impose a restraint upon the plaintiff's liberty of action and movement, and he is accordingly restrained, for he is not obliged to incur the risk of personal violence and insult by resisting, until actual violence is used. *Pike v. And, although the plaintiff did not accompany the one who used the words, yet, if they were sufficient to deprive him of liberty of movement, they have been held to constitute an imprisonment. Thus, in Herring v. State, 3 Tex. App. 108, the court held that a man who was called from his bed about 11 o'clock at night to come out and receive a message, and who, by a show APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Caldwell County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for false imprisonment. Affirmed.

Statement by Walker, J.:

The action was brought to recover damages for an unlawful arrest and false imprisonment. The defendant Calvin Houck was a policeman of Granite Falls, when he was informed that the plaintiff had stolen a pair of shoes from a store while it was on fire. He and his codefendants, J. O. Deal and George Lefevers, who acted as deputies, went to the plaintiff's house, which was 2 miles from the town, in the night and after the plaintiff and his wife had retired, and arrested him, after searching the house at plaintiff's request, as the state's evidence tended to show. The plaintiff's wife was compelled to dress in the presence of these strangers. The plaintiff, when accused of stealing the shoes, denied his guilt, but voluntarily agreed to go with the defendants to town, and answer the charge. The defendants then told him that he need not go that night if he would come to town the next morning, which he promised to do. He went to Granite Falls the next morning, but no warrant was ever issued, and no accusation made against him for stealing the shoes. The defendants had no warrant for the plaintiff when they went to his home for the purpose of arresting him, nor does it appear that any formal charge was ever made against him, before or after the arrest. There was evidence on the part of defendants tending to show that, while they had entered his house that night, they had not arrested him. The defendants offered to prove that the plaintiff was seen with a pair of shoes two weeks after the night of the fire; and further, that the defendant Calvin Houck had been told by A. M. Martin of a report made to him (Martin) that the plaintiff had stolen shoes of weapons, was detained at his gate about fifteen minutes, and was compelled to retract certain derogatory statements alleged to have been made by him, which he did because he was afraid to do otherwise, was deprived of his liberty against his will, within the meaning of a Texas statute defining false imprisonment as "a wilful detention of another against his consent, and when it is not expressly authorized by law, whether such detention be effected by an assault, by actual violence to the person, by threats, or by any other means which restrains the party so detained from removing from one place to another as he may see proper."

And in Searls v. Viets, 2 Thomp. & C. 224, the court held that a constructive arrest, on which a charge of false imprisonment could be based, was made by a constable who stopped the plaintiffs as they were driving past his house, and informed them that he had a warrant for their arrest for stealing pumpkins, but told them, when they were about to get off their wagon, that they could go home, put out their horses, take tea, and then come down. The plaintiffs then went home, and later engaged a lawyer, who went with them to the justice's office.

A similar decision was rendered in Tracy v. Seamans, 26 N. Y. Week. Dig. 117, 7 N. Y. S. R. 144, in which the defendant issued a warrant and handed it to a police officer, directing him to arrest the plaintiff; the officer found the plaintiff, and, after telling her that he had a warrant for her arrest, asked her to walk over to the justice's office, which she did in company with her husband, after the officer had left her.

And in the case of Pike v. Hanson, supra, which is closely analogous to the preceding cases, it appeared that a tax collector, with power of arrest, told the plaintiff, upon her refusal to pay her taxes, that she was under arrest, and thereupon she paid them to him. The court said that it clearly appears that the plaintiff did not intend to pay her taxes, and that she did pay them under such a restraint as was sufficient to constitute an arrest and imprisonment. See also, on this subject, Hebrew v. Pulis, post, 580.

But bare words are insufficient to effect an imprisonment, if the party to whom they are spoken resists. Searls v. Viets, supra.

The following statements by an officer have been held not to constitute an arrest on which an action for false imprisonment could be based: Merely informing the plaintiff of his business without taking him into custody, where the latter understood that he was not deprived of freedom of action,—Hill v. Taylor, 50 Mich. 549, 15 N. W. 899; and reading the summons in an action to the plaintiff, after informing him that he had an order of arrest for him, and telling him that he had better come along and fix the matter up, which he refused to do, but finally going away, leaving the bond with the plaintiff upon the latter's promise to call the next day and fix the matter up. State ex rel. Lawrence v. Buxton, 102 N. C. 129, 8 S. E. 774.

from the burning building. This testimony was excluded, and defendants excepted. The court instructed the jury upon the law as applicable to the different phases of the case, and to this part of the charge there was no exception. The defendants requested the court to instruct the jury as follows: "That in no view of the case could they return a verdict against the defendants Deal and Lefevers, they having been summoned by Houck, who was chief of police of the town of Granite Falls, to go with him in search for stolen goods, and that there was no testimony that either of the defendants Deal or Lefevers in any manner attempted to arrest the plaintiff, or in any manner restrained, or assisted to restrain, him of his liberty." The court refused to give this instruction, and the defendants (Deal and Lefevers) excepted. The court, in lieu of said instruction, charged the jury as follows: The arrest, if made at all, is admitted to have been made outside the town of Granite Falls; and, no authority being shown for a policeman of Granite Falls to arrest outside of the town limits by the evidence in this case, the defendants Deal and Lefevers were not required to obey Houck; and, if the plaintiff was actually arrested, and the defendants Deal and Lefevers were present and participated in it, they would be liable. Defendants excepted. The jury found, under issues properly submitted, that the defendants did unlawfully arrest the plaintiff, and assessed his damages at $200. Judgment was entered upon the verdict, and the defendants appealed.

Mr. W. C. Newland for appellants.

Messrs. Lawrence Wakefield and E. B. Cline, for appellee:

Defendants had no right to arrest the plaintiff outside the corporate limits of Granite Falls without a warrant, unless they had reasonable ground to apprehend an escape for a crime.

Revisal of 1905, § 2939; State v. Sigman, 106 N. C. 728, 11 S. E. 520; State v. Campbell, 107 N. C. 948, 12 S. E. 441.

Walker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The court, in its charge, fully explained to the jury the law applicable to the power of an officer to arrest without a warrant, and also instructed them as to the powers of a town policeman. The only two exceptions made to the charge are really the same in substance, and are sufficiently presented in the exception noted. The statute provides as follows: "As a peace officer, the constable shall have within the town all the powers of a constable in the county; and, as a ministerial officer, he shall have power to serve all civil and criminal process that may be directed to him by any court within his county, under the same regulations and penalties as prescribed by law in the case of other constables, and to enforce the ordinances and regulations of the board of commissioners as the board may direct." Revisal of 1905, § 2939. "Every person in whose presence a felony has been committed may arrest the person whom he knows, or has reasonable ground to believe, to be guilty of such offense; and it shall be the duty of every sheriff, coroner, constable, or officer of police, upon information, to assist in such arrest." § 3177. "Every sheriff, coroner, constable, officer of police, or other officer, intrusted with the care and preservation of the public peace, who shall know, or have reasonable ground to believe, that any felony has been committed, or that any dangerous wound has been given, and shall have reasonable ground to believe that any particular person is guilty, and shall apprehend that such person may escape if not immediately arrested, shall arrest him without warrant, and may summon all bystanders to aid in such arrest." § 3178. "Every person arrested without warrant shall be either immediately taken before some magistrate having jurisdiction to issue a warrant in the case, or else committed to the county prison, and, as soon as may be, taken before such magistrate, who, on proper proof, shall issue a warrant, and thereon proceed to act as may be required by law." § 3182.

We see, therefore, that an officer may arrest for a felony without a warrant, if he knows, or has reasonable ground to believe, that a felony has been committed, and that a particular person is guilty, and he also believes that he will escape if not immediately apprehended; while an individual may arrest in such a case if the offense has been committed in his presence, and he knows or has reasonable ground to believe the suspected party to be guilty. A policeman, as a peace officer, is given within the town all the powers of a constable in the county, and as a ministerial officer he has the power to serve process directed to him by a court. In this case it appears that Houck had no warrant, so that he was not acting as a ministerial officer. What, then, are the powers of a constable in the county which he has under the statute as a peace officer? "In executing warrants . . . [a constable] is a ministerial officer. In the apprehension of those who violate the law, he is a conservator of the peace. By the original and inherent power he possesses, he may, for treason, felony, breach of the peace, and some misdemeanors less than a felony, committed in his view, apprehend the supposed offenders, virtute officii, without any warrant." State v. Freeman, 86 N. C. 685. A police officer was not known to the common law, and therefore he can exercise only such powers as are given by the statute. His right to arrest when he has no warrant is confined necessarily by the statute to the limits of the town. Ibid.; State v. Sigman, 106 N. C. 728, 11 S. E. 520; Sossamon v. Cruse, 133 N. C. 470, 45 S. E. 757. So that Houck cannot justify the arrest of the plaintiff as an officer, for he did not arrest in the town and had no warrant, and his codefendants consequently cannot justify under him. This will free the charge of the court of any error, unless the defendants can justify as individuals, upon the ground that they had good reason to suspect that the plaintiff had stolen the shoes.

Larceny is a felony. The statute provides that anyone may arrest a person who he knows, or has reasonable ground to believe, has committed a felony; but the offense must have been committed in his presence. The shoes are not alleged to have been stolen in the presence of the defendants. So that statute does not apply. We need not inquire whether the statute, in this respect, is exclusive of the common-law right of a person to arrest another who is suspected of having committed a felony; and that question is not therefore decided. It is sufficient to dispose of this case that we hold, as we do, that, if the common-law rule still exists, the defendants cannot justify under it, as the evidence is not legally sufficient for the purpose. At the common law, in every case of treason and felony, the supposed offender may be apprehended without warrant, if such a crime has been actually committed, and there is reasonable ground to suspect him to be guilty. In such a case the party making the arrest will not be liable to an action, though it should ultimately appear that he was mistaken and the person suspected was innocent. But, if no such crime was committed by anyone, an arrest without warrant by a private individual would be illegal. 1 Chitty, Crim. Law, 15; Neal v. Joyner, 89 N. C. 287; State v. Campbell, 107 N. C. 948, 12 S. E. 441. The foregoing doctrine was declared by Lord Tenterden in Beckwith v. Philby, 6 Barn. & C. 635, which seems to be a leading case upon the subject. In Ashley's Case, 12 Coke, 90, it was resolved that, "if felony be done, and one hath suspicion upon probable matter that another is guilty of it, . . . he may arrest the party so suspected, to the end that he may be brought to justice; but in this case three things are to be observed: (1) That a felony be done; (2) that he who doth arrest hath suspicion upon probable cause, which may be pleaded, and is traversable; 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

(3) that he himself who hath the suspicion, arrest the party. He cannot command another to do it, for suspicion is a thing individual and personal, and cannot extend to another person than to him who hath it." The law on this subject is set forth with great clearness and fulness in Voorhees on Arrest, § 112. The principle is thus stated in Holley v. Mix, 3 Wend. 351, 20 Am. Dec. 702: "An arrest of a felon may be justified by any person without warrant, whether there be time to obtain one or not, if a felony has in fact been committed by the person arrested. If an innocent person is arrested upon suspicion by a private individual, such individual is excused, if a felony was in fact committed, and there was reasonable ground to suspect the person arrested; but, if no felony is committed by anyone, and a private individual arrest without warrant, such arrest is illegal." A police officer, however, having general authority to arrest, would be justified, without having a warrant, if he relied upon information from another on which he had reason to rely. Brockway v. Crawford, 48 N. C. (3 Jones, L.) 433, 67 Am. Dec. 250; Kennedy v. State, 107 Ind. 144, 57 Am. Rep. 99, 6 N. E. 305; Brooks v. Com. 61 Pa. 352, 100 Am. Dec. 645; Wright v. Com. 85 Ky. 123, 2 S. W. 904; Long v. State, 12 Ga. 293. There is no evidence in this case tending to show that a larceny had been committed, and none to show that the plaintiff had stolen the shoes. State v. Rutherford, 8 N. C. (1 Hawks) 457. What Masten told the defendant he had heard anybody else say is hardly sufficient proof of the fact that a larceny had been committed for submission to the jury. It is no legal proof at all, and the case was totally devoid of evidence that any such crime had been committed, even when we consider the evidence offered and excluded, that the plaintiff was wearing a pair of new shoes two weeks after the fire. It was not shown that any shoes had been taken, nor, if any had been taken, were those worn by the plaintiff identified as the stolen property, or a part of it; nor were any stolen goods found at his house. There was no serious attempt to establish the essential fact that a felony had been committed.

There was abundant evidence to show that the plaintiff had been unduly restrained of his liberty by Houck, and the other defendants who were present and participated. In ordinary practice, words are sufficient to constitute an imprisonment if they impose a restraint upon the person, and the party is accordingly restrained; for he is not obliged to incur the risk of personal violence and insult by resisting until actual violence be used. This principle is reasonable in itself, and is fully sustained by the authorities. Nor does there seem that there should be any very formal declaration of arrest. If the officer goes for the purpose of executing his warrant, and has the party in his presence and power, if the party so understands it, and in consequence thereof submits, and the officer, in the execution of the warrant, takes the party before a magistrate, or receives money or property in discharge of his person, it is in law an arrest, although he did not touch any part of the body. It is not necessary to constitute false imprisonment that the person restrained of his liberty should be touched or actually arrested. If he is ordered to do or not to do the thing, to move or not to move against his own free will, if it is not left to his option to go or stay where he pleases, and force is offered, or there is reasonable ground to apprehend that coercive measures will be used if he does not yield, the offense is complete upon his submission. A false imprisonment may be committed by words alone, or by acts alone, or by both, and by merely operating on the will of the individual, or by personal violence, or both. It is not necessary that the individual be confined within a prison or within walls, or that he be assaulted. It may be committed by threats. Voorhees on Arrest, §§ 274, 275, and 276. The evidence shows that the defendant Houck said to the plaintiff: "Consider yourself under arrest. You must go back to Granite Falls with us." Plaintiff asked for his warrant, when Houck replied: "That is all right about the warrant. You must go to Granite Falls with us." Plaintiff then said: "I will go with you." There was still other evidence showing that he submitted to the control they attempted to exercise over his person, and that he was made to act contrary to his own will. It is clear, we think, that there was no error in the charge with respect to the question whether or not there was an arrest. There was ample evidence, also, of the participation of the defendants Deal and Leffevers. It would not serve any useful purpose to state the evidence in full.

We have not failed to observe that there is no evidence of any reasonable apprehension that the plaintiff might escape, or that he was attempting to escape. The fact is that he was at his home, apparently unconscious that he was being pursued, or that he was even suspected of having committed a crime. Nor have we overlooked the fact that the defendants never made any charge against the plaintiff before a magistrate on the next day after the arrest, and did not in any respect comply with the requirements of the statute. Their conduct was not only illegal, but extremely reprehensible, and 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

they have, under the circumstances, been very lightly dealt with by the jury. The verdict is but a small recompense to the plaintiff for the grievous wrong inflicted upon him and his family. We can find no error in the rulings and charge of the court. No error.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

ANNIE L. HEBREW, Plff. in Err.,
v.

PETER E. PULIS et al.

(— N. J. —, 64 Atl. 121.)

Imprisonment—what constitutes.

1. The essential thing to constitute an imprisonment is constraint of the person, which may be by threats as well as by actual force; and, if the words or conduct are such as to induce a reasonable apprehension of force, and the means of coercion are at hand, a person may be as effectually restrained and deprived of liberty as by prison bars.

Same—submission—question for jury.

2. Where a plaintiff in an action for false imprisonment has submitted to the defendant, it is a question for the jury whether the submission was voluntary or brought about by fear that force would be used, unless it is clear that there was no reasonable apprehension of force.

Same—stripping prisoner.

3. An officer who has no warrant for arrest is not justified in compelling a person whom he may suspect of larceny to strip naked for the purpose of a search.

Swayze, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for false imprisonment. A nonsuit was ordered at the trial, for the 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

reason that the restraint complained of was thought to be due to the voluntary act of the plaintiff. The facts as testified to by the plaintiff are as follows: She was a domestic servant in the employ of Helen Sands and Elizabeth Sands, two of the defendants. Helen had lost a diamond ring. Pulis, the other defendant, known to the plaintiff as a police officer, was called in. In the presence of the Misses Sands, he asked the plaintiff if she had the ring. She denied having it. After further talk, Pulis said: "I want you to go upstairs and strip yourself to your hide."

What further happened is thus told by the plaintiff:

I said: "Do you mean to say I have got the ring?" I said: "I don't know anything about that ring, and you have no right to say so." And when I said that he said: "Don't you tell me what you don't know. You do what I tell you." He said: "Don't you dare to dictate to me what I have no right to do." And he shook his finger in my face and he said: "We are going to search every piece of clothing you own." And I went out in the hall, and I said, "My key is downstairs, to the door," and I went down to get it, went down there and got the key, and went back, and then he said, "You go upstairs and strip yourself to the hide," and I went upstairs and sat in the rocking chair, and the three girls stood looking at me, and I was crying, and the detective pulled out everything and looked in the tips of the shoes and the heels, and shook out the stockings, and looked through the bureau drawers and turned everything over, and looked at the letters, and opened the pocketbook, and asked me where I got so much money, and he said, "I am going to find that ring," and then he says, "Now I want you to strip and undress to your hide," and when he said that, and I was crying still, I said, "Do you really mean that I have got to undress?" and he said, "Yes," and with that he stepped out of the room, and Miss Bessie and Ellie followed him. So then Miss Helen was there, and as I took off everything, I took the long skirt off, and let all my other clothes down, and she took up piece by piece and searched it.

Q. Who searched them?

A. Miss Helen.

Q. Where was Mr. Pulis all this time?

A. Standing outside the door.

Q. How do you know?

A. Because I could hear him. The door was open.

Q. Did you take your shoes and stockings off?

A. I did; and when she had searched everything, she said, "I have searched everything, and I cannot find the ring on her," and the detective stepped inside the sill of the door, and he said, "Are you stripped right down to the hide," and I said, "Yes sir," and then he said, "All right," and then he said, "yes, you can get dressed now."

Q. How long did he stay there in the room after that?

A. He just stayed long enough to look at me, and then said I could dress.

The question presented to us is whether, upon this evidence, it appears so conclusively that the plaintiff's conduct was voluntary that a jury would not have been justified in finding that she was under constraint. Our view differs from that taken at the trial. The fact that Pulis was a police officer and known to the plaintiff to be such; that she was confronted, not only by him, but her employers; that she was suspected of larceny for which the officer might arrest her if he had reasonable ground to believe that the crime had been committed,—warranted her in believing that, if she failed to submit to Pulis's demand, she would be actually arrested. The emphatic language in which the officer commanded her to strip to the hide was calculated to terrorize a girl in her situation; and the very fact that the officer, wholly without right, asserted such authority and gave such a command justifies the inference that he and his employers and co-defendants intended to terrorize the plaintiff and to secure the effect of a search without legal process. If it was only intended to secure the consent of the plaintiff to a thorough search, the presence of the police officer was quite unnecessary. The appeal of the Misses Sands would have been as persuasive as the command of the officer, but for his seeming authority. We think the case at least presents a question for the jury, and that the reason given by the learned trial judge is not sufficient to justify his conclusion. We think, further, that the nonsuit cannot be sustained on any other ground. There is, indeed, no proof that the defendants laid hands on the plaintiff; but that is unnecessary. Whatever doubt may have been thrown upon this question by some of the earlier English cases is now removed by the later authorities. Grainger v. Hill, 4 Bing. N. C. 212; Warner v. Riddiford, 4 C. B. N. S. 180. The American cases are to the same effect. Gold v. Bissell, 1 Wend. 210, 19 Am. Dec. 480; Pike v. Hanson, 9 N. H. 491; Brushaber v. Stegemann, 22 Mich. 266; Johnson v. Tompkins, Baldw. 571, 601, 602, Fed. Cas. No. 7,416.

The essential thing is the constraint of the person. This constraint may be caused by threats, as well as by actual force; and the threats may be by conduct or by words. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

If the words or conduct are such as to induce a reasonable apprehension of force, and the means of coercion are at hand, a person may be as effectually restrained and deprived of liberty as by prison bars. Unless it is clear that there is no reasonable apprehension of force, it is a question for the jury whether the submission was a voluntary act, or brought about by fear that force would be used. No doubt cases may arise where it will be a question of difficulty to determine how far the free will of the plaintiff was overcome; but that determination rests with the jury. That the imprisonment was without right, and therefore false, must be assumed as the case stood when the nonsuit was ordered. No justification then appeared. The officer was without a warrant as far as we know. He seems to have been also without reasonable grounds to believe that a felony had been committed; for, after the search of the plaintiff's person, he was asked what else he would do with her, to which he replied: "I cannot lock her up. She has not got it on her." Upon the plaintiff's case it appears that the defendants themselves recognized that they had, at the time, no reasonable ground for suspecting the plaintiff of larceny, and that they were then seeking evidence which might give them ground of suspicion. But, even if the case had been such that the officer would have been justified in arresting without a warrant, we think he was not justified in compelling the plaintiff to strip naked. Whether he would have been justified in carrying a search of the person to that point if he had had a warrant is a question not presented. The fact that the officer went to this length might suffice to render him a trespasser ab initio. The other defendants stood by, and apparently assented to his conduct and took part in the search. They are therefore liable to the same extent as he.

The judgment must be reversed, and the record remitted for a new trial.

ROSENA E. GROVER, Resp't.,

v.

JAMES E. ZOOK, Appt.

(— Wash. —, 87 Pac. 638.)

Breach of promise of marriage—ill health as defense.

A son of consumptive parents will not render himself liable in damages for re-

Case Note.—Ill health as defense to an action for breach of promise to marry: — There are but few cases in which the tusal to perform his promise to marry a woman afflicted with pulmonary consumption, although he knew at the time of making the promise that she was so afflicted,—at least where such marriage would violate the spirit of the statute against the spread of such disease.

(November 24, 1906.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for breach of promise of marriage. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John E. Humphries, George B. Cole, and William E. Humphrey, for appellant:

question as to the ill health of the plaintiff as a defense to an action for breach of promise has been considered. It is clear, however, that the fact that the plaintiff is suffering from a disease which would render marital relations dangerous to the health of either party, or would involve grave danger of tainted offspring, will constitute a good defense to such an action,—at least if the plaintiff's condition was not known to the defendant at the time of his promise. The only reason for doubt as to the correct rule of law to be applied to the facts in GROVER v. ZOOK arises from the fact, assumed to be such for the purposes of the case, that plaintiff's condition was known to the defendant at the time he made the promise. As suggested in the opinion, the facts undoubtedly presented a proper case for the application of the maxim that a bad promise is better broken than kept. This, however, merely touches the morality of the defendant's conduct in breaking his promise, and it does not necessarily follow, from the fact that the circumstances acquitted the defendant of any moral dereliction in failing to keep his promise, that they ought to relieve him from legal liability in the premises. Damages for breach of promise to marry are doubtless to be regarded as a substitute for the performance of the promise, and there may be a logical difficulty in holding one liable in damages for breach of a promise which, in the interests of morality and public interest, he ought not to keep. The defendant, however, in such a case, while not at fault in failing to keep his promise, is in fault in making the promise with a knowledge of the plaintiff's condition; and the logical difficulty in permitting a recovery by the plaintiff might, perhaps, if she were herself free from fault, be avoided by treating the making of the promise as a wrong to her and the basis of the action, and its breach as a mere condition or occasion of the injury. Even in this view there is a serious objection, arising from public policy, to allowing a recovery, for the reason that liability to pecuniary damages in the event of his refusal may

If the condition of the parties has so changed that the marriage state would endanger the life or health of either, a breach of the contract is excusable.

This court knows judicially that offspring from consumptives have what is known as the hereditary taint of consumption in them, and are liable to become consumptives.

influence one to perform a promise which, in the interests of morality and public policy, ought not to be kept. Conceding, however, the premise of the court's argument in this case, namely, that a marriage in view of the physical condition of the parties, which was known at the time of the promise, would be contrary to public policy, it would seem that the decision against the plaintiff might have been safely and securely put upon the ground that the promise itself was invalid as opposed to public policy, and that the plaintiff was in pari delicto, since she doubtless knew at least as much about her own condition as the defendant. As subsequently shown, the rule as thus far applied, which relieves defendant from liability when he is himself suffering from a disease which would render marital relations dangerous to himself or to the plaintiff, or would involve danger of tainted offspring, has been limited to cases where the defendant was not aware of his condition at the time of the promise; and there is at least an implication in the cases that he would be liable, notwithstanding such condition, if it were known to him at the time he made the promise. The distinction between such a case, however, assuming that the plaintiff did not know of the defendant's condition, and a case like GROVER v. ZOOK, is apparent, since in the former case there would be no ground for holding the plaintiff in pari delicto.

It may, perhaps, be argued against denying recovery upon the ground that the promise was contrary to public policy and the parties in pari delicto, that, while the marriage of persons in the physical condition of the parties to this action may be opposed to public policy, yet the marriage, if contracted, would not have been invalid for that reason; and that the court cannot properly refuse, upon the ground of public policy, to grant relief for the breach of an executory contract to do an act which would not of itself be illegal or invalid. It may be said in reply to this argument, however, that, assuming the premise that it is contrary to public policy for such parties to marry, the reason why the marriage, if actually contracted, would have been held valid, is that the public policy which regards the sacredness and integrity of the marriage relation in this instance overrides the public policy which discountenances the contracting of a marriage between such parties.

The point decided in GROVER v. ZOOK does not seem to have been presented in just the same form in any of the other cases in which the plaintiff's physical condition was relied upon as a defense.

In Walker v. Johnson, 6 Ind. App. 600, 33 N. E. 267, 34 N. E. 100, a substantial recovery by plaintiff was upheld, notwithstanding that it appeared that for some time prior to the courtship, and during the same, she suffered from epilepsy or nervous convulsions, of which fact the defendant was informed during the courtship. In this case, however, the plaintiff's condition was not pleaded as a bar, and the evidence was relied upon merely in support of the defense of no contract and mitigation. The court, after stating that, if two parties make a contract to marry in the future, knowing all the facts about each other's physical, mental, moral, and social conditions, on a breach thereof the jury have the right to consider such conditions in ascertaining the amount of the recovery, said: "Such conditions, under some circumstances when pleaded, will bar a recovery entirely; and in all cases, whether pleaded or not, they are proper in mitigation." Here is, perhaps, a slight intimation that defendant's knowledge, at the time of the promise, of the plaintiff's condition, would not preclude the defense.

In Gring v. Lerch, 112 Pa. 244, 56 Am. Rep. 314, 3 Atl. 841, where the defendant successfully asserted as a defense that the plaintiff's physical condition was such as not to permit of sexual intercourse, even though it was possible to remove the condition by a surgical operation, the defendant adhered to his promise for some time after he was informed of the plaintiff's condition; but this was in reliance upon her promise to submit to an operation.

In Goddard v. Westcott, 82 Mich. 180, 46 N. W. 242, the decision was that it was 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Mr. John B. Hart, for respondent:

If a person were bedridden it would be a sufficient justification to postpone the marriage ceremony; but it would not be a justification for the breach of the contract.

Nothing will excuse the defendant for the breach of his promise, except such a disease or complication of diseases as renders the making of the marriage contract and the consummation of the marriage by marital intercourse impossible.

competent, under the general issue, to show by plaintiff, on cross-examination, that at the time of the engagement she was suffering from a disease which physically disqualified her from entering into the marriage state, and concealed that fact from defendant. The court said that, if such facts appeared from plaintiff's own testimony, they would show a fraud which, even in the absence of any defense, would prevent her from recovering anything except possibly nominal damages.

In Vierling v. Binder, 113 Iowa, 337, 85 N. W. 621, the court said that it was no doubt true that physical defects or disease which incapacitate the woman for the marriage state or the birth of children, if unknown to the other party at the time the contract was entered into, may be pleaded and proved in bar to an action for breach of promise; but such defense is not available where the diseased condition was pleaded merely as tending to show that no contract was made, and not as a bar.

In Kantzier v. Grant, 2 Ill. App. 236, it was held error to refuse an instruction, requested by the defendant, to the effect that it would be a defense if the plaintiff was suffering from a venereal disease of which the defendant was not aware and the existence of which he had no reason to suspect at the time of the promise, or to modify it so as to make the defendant's right to rely upon the defense conditional upon his having based his refusal to marry the plaintiff upon that ground.

It is a good defense to an action for breach that, after the promise and without the defendant's consent, the plaintiff voluntarily permitted an unnecessary surgical operation by which she was rendered unable to procreate or bear children. Edmonds v. Hughes, 115 Ky. 561, 74 S. W. 283.

In Atchison v. Baker, 2 Peake, N. P. Add. Cas. 103, Lord Kenyon decided that a woman was justified in refusing to perform her prior promise to marry a man, upon discovering that he had an abscess in his breast.

It will be observed that the cases above cited lend very little, if any, affirmative support for the defense where the defendant

Root, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action by respondent to recover damages against appellant for breach of contract of marriage. From a judgment in favor of respondent, the case comes here on appeal.

The principal defense urged by appellant is that respondent, at the time of the mutual promises of marriage, was afflicted with pulmonary tuberculosis (commonly called consumption) in an incurable form, and has ever since been physically incapable of entering into the marriage relation. It was the contention of the respondent in the trial court and here that this condition of respondent constitutes no defense to her action, for the reason that appellant knew thereof at the time he promised to marry her. It is admitted by respondent that she was afflicted with this disease at the time the engagement of marriage was entered into, although she claims that she did not know at that time that the malady affecting her was consumption. There is a conflict in the evidence as to whether or not appellant knew of the character of her illness at the time of the engagement. He swears that he did not. The question of whether or not he did turns upon the queswas aware of the plaintiff's condition at the time of the promise. As already intimated, however, there seems to be a substantial ground for denying recovery in such a case if the plaintiff knew of her own condition, and that condition was such as to make it contrary to public policy for the parties to marry.

The weight of authority holds that the fact that the defendant is suffering from a disease, not known to him at the time of the promise, but which, without any intervening fault on his part, supervened or developed after the promise, of a nature rendering it improper for him to assume marital relations, is a complete defense to an action for breach of promise, even though it is not such as would absolutely prevent the consummation of the marriage, or, in the absence of fraud, furnish ground for a decree of nullity or a divorce.

In Trammell v. Vaughan, 158 Mo. 214, 51 L.R.A. 854, 81 Am. St. Rep. 302, 59 S. W. 79, referred to in the opinion in the reported case, the decision was that a man engaged to marry, in whom there subsequently appears, without any intervening fault on his part, a loathsome venereal and contagious disease, which renders it unsafe or improper for him to marry, is entitled to postpone the marriage until he is cured if the disease is of a temporary character, and to refuse to carry out the contract if the disease is permanent.

In Sanders v. Coleman, 97 Va. 690, 47 L. R.A. 581, 34 S. E. 621, also referred to in the reported case, the decision was that a man is excused for breach of a contract of marriage when, after it was made, he, without fault on his part, developed a grave malady of such a character that marriage would endanger his life or health.

In Gardner v. Arnett, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1, 50 S. W. 840, the reappearance after the promise, and without any intervening fault on defendant's part, of syphilis, which he had contracted a considerable time before the engagement, but of which he in good faith believed he had been cured, was held to be a good defense.

Ky. 80, 15 L.R.A. 531, 40 Am. St. Rep. 166, 19 S. W. 5, and Allen v. Barker, 86 N. C. 91, 41 Am. Rep. 444, involved substantially the same state of facts as the last case; and the decisions therein are to the same effect.

It will be observed that the foregoing cases holding that the physical condition of the defendant rendering marriage improper will relieve him from liability for breach of his promise to marry make his ignorance of his condition at the time of his engagement a condition of the application of the rule. Some of them expressly state that, if he knew of his condition at the time of the promise, it will not constitute a defense.

Thus, the court, in Allen v. Barker, supra, while holding that the defendant's physical condition would constitute a defense if he believed in good faith at the time of the promise that he had been cured, said: "If knowing, or by using extraordinary diligence he might have known, that his infirmity was incurable or of long duration, he entered into a contract with the plaintiff, his subsequent incapacity to perform it would furnish no excuse for its breach,—so far from it, it would amount to a gross aggravation."

So, in Trammell v. Vaughan, supra, it was said, obiter: "Of course, if . . . [he had] entered into the contract knowing of such an impediment to its consummation, it would be an aggravation of the plaintiff's damages, and she would be entitled to refuse to marry him and to treat his condition as a breach of the contract,—a fraud perpetrated upon her."

In Gardner v. Arnett, supra, however, it was held that the fact that the defendant, after learning of his condition and talking the matter over with the plaintiff, expressed a willingness to keep his promise, did not deprive him of the right to rely upon the defense, as there was not a new contract to marry.

The only case in which the defense has been held good notwithstanding the defendant's knowledge of his condition at the time he made the promise is Gulick v. Gulick, 41 N. J. L. 13, holding that defendant, who, by reason of a surgical operation before the tion as to when the engagement took place. He claims that they became engaged on the evening of the 6th of January, 1904. She and her mother and stepfather claim that the engagement did not take place until the 10th of January, 1904. It appears that they had some talk about the matter on the evening of January 6th, and it is admitted that she at that time took from her finger a ring, and gave it to him to take to the jeweler's to be used as a measurement for an engagement ring. He took the ring, used it for that purpose, and presented her with the engagement ring on the next Sunday, January 10th. Her mother and stepfather testify that on the latter date they informed appellant that the ailment from which respondent was suffering was consumption, that this information was given him while she was not present, that he said he would marry her notwithstanding this, and that it was then planned by them that she should be sent to Arizona, where it was believed that the climate would cure or ameliorate her diseased condition. Appellant denies that he knew of the character of her ailment until after she had gone to Arizona. Her mother testified that she informed respondent of the nature of the malady after she reached Arizona. A correspondence was maintained during the time she was there, between herself and appellant; he making her many suggestions as to taking care of herself, and as to the character of treatment

she should follow, and sending her books and pamphlets giving such information and directions. She returned in the following April much improved, as she believed. However, she had an attack of appendicitis, necessitating an operation, which seriously weakened her. She was in the hospital sixteen days on account of this operation, leaving there on the 16th of May. It was understood between them that their marriage was to take place in June. On account of her physical condition in June, it was mutually agreed that the marriage should be postponed until autumn. When the latter season arrived, she and her parents requested appellant to carry out his promise of marriage. It seems that there had been an understanding between them that they would get married and attend the World's Fair in St. Louis, in September or October. She and her parents urged upon appellant the carrying out of this plan. He insisted that she was physically unable to be married, but that he would marry her when she recovered. The controversy growing out of the matter occasioned strained relations between the parents and appellant, and he visited their home seldom thereafter. Finally, in December, 1904, he wrote respondent a letter in effect expressing a desire to terminate the engagement.

Upon the trial there was some indefiniteness in the evidence as to the seriousness of her condition. She admitted upon the wit-engagement, knew that he was sexually impotent, could rely upon such condition as a defense. It appeared in this case, however, that plaintiff knew of the defendant's infirmity, although the decision is not expressly put upon the ground that the parties were in pari delicto, but upon the ground that defendant could not bind himself to enter into a marriage which, by force of its own inherent conditions, might be declared by the chancellor to be void ab initio, and, that having made such a promise, he had a locus penitentiae, and could repudiate it without subjecting himself to a liability to be sued.

It will also be noted that in a number of the cases above cited, in which the defendant's physical condition was held to constitute a good defense, it appeared that his condition was due to his own fault preceding the promise of marriage. That fact, however, was not regarded as affecting his right to avail himself of the defense so long as it was not due to any fault on his part after the promise. Commenting upon this point, the court, in Allen v. Barker, supra, said: "We are not unmindful of the fact that the malady under which the party in this instance labored was the legitimate result of his own imprudence; . . . but, if contracted when he owed no duty to the plaintiff, we cannot see how that can vary the case."

In none of the foregoing cases, with the exception of Gulick v. Gulick, supra, was the physical condition of the plaintiff or defendant such as to prevent a consummation of the marriage, or, in the absence of fraudulent concealment, to furnish a ground for a decree of nullity or a divorce. In Gring v. Lerch, 112 Pa. 244, 56 Am. Rep. 314, 3 Atl. 841, it was expressly said that an impediment to sexual intercourse, arising from the plaintiff's physical condition, need not be such as would sustain an action for divorce after marriage, in order to constitute a defense to an action for breach of promise.

In Smith v. Compton, 67 N. J. L. 548, 58 L.R.A. 480, 52 Atl. 386, however, it is held that nothing will excuse the defendant for breach of promise of marriage except such a disease, or complication of diseases, as renders the making of the marriage contract and the consummation of the marriage by marital intercourse impossible.

The ground and scope of this decision are indicated by the following quotation from the charge of the trial court, which was apparently approved by the supreme court: "The extent to which the evidence for the defense goes is that the consummation of the marriage would be attended with imminent hazard to the defendant's life. However unfortunate that may be for the defendant, assuming it to be true, it is no

ness stand that for about a year prior to the time of the trial she had been sleeping out of doors on the porch at the side of the house, in order to have the benefit of the open air; that while in Arizona she had lived most of the time in a tent, being much of the time confined to her bed, and having night sweats and a cough, and having had several "fainting spells;" that since her return she had been free from the night sweats, but still had the cough; that she had continuously followed, and was then following, the directions and treatment recommended by appellant and the books he had furnished her; that she was taking cod-liver oil and practising the "breathing exercises." The doctors who attended her at the hospital made an examination and found that she was at that time afflicted with pulmonary tuberculosis. One physician who examined her a few days before the trial, at the request of her attorney, testified that she at that time had the disease. In fact, it was not disputed that she had never recovered since the engagement; but she believed herself to be much improved over her condition as it was when she started for Arizona. Her stepfather testified that their family physician had said that he did not deem it advisable for her to get married. Appellant testified that his father and mother had died from this disease, and that he had for many years practised "breathing exercises" for self-protection therefrom. He urged that, by reason of the diseased condition of respondent and of the taint in himself, the proper functions of marriage could not be consummated, and that their marriage would be detrimental to the health of her, himself, and any issue they might have, and in contravention of public policy.

As to the question of the date of the engagement, and as to whether or not he knew of her having consumption at the time he became engaged to her, while the evidence would seem to make his version reasonable, yet, as the jury evidently reached the other conclusion, we will accept their finding as correct. The trial court ruled upon the evidence, and instructed the jury upon the theory that the appellant was liable for a breach of the agreement, if, at the time of the making thereof, he knew the character of appellant's ailment. Proper exceptions. In different form, questioned the correctness of this view. The question presented to the court is this: Did appellant, under the circumstances, have a legal right to disregard the promise of marriage he had given respondent? In the domain of morals it is a maxim that a bad promise is better broken than kept. Moral considerations must have a predominating influence upon such a question as now confronts us. In fact, they constitute the reason, the basis, and the life of the law applicable in a case of this character. The most profound philosophers join with the wisest statesmen in maintaining defense to this action. The defendant has made the contract; he has failed to perform it; he must pay the damages for that failure. Contracts the performance of which involves imminent hazard to life are not infrequent. No one would think of excusing a locomotive engineer, or the captain of a ship, from the performance of his duty because of an unexpected danger to his life in the performance." This decision which is referred by the court to the general rule established in New Jersey, that, if the party enters into an absolute contract without any qualification or exception, he must abide by the contract, and either do the act or pay the damages, is diametrically opposed to the cases above cited, many of which are expressly disapproved in the opinion. It is intimated in the opinion that, if properly pleaded, the defendant's physical condition, though not such as to render him incapable of consummating the marriage, might avail him as a justification for postponing the marriage. The court said, however, that in the case at bar the notice to which, by the express provisions of the statute, the defendant is confined, did not set up that he recognized the continued existence of the contract binding him to perform when his disability was removed, and that he was ready to do so; and that therefore the right to postpone as a substantive defense and bar to the action could not be considered.

The court, in Smith v. Compton, supra, relied to a considerable extent upon the case of Hall v. Wright, El. Bl. & El. 746. As pointed out in a note to 15 L.R.A. 531, however, that case was decided against strong dissent, the judges of the court of Queen's bench being equally divided, and the judges of the exchequer chamber standing four to three against the right of the defendant to set up his own physical defects as a bar to the action.

The question whether the physical condition of the defendant is available as a defense to such an action was not considered in Mabin v. Webster, 129 Ind. 430, 28 Am. St. Rep. 199, 28 N. E. 863, for the reason that it was not expressly pleaded as a defense. The court, alluding to the paragraph of the answer in which the defendant attempted to plead that he was afflicted with epilepsy, rendering it unsafe and improper for him to make the marriage contract, said that the paragraph was so indefinite and defective in its allegations as to be clearly bad, even if the defense attempted to be pleaded would be good if properly pleaded. It was held, however, that it was competent for the defendant, in mitigation of damages, to prove his physical condition, and that marriage would have an injurious effect upon him, and probably shorten his life.

the proposition that the home is the unit of the state, and that the character of a people and the stability and welfare of the nation must largely depend upon the healthful and wholesome influence of the home life. By reason of this, we find the home and the members thereof, especially the young and dependent, sheltered by the protecting care of various statutes, all being evidences and expressions of that public policy which deems the home and its inmates appropriate objects of the solicitude and care of the state. The paramount consideration involved in the determination of this case is not that appertaining solely to the parties to this action (although as to each of them it is of great importance), but it is as to the community, the state, and to humanity in general. Here we have a man and woman engaged to be married. The man is of a family several members of which have died with pulmonary consumption. The woman is afflicted with the same disease to such an extent that it becomes necessary for her to go to a distant portion of the country to recuperate, which she does, returning with the affliction still upon her, and with small, if any, assurances of recovery. Under these circumstances, if the marriage were to be consummated, what would be the natural consequences to be anticipated? Unconditional promises of marriage, exchanged by a man and woman, imply respectively that each is physically, morally, and legally competent to enter the status of matrimony, and capable, in so far as he or she knows or has reason to believe, of effectuating the principal purposes of the marriage relation. One of the most important functions of wedlock is the procreation of children. Offspring are the natural result, and oftentimes the chief purpose, of marriage. That the thought of bringing a child into the world should be one of the most serious that can engage the mind of a human being needs but to be suggested. Born amidst the most favorable environment, there lies before every babe a life of uncertainty so great that no worthy parent may contemplate it without a tremor of apprehension. Thus launched upon the sea of time and eternity, what parent can dwell upon the birth of his child without the keenest sense of anxiety and responsibility? If the child born in health and with a body of vigor be a matter of deep concern to a parent, what must be said of the advent of a babe burdened with the hereditary plague of consumption? That pulmonary tuberculosis is both contagious and hereditary, as well as infectious, admits of little, if any, doubt. That a mother seriously ill with that disease and a father with a hereditary taint thereof in his blood could bring forth a child exempt therefrom is unbelievable. For parents thus afflicted to bring into the world a child would be not only detrimental to the welfare of the state and an offense to the instincts of humanity, but it would be, as against the innocent babe, a moral wrong most abhorrent. Such a child must of necessity be a burden to itself and others, and devoid of the joys and blessings that make life endurable. In declining to carry out his promise of marriage, it may be presumed that appellant apprehended the natural and legitimate consequences of such a union. In addition to the thought of progeny, there would be, also, that of the aggravation of the disease as to both himself and prospective wife, the medical expert evidence showing that the intimate association of married life would tend to augment the ravages of the malady upon each.

The apprehension felt by the people of this state from the disease under consideration is evidenced by a statute enacted by the legislature in 1899, entitled: "An Act to Prevent the spread of Tuberculosis," etc. Laws 1899, chap. 71, p. 117. Section 5 of that statute reads as follows: "It is hereby made the duty of every person having tuberculosis, and of everyone attending such person, and of the authorities of public and private institutions, hospitals, or dispensaries, to observe and enforce the sanitary rules and regulations prescribed from time to time by the boards of health of such cities and of the state for the prevention of the spread of pulmonary tuberculosis." Other statutes exist, having for their purpose the prevention of the spread of this and other contagious and infectious diseases. The enforcement of certain rules, and the distribution of literature giving information as to the prevention and treatment of such cases, is enjoined upon boards of health and others. Such a document is the "Circular of Information to Prevent the Spread of Consumption," which is now before us. Besides much other information and many directions, it contains the following items: "Consumption is the most common and the most fatal of all diseases. It is a disease of the lungs caused by a germ which is breathed into the lungs or gets into the body with food. This germ of consumption comes only from some other person or animal that has the disease. . . . A consumptive should never sleep in the same bed with another person. . . . A consumptive mother should never nurse her baby; it is bad for the mother and dangerous for the baby. A consumptive should not cook or prepare food for others. . . . When a consumptive moves to another house, notify the health authorities by phone or card, so that they can see that the old home is properly disinfected according to law. Do not share a consumptive's bed, or use the personal property, including dishes, belonging to one."

In the face of legal restrictions and requirements of this character, it is difficult to understand how a man or woman afflicted with this plague may legally insist upon the fulfilment of a promise of marriage, which, if consummated, would endanger the health and life of both and blight the life of any offspring that might be born. Any person entering marriage, knowing himself to be seriously afflicted with pulmonary tuberculosis, violates the spirit, if not the exact letter, of the statutes enacted to prevent the spread of that disease. The same is true of one who marries another knowing him or her to be thus afflicted. An agreement which, if executed, would thwart the beneficent purpose of such statutes, ought not to be held binding. The principles we believe controlling here have been recognized and enunciated by the courts in several of our sister states. The supreme court of appeals of Virginia, in the case of Sanders v. Coleman, 97 Va. 690, 47 L.R.A. 581, 34 S. E. 621, made use of the following expressions: "Under the expression 'the act of God' is comprehended all misfortunes and accidents arising from inevitable necessity which human prudence could not foresee or prevent. Hence, it is held that 'illness,' being beyond the power of man to control or prevent, is the act of God. Story, Bailments, §§ 25, 511; Fish v. Chapman, 2 Ga. 349, 46 Am. Dec. 393; Gleeson v. Virginia Midland R. Co. 140 U. S. 435, 35 L. ed. 458, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 859. It can no longer be doubted that, if the performance of a contract is rendered impossible by the act of God alone, such fact will furnish a valid excuse for its nonperformance, and such a stipulation will be understood to be an inherent part of every contract. This principle it would seem, should apply with peculiar force to a marriage contract, the performance of which, owing to causes subsequently intervening, and altogether independent of any default of the party, might result in consequences disastrous to the life or health of the parties, or either of them. We hold, therefore, that a contract to marry is coupled with the implied condition that both of the parties shall remain in the enjoyment of life and health; and, if the condition of the parties has so changed that the marriage state would endanger the life or health of either, a breach of the contract is excusable. Allen v. Baker, 86 N. C. 91, 41 Am. Rep. 444; Shackleford v. Hamilton, 93 Ky. 80, 15 L.R.A. 531, 40 Am. St. Rep. 166, 19 S. W. 5; Bishop, Marr. & Div. § 219. In the case at bar, the evidence, as to which, in our opinion, there is no real conflict, shows that there was a predisposition, in the defendant's family, to physical trouble of the kind that had developed with him; that his father had died with a similar disease, and a brother with urinary trouble; that after his engagement with the plaintiff, and before the time fixed for the marriage, the defendant had, without fault on his part, developed and was suffering with a grave malady, involving the urinary organs, . . . and that an indulgence in sexual intercourse would aggravate his disease, and likely shorten his life; and that it would be not only a wrong and injustice to the defendant, but also to the plaintiff, for him to marry in his condition of health. Marriage is assumed in law to be made for mutual comfort. The condition of the defendant precludes any hope of mutual comfort from cohabitation. . . . Our conclusion upon the law and the evidence is that the defendant acted throughout with good faith, and that the unhappy circumstances in which he found himself justified the alleged breach of his contract to marry the plaintiff." What was there said becomes particularly pertinent to the case at bar; the evidence of the medical experts here being to the effect that copulation would be exceedingly detrimental to one afflicted as was respondent.

Applicable in principle, also, is the case of Shackleford v. Hamilton, supra, which was based upon facts about as follows: Appellant, prior to his engagement to respondent, had contracted syphilis, but believed at the time of his engagement that he was thoroughly and permanently cured thereof. Some time after his engagement to respondent the effects of this disease again manifested themselves in so serious a form that physicians said it was doubtless incurable. Thereupon appellant informed respondent that he could not marry her. She declined to release him from his promise, and instituted an action for damages. The supreme court of Kentucky, in passing upon the case, said: "When the marriage contract is consummated, the parties taking each other for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer, and agree to cherish each other in sickness and in health, the fact that the social standing of the one party or the other, or their pecuniary condition, was not as represented, will afford no ground for relief; still, when there is a mere agreement to marry, there may be such a condition of the one party or the other as to health or other bodily infirmity arising subsequent to the agreement as would authorize either party to decline to enter into the marriage relation; and to hold otherwise would be to place such a contract upon the same footing with cases of mere personal chattels. . . . The text-books establish the doctrine that 'without sexual intercourse the ends of marriage, the procreation of children and the pleasure and enjoyments of matrimony, cannot be attained.' The first cause and reason of matrimony, says Ayliffe, 'ought to be the design of having offspring; so the second ought to be the avoiding of fornication. And the law recognizes these two as its principal ends, namely, a lawful indulgence of the passions to prevent licentiousness, and the procreation of children, according to the evident design of Divine Providence.' 1 Bishop, Marr. & Div. 6th ed. 322. . . . It is impossible for the defendant to fulfil his contract. His disease renders him incapable of marriage without actual damage to the life of the woman he marries by communicating to her and through her to their offspring a loathsome disease that is now, from the testimony in the case, gradually destroying this unfortunate man. . . . No greater crime in law or morals could have been committed by the appellant than a performance of his agreement. The purity of our social system, the interest of the public in preserving sacred the marital relation, the protection of those whose existence may spring from such an unholy alliance, as well as the future welfare and happiness of the parties themselves, require that such a construction should be given this class of contracts; and, if there was no precedent for the recognition of the doctrine announced, we would not hesitate to make one." The same court, in a subsequent case (Gardner v. Arnett, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1, 50 S. W. 840), approved the decision and reasoning of the case just cited, and, as to the case before it, observed: "He [defendant] owed it to the plaintiff and society to refuse to enter into marriage relations with her, and he had the right to abandon the contract and refuse to marry her at any time before their marriage was solemnized." In Ryder v. Ryder, 66 Vt. 159, 44 Am. St. Rep. 833, 28 Atl. 1029, the supreme court of Vermont annulled a marriage because the wife had a venereal disease endangering the health of her husband and any children she might bear. To the same effect, in principle, were the decisions in Smith v. Smith, 171 Mass. 404, 41 L.R.A. 800, 68 Am. St. Rep. 440, 50 N. E. 933; McMahon v. McMahon, 186 Pa. 485, 41 L.R.A. 802, 40 Atl. 795; Svenson v. Svenson, 178 N. Y. 54, 70 N. E. 120; and Martin v. Martin, 54 W. Va. 301, 46 S. E. 120. In the case of Goddard v. Westcott, 82 Mich. 180, 46 N. W. 242, the supreme court of Michigan said: "While it is the policy of the law to encourage marriage, it is not the policy of the law to encourage unhappy marriages," and the court 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

then, with express approval, quotes from Mr. Schouler, in 7 Southern Law Rev. 65, the following: "The marriage state ought not to be lightly entered into; that it involves the profoundest interests of human life, transmitting its complex influences direct to posterity, and invading the happiness of parents and near kindred. . . . From such a standpoint, we view the marriage engagement as a period of probation, so to speak, for both parties,—their opportunity for finding one another out; and, if that probation results in developing incompatibility of tastes and temperament, coldness, suspicion, and incurable repugnance of one to the other, though all this may impute no vice to either, nor afford matter for judicial demonstration, duty requires that the match be broken off." In the case of Allen v. Baker, 86 N. C. 91, 41 Am. Rep. 444, the supreme court of North Carolina spoke as follows: "We cannot understand how one can be liable for not fulfilling a contract, when the very performance thereof would in itself amount to a great crime, not only against the individual, but against society itself. . . . It is likewise true that whenever the main part of an executory contract becomes impossible of performance from any cause beyond the power of the party to control, it will be treated as having become impossible in toto. Why should not the same principle apply to a contract, the fulfilment of which, owing to causes subsequently intervening and altogether independent of any default of the party, can only be productive of consequences disastrous to the parties themselves, and such as may entail misery upon others to come after them? . . . The usual, and we may say legitimate, objects sought to be attained by such agreements to marry, are, the comfort of association,—the consortium vitæ, as it is called in the books; the gratification of the natural passions rendered lawful by the union of the parties; and the procreation of children. And, if either party should thereafter become, by the act of God and without fault on his own part, unfit for such a relation, and incapable of performing the duties incident thereto, then the law will excuse a noncompliance with the promise,—the main part of the contract having become impossible of performance, the whole will be considered to be so." In Trammell v. Vaughan, 158 Mo. 214, 51 L.R.A. 854, 81 Am. St. Rep. 302, 59 S. W. 79, the supreme court of Missouri employed this language: "Marriage is a contract; but it is not merely a civil contract, for it can only be entered into in a manner recognized by law, and can only be dissolved in a like manner. The state is the third party to every such contract, and has a direct interest therein.

Blank v. Nohl, 112 Mo., loc. cit. 167, 18 L. R.A. 350, 20 S. W. 477; State v. Bittick, 103 Mo. 183, 11 L.R.A. 587, 23 Am. St. Rep. 869, 15 S. W. 325. Certain marriages are prohibited by law because of their detrimental effects upon society and the human species. Every contract of marriage implies that the contracting parties know of no legal or physical impediment to the contractual relation and its consequences. . . . If the disease is of a temporary character,—such as was the case here,—and could be easily cured, the defendant is entitled to postpone the marriage until he is cured; and, if the disease is of a permanent character,—such as was the fact in the North Carolina, Kentucky, and Virginia cases cited,—the defendant is not only entitled to refuse to carry out the contract, but it is his duty to do so." In the case of Gring v. Lerch, 112 Pa. 246, 56 Am. Rep. 314, 3 Atl. 841, the supreme court of Pennsylvania spoke as follows: "It is a mistake to suppose, as was assumed in the point, and affirmed by the court, that the impediment must be of such a nature as would be a ground of divorce after marriage. We are not now dealing with a question of divorce. That is a subject that is regulated by statute, and has no necessary relation to the case in hand. We are considering a contract to marry,—a contract which calls for the richest good faith on both sides, and which neither party has the right to enforce against the other if incapable of performing the full marital duties. A man does not court and marry a woman for the mere pleasure of paying for her board and washing. He expects and is entitled to something in return; and if the woman with whom he contracts be incapable, by reason of a natural impediment, of giving him the comfort and satisfaction to which, as a married man, he would be entitled, [then] there is a failure of the moving consideration of such contract, and no court ought to enforce it by giving damages for its breach." In the early case of Atchison v. Baker, 2 Peake, N. P. Add. Cas. 103, Lord Kenyon said: "It would be most mischievous to compel parties to marry who could never live happily together;" and he cites Lord Mansfield as having held, in the case of Foulkes v. Sellway, 3 Esp. 236, that a defendant was not liable in damages for breach of promise where the character of the woman turned out to be different from what he had reason to believe it, and that an infirmity, either bodily or mental, would excuse fulfillment of the marriage agreement.

It is a fundamental proposition that a contract contravening the provisions or policy of a public law is void or voidable. Macintosh v. Renton, 2 Wash. Terr. 121, 3 Pac. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

830; Cannon v. Cannon, 26 N. J. Eq. 316; Bowman v. Gonegal, 19 La. Ann. 328, 92 Am. Dec. 537. Bishop on Contracts, enlarged ed. § 470, reads: "No agreement between parties to do a thing prohibited by law, or subversive of any public interest which the law cherishes, will be judicially enforced." And, at § 473, the following appears "A contract invading any one of the other interests which the law cherishes, though to do what is neither indictable nor prohibited by a statute, termed a contract against public policy (or sound policy), is likewise void." 9 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 481, says this: "If an agreement binds the parties or either of them, or if the consideration is to do something opposed to the public policy of the state or nation, it is illegal and absolutely void, however solemnly made. If a court should enforce such agreements it would employ its functions in undoing what it was created to do. It is not easy to give a precise definition of public policy. It is perhaps correct to say that public policy is that principle of law which holds that no person can lawfully do that which has a tendency to be injurious to the public or against the public good, which may be designated, as it has sometimes been, the policy of the law or public policy in relation to the administration of the law. Where a contract belongs to this class, it will be declared void, although in the particular instance no injury to the public may have resulted. In other words, its validity is determined by its general tendency at the time it is made; and if this is opposed to the interests of the public, it will be invalid, even though the intent of the parties was good and no injury to the public would result in the particular case. The test is the evil tendency of the contract, and not its actual injury to the public in a particular instance." To the same effect, 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 933.

Counsel for respondent cite us to cases where a man, promising to marry a woman whom he knew to have been formerly unchaste, was held to be bound by such promise. Such a case and this are not analogous. There the man by his promise overlooks the former shortcomings of the woman, and it is a matter concerning him only. She would have the ability to, and presumably would, reform and become a good wife and worthy mother. This is to the advantage of society, and not inconsistent with sound public policy, and the law should interpose no hindrance thereto. But a consumptive woman is physically incapable of becoming a healthful companion or the mother of healthy issue. It is not a condition that she voluntarily created or can change at will. The evils to follow her marriage could not be confined to herself and husband, but must of necessity concern and injuriously affect others. The nature and natural sequences of a contract of marriage are such that the state is of necessity a third party to, and interested in, every such agreement. Its interests forbid the enforcement of such a contract between parties physically incapable of making the married state beneficial to themselves or society. We are not disposed to take into consideration any matters personal only to the appellant. If he knew of the nature of respondent's ailment when he agreed to marry her and agreed to make her his wife, notwithstanding the same, he ought not to escape responsibility by reason of any inconvenience affecting only himself. But the interests of the community and state step in, and, with the dictates of humanity, demand that no human compact shall be upheld that has for one of its principal objects the bringing into the world of helpless, hopeless, plague-cursed innocent babes. We can sanction the breaking of a promise and relieve from the terms of a deliberate agreement only when the alternative involves results more deplorable. Had these parties married, it is inconceivable that any of the important ends of marriage could have been attained. It is morally certain that sickness, grief, and sorrow must have been the sequence of such a union. These considerations, with the possibility and probability of issue afflicted with this terrible malady, constrain us to hold that the marriage agreement was not binding,—that it was the privilege of either party to withdraw therefrom. Rule 126 of Greenhood on Public Policy reads as follows: "No one can estop himself from proving facts which will show a contract to be opposed to public policy." It having been the privilege, and, as we believe, the moral and legal duty of appellant to decline to carry out the agreement, he cannot be held responsible in damages for so doing. The following authorities bear on some of the questions here involved: Turnbull v. Farnsworth, 1 Wash. Terr. 444; Standard Furniture Co. v. Van Alstine, 22 Wash. 670, 51 L.R.A. 889, 79 Am. ROSE G. NUSLY et al., Pliffs. in Err.,

CLARENCE CHURCH CURTISS et al.,
Exrs., etc., of Eliza C. Gallup, Deceased, et al.

(— Colo. —, 85 Pac. 846.)

Will—specific legacy—ademption.

A bequest by a woman of all money which may become due from insurance upon her husband's life at the time it shall be actually collected and received by her executors is specific, and adeemed by the collection of the fund by the testatrix and her commingling it with her other funds.

Case Note.—Bequest of policy of insurance, or proceeds thereof, as specific legacy:

—Whether or not a bequest of the proceeds of an insurance policy is a general, demonstrative, or specific legacy becomes an important question whenever there is a contention as to the abatement or ademption thereof. Within which class a given legacy shall fall seems to be a matter altogether of the construction of the will, and is governed entirely by the language used by the testator. If the proceeds of the insurance are bequeathed, and there is no intention upon the part of the testator to give a sum of money, either equivalent to the proceeds of such insurance, or to be paid out of such proceeds; in short, if it is the intention of the testator to give such proceeds only,—a legacy will always be held to be specific.

Accordingly, a legacy is specific which is described in a will as "two certain policies of life insurance, amounting to the sum of twenty thousand dollars, made in my favor by" a certain insurance company, naming it. Platt v. Moore, 1 Dem. 191.

So, in Barker v. Rayner, 5 Madd. 208,

ERROR to the County Court for the City and County of Denver, to review a judgment construing the will of Eliza C. Gallup, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. F. A. Williams, for plaintiffs in error:

This was a demonstrative legacy, not subject to ademption.

Smith, 84 Va. 289, 4 S. E. 717; Hutchinson v. Fuller, 75 Ga. 88; Boykin v. Boykin, 21 S. C. 513; Wheeler v. Hartshorn, 40 Wis. 83; Ives v. Canby, 48 Fed. 718; Clark v. Brown, 2 Smale & G. 524.

The issue was between particular legatees and general legatees. In such case the par-affirmed in 2 Russ. Ch. 122, it was held that the legacy was a specific gift, and failed altogether by the nonexistence of the policies at the death of the testator, where it appeared that he had bequeathed all his "right, title, and interest in two policies of insurance," upon the life of his wife, and he survived his wife and received the amount of the policies before his own death, and appropriated the same to his own use.

But specific legacies are never favored by the courts, and, if it can be gathered from the will that it was the intention of the testator to give the legatee a sum of money rather than the proceeds of the insurance policy, it will be held to be a general, or a demonstrative, legacy, as the case may be.

Accordingly, that is not a specific legacy, but is "rather in the nature of a demonstrative legacy," where a testator bequeaths a certain sum of money, and directs his executor to pay the same, "out of my life insurance money payable to my executor." Byrne v. Hume, 86 Mich. 546, 49 N. W. 576. Here the court thought that it was the intention of the testator that this should be treated as a general legacy, to be paid at all events out of the general assets of the estate, unless the money was collected from his life insurance.

And in Cascaden's Estate, 8 Phila. 582, a legacy was held not to be specific where a testator, after bequeathing certain legacies, made use of the following language in regard to it: "These legacies I desire my executors to pay out of the proceeds of the policy of insurance which I have effected on my life;" and it appeared after his death that he had in fact no policies on his life, except those payable to his wife, the money due upon which had been paid to her. Here the court deemed it unnecessary to decide whether these legacies were general or demonstrative. To quote from the opinion: "Giving the precatory clause desiring payment to be made out of the policy of insurance the force of a binding direction upon the executors, it amounts to nothing more than a gift of money, to be paid out of a particular fund. There is nothing from which it can be inferred that, if that source failed, the testator did not intend the legatees to be the recipients of his bounty. As that intention must appear in the will, in order to constitute the legacy a specific bequest, it is useless to show from the will that it is clear he intended differently.

. . . This clause . . . being simply precatory, it may be doubted whether it controls the character and quality of the . . . legacies; whether, by any binding direction, a fund is designated 'as pointing out the means of payment;' and whether they are not general, instead of demonstrative, legacies. In any event, however, it is clear they are not specific, and therefore not ademed by the failure of the policy of insurance."

And in Re Fisher, 93 App. Div. 186, 87 N. Y. Supp. 567, a legacy was held to be general, and not specific, where a testator bequeathed the contents of a safe-deposit box, consisting of stocks, bonds, mortgages, and life-insurance policies, to several persons in specified proportions, and the respective securities, because of their unequal value, could not be distributed intact to the respective legatees. To quote from the opinion: "The property in the box is required to be divided into twelfths, two shares to go to one person, and one to each of the other persons named therein. The securities which were found in the box were unequal in value. No particular security was bequeathed to a particular person. Each took a twelfth share in the whole, and it is evident that no one of the legatees could have been compelled to take a particular part of the property as his share. There was, therefore, impossibility of distribution of the specific property into twelfths for the purposes of delivery to the respective legatees. The bequest is specific as to the property bequeathed, but it was not specific as to the particular property to be delivered to a particular legatee, nor could it be made such by any division into twelfths, which the will commanded should be done. The bequest partakes more nearly of a general, and also of a demonstrative, legacy, than of a specific legacy. The interest bequeathed is certain and specific, but the necessity of the case required it to be paid from particular property not separated into parts or bequeathed as such. The intention of the testator is clear to give two twelfths of the property to one person and the remaining ten twelfths to the others. As the nature of the property bequeathed and the character of the bequest required its conversion into money before the distribution could be made, it certainly does not answer the definition of a specific legacy."

ticular legacies do not abate until the residuary legacies are exhausted.

Schouler, Exrs. § 490; 2 Wms. Exrs. 1462; Corwine v. Corwine, 23 N. J. Eq. 368; Re Barklay, 10 Pa. 387.

A legacy is demonstrative where money is given out of a specified fund, as in the case of a bequest of a certain sum out of a particular debt due to the testator, or out of designated stocks or other securities.

Ives v. Canby, supra; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. p. 1133; Armstrong's Appeal, 63 Pa. 312; Barker v. Rayner, 2 Russ. Ch. 123, 5 Madd. 209.

Where a pecuniary legacy is given, and a particular fund, stock, or other security, is pointed out in the will to satisfy it, although the fund fails, and the stock or the security changes, is called in, or fails, such bequest is to be made good out of the general assets.

Courts are averse to considering a legacy specific when it may be fairly construed otherwise.

Mr. William W. Field, with Messrs. Wolcott, Vaile & Waterman and H. H. Dunham, for defendants in error:

This was a specific bequest, pure and simple.

Campbell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this proceeding the plaintiffs in error asked for an interpretation of the second clause of the last will of Eliza C. Gallup, deceased, under which they claim as lega-tees. It reads: "Second. Any and all sums of money which may at any time hereafter become due and payable to me or my estate, by or under any insurance policy upon the life of my husband, Francis Gallup, which may heretofore have been insured, payable to me or in my favor, I will and bequeath to the five sisters of my said husband or to such of them as may be living at the time any such insurance moneys shall be actually collected, and received by my executors to be divided equally among said sisters or the survivors of them as hereinbefore provided." The facts pertinent to the only question argued on this review are that before the execution of the will an insurance policy for $5,000 upon the life of Francis Gallup was issued. About a year after its execution he died, and the amount of the policy on his life ($5,000) was received by the testatrix herself in her lifetime, which she commingled with her other funds, and afterwards reinvested. Not only was this amount not actually collected or received by the executors, but it was not traceable or identified in their hands. At the time of the death of the testatrix, which was more than eleven years after the will was executed, the plaintiffs in error, the five sisters of Francis Gallup who were mentioned in the will, were all living.

The only question raised and decided below, and the only one presented here, is as to the nature of this legacy. The plaintiffs in error say that it is a demonstrative legacy, and therefore it was not adeemed by the testatrix in her lifetime. The defendants in error say that it was a specific legacy, and was subject to be, and as a matter of fact was, adeemed by the testatrix in her lifetime by collecting and commingling it with her other funds. It is sufficiently exact for our present purpose to say that a general legacy is one which is payable out of the general assets of a testator's estate, such as a gift of money or other thing in quantity, and not in any way separated or distinguished from other things of like kind. A specific legacy is a gift by will of a specific article, or a particular part of the testator's estate, which is identified and distinguished from all others of the same nature, and which is to be satisfied only by the delivery and receipt of the particular thing given. A demonstrative legacy partakes both of the nature of a general and specific legacy. It is a gift of money or other property charged on a particular fund in such a way as not to amount to a gift of the corpus of the fund, or to evince an intent to relieve the general estate from liability in case the fund fails. A specific bequest is subject to ademption; but such is not true of a general or a demonstrative legacy. The trial court held that this was a specific legacy, and was adeemed by the testatrix in her lifetime. Hence it construed the will as passing nothing to the plaintiffs in error as legatees. We are of opinion that the county court was right in its decision. Courts are not inclined to favor a specific bequest. If compatible with the language employed, they are disposed to interpret gifts as general, or demonstrative, legacies; but, if the language is clear and unequivocal, and plainly evidences an intent of the testator to create a specific legacy, such effect must be given to that language. In ascertaining the nature of a given legacy, some, but not much, aid is to be derived from the adjudicated cases. The question is one of intent, to be gathered from the language used in creating it, in the light of the circumstances of the testator and the property which he is disposing of in his will. It will be observed that no particular or designated sum of money is mentioned in the clause of the will under consideration. It is a gift of "any and all sums of money which may at any time hereafter become due and payable to me or my estate, by or under any insurance policy upon the life of my husband, Francis Gallup, which may heretofore have been insured." It is only such sums of money that she bequeaths to the five sisters of her husband, or to such of them as may be living when the moneys shall be actually collected and received by her executors to be equally divided among them. This language plainly evidences an intent to bequeath not any particular sum of money to be payable primarily out of the proceeds of the insurance policies, and, if the fund, for any reason, should fail, then out of the general assets of the estate, but, on the contrary, the testatrix thereby intended to give to the legatees named only such sums of money as her executors after her death actually collect and receive on certain insurance policies. The language employed negatives an intention to give them anything whatever if the moneys on the policies are received by her in her lifetime, or if the fund, for any other reason, fails or ceases to exist, as such, at her death.

Not only does the language of this will compel this interpretation, but the application of the appropriate principles of law, and the definition of the different kinds of legacies, lead to the same result. It will further be observed that this is not a gift of money "out of" or "from the proceeds of" any insurance policy, but it is a gift of the entire fund itself. It is just the same as if the policy itself had been bequeathed. The authorities clearly sustain the conclusion which we have reached. Many of them are collected in 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 711 et seq. It has been held that a gift of all the money due on a particular bond is as much a specific legacy as a gift of the bond itself. The same principle is applicable to an insurance policy. A gift of an insurance policy is no more specific than is a gift of all the money due thereon. Ashburner v. Macguire, 2 Bro. Ch. 108; Stout v. Hart, 7 N. J. L. 414; McMahon's Estate, 132 Pa. 175, 19 Atl. 68. So a bequest of all or part of a specific fund or money which shall be received under decree in a certain suit, or a gift of "all the amount of moneys and interest that may be recovered of and from K. for the sums due me on the purchase of the (described) estate," each was held to be specific. Gilbreath v. Alban, 10 Ohio, 64; Chase v. Lockerman, 11 Gill & J. 185, 35 Am. Dec. 277; 2 Wms. Exrs. Perkins's Notes, 1262 et seq., notes D, H, and M.

In Byrne v. Hume, 86 Mich. 546, 49 N. W. 576, though the particular legacy there was held to be a general legacy, the court, inter alia, says: "A specific legacy is a particular and specified thing singled out, or a particular fund; and, if this fund fail, or the specific thing bequeathed is not in existence to be carried over to the legatee, the legacy cannot be paid out of the assets of the estate." That remark is peculiarly applicable here, for the entire fund of the insurance policy was given to those legatees, and, since it was not in existence at the time the will took effect, but had been collected by the testatrix in her lifetime, it became adeemed.

In Walls v. Stewart, 16 Pa. 275, 281, the court says: "Where the gift is of the fund itself, in whole or in part, or so charged upon the object made subject to it as to show an intent to burden that object alone with the payment, it is esteemed specific, and consequently liable to be adeemed by the alienation or destruction of the object." Accordingly, in that case it was held that a legacy charged on certain devised lands was specific, and became adeemed when the land was sold by the testator in his lifetime.

In Smith's Appeal, 103 Pa. 559, there was a bequest by a testator to one son of $2,000 out of the sum of near $4,000 on deposit in a bank, provided the same was collected, and to another son $1,500 with the same proviso; and the remaining part of the money that might be collected on this deposit was given in equal shares to the two sons. This deposit was collected by the testator, and the court held that the legacies to the two sons, being specific, were adeemed. The following language from the opinion of the court being peculiarly appropriate to the case in hand, we quote it: "The whole of the money, the entire fund, is given,—the money and fund are undistinguishable. When the legacy is so connected with the fund out of which it is payable that the legacy and fund are the same, it is specific; as, if I bequeath to B the money now owing to me from A, or in the hands of A, or the money due to me on the bond of A, the legacy is specific; Welch's Appeal, 28 Pa. 363. Certain parts of the money due to the testator on the deposit are given to each son, and the money thus given is the whole deposit owing by the bank. The giving to each a certain portion—to both the whole—is indicative of an intent to give that fund,—not so much money out of the estate if the fund failed. The phrase, 'I give and bequeath to my son Samuel the sum of $2,000 out of the sum of near $4,000 now on deposit in the bank,' by itself, would vest a demonstrative legacy; but the testator added, 'providing the said amount and interest is collected from the assets or stockholders of said bank.' Manifestly, the word 'providing' is used in the sense of 'provided,' and means upon condition, or with the understanding, that said $2,000 shall be collected out of that debt. Then, if it should not be collected out of the specified debt, it was not to be paid. Here, also, the intention seems to be to limit payment of the legacy to the fund itself."

Let us apply the principles of that case to the one in hand. Mrs. Gallup gave to the legatees the entire proceeds of an insurance policy, provided the money was actually received and collected by her executors. The entire fund, or the policies and the money collected thereon, are given. The legacy and the fund are the same and undistinguishable. Her executors did not collect or receive the money. She herself collected it in her lifetime. The legacies, therefore, were specific and became adeemed. In Smith v. McKitterick, 51 Iowa, 548, 2 N. W. 390, $2,000 which the testator received from the estate of his father was bequeathed to the testator's daughters. It was said to be a specific legacy. Certainly, from the language employed in Mrs. Gallup's will, it could not be successfully contended that, if the insurance money had never been collected, the plaintiffs in error would have had any claim upon the general assets of her estate. If that be true, this legacy is specific. There was no gift of any particular or specified amount, but the entire fund, showing an unambiguous intention to confine the gift to the fund itself.

ing whether the legacy is specific or demonstrative, the question always is whether it is a gift out of a specified fund or security, or a gift of a specified sum, with a specified fund as security. If it falls within the former class,"—that is, where it is a gift of a specified fund, or security,—"the legacy fails when the fund or security ceases to exist in the testator's lifetime."

In Hoke v. Herman, 21 Pa. 301, 304, it was said that, if the thing bequeathed in a will by such a description as to distinguish it from all other things be disposed of, so that it does not remain at the death of the testator, the bequest is gone. "If such legacy be of a debt, payment necessarily makes an end of it." In the case in hand, the money that became due and was payable to the testatrix in her lifetime was a debt, and there was a gift of the entire debt. Since the testatrix in her lifetime collected it and commingled it with her funds, necessarily there was an end of it, and nothing remained at her death to which the legacies here claimed could attach.

Corbin v. Mills, 19 Gratt. 438, is cited by plaintiffs in error as in point. The particular bequest there under consideration was held to be a demonstrative legacy, but the language of the will by which the legacy was created is entirely different from that in the will of Mrs. Gallup. The opinion of the court with reference to this particular point would make the legacy here involved a specific legacy.

In Barker v. Rayner, 5 Madd. 208, the testator's will read: "All my right, title, and interest in two policies of insurance [describing them] upon trust to pay," etc. These policies were upon the life of the testator's wife, and were collected by him in his lifetime. The legacy was held to be specific. This bequest in legal effect is precisely the same as the one here where the moneys to be collected on the policy are the subject of the bequest. Such moneys constituted all the right, title, and interest which the beneficiary had in them. This decision by Vice Chancellor Leach was affirmed on appeal by Lord Chancellor Eldon in 2 Russ. Ch. 122. The case is quite in point. Starbuck v. Starbuck, 93 N. C. 183; 2 Redf. Wills, 431.

In 1 Underhill on Wills, § 414, the learned author says a legacy of a debt is specific, but a legacy of a particular sum payable out of a debt due to the testator is demonstrative. Applying the doctrine of the text and of the authorities already cited to the case at bar, we have this situation: The thing given by Mrs. Gallup was the entire debt which the insurance company was obligated to pay to her or her estate upon the death of her husband. There was no particular sum given, nor was that which was given made payable out of the debt due the testatrix, but being the corpus of the debt itself, it was a specific legacy. Gelbach v. Shively, 67 Md. 498, 10 Atl. 247; Maybury v. Grady, 67 Ala. 147.

Let the judgment be affirmed.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

BALTIMORE & OHIO SOUTHWESTERN RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

WILLIAM P. SLAUGHTER.

(— Ind. —, 79 N. E. 186.)

Railroad farm crossing—invitation to use.

1. A railroad company which constructs a private farm crossing, and permits its frequent use by a tenant of the farm for the benefit of which it is constructed, is, in Case Note.—General nature of the duty owed by a railroad company to one who, with its permission, uses a private crossing constructed by it:—It is a general rule that the bare permission of the owner of private grounds, to persons, to enter upon his premises, does not ordinarily render him liable for injuries received by them on account of the condition of the premises. But, if he expressly or impliedly invites or allures them upon his premises, he is liable in damages to them, in the absence of contributory negligence, for injuries occasioned by the unsafe condition of the premises, if such condition is the result of his failure to use ordinary care to prevent it. The decision in the above case is based upon this principle.

In Sweeney v. Old Colony & N. R. Co. 10 Allen, 368, 87 Am. Dec. 644, the plaintiff was injured at a private crossing planked by a railroad company, which kept a flagman at the crossing, and made no objection to its use by the public. The court held that the general rule applicable to this class of cases is that an owner or occupant is bound to use due care to keep his premises in a safe and suitable condition for those who come upon and pass over them, if he has held out any invitation, allurement, or inducement, either express or implied, by which they have been led to enter thereon.

In Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Linn, 103 Ala. 134, 15 So. 508, it was held that where persons, without objection by the railroad company, cross the tracks at a private crossing, they are entitled to no other privileges or protection than a mere licensee; and the company discharges its duty by using due care of a negligent injury to the tenant at the crossing, subject to the liability of one who has extended an invitation which has been acted on, and cannot treat the injured person as a trespasser or bare licensee.

Pleading—nonallegation—effect.

2. Failure to allege that a hand car and articles thereon were calculated to frighten horses of ordinary gentleness does not render the complaint demurrable, in an action to recover damages for leaving such car and articles near a railroad crossing, which resulted in the frightening of plaintiff's horses, and consequent injury, where it is alleged that defendant carelessly and negligently placed the car upon the crossing, and obstructed the free use of it, as a direct result of which the accident was caused.

Negligence—proximate cause—anticipation of injury.

3. To entitle one to a trial of the question of another's negligence which resulted in injury, it is not necessary that the effect of the act or omission complained of would in all cases, or even ordinarily, be to produce the consequences which followed; but it is sufficient if it is reasonably to be apprehended that such an injury might thereby occur to another while exercising care and reasonable diligence to avoid injuring them after being conscious of their peril.

In Adams v. Iron Cliffs Co. 78 Mich. 271, 18 Am. St. Rep. 441, 44 N. W. 270, it was held that the corporation was bound to use due care and diligence towards travelers in running its trains over a private crossing which it had planked and maintained, and permitted the public to use, for over twenty years.

In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Parsons, 42 Ill. App. 93, it was held that a railroad company owes only ordinary care toward persons who, with its passive acquiescence, and without the right of an adjoining landowner, for their own convenience, use a farm crossing constructed by it; and it can be held liable only in case the injury is wilful and wanton.

In Pomponio v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 66 Conn. 528, 32 L.R.A. 530, 50 Am. St. Rep. 124, 34 Atl. 491, it was held that a railroad company making a flying switch at a crossing which it had kept planked for many years, between shops of a corporation located on both sides of its road, for the use of workmen therein, when it knew that this constituted practically the only entry to the shops on one side of the track, and was used by the workmen in crowds at stated hours of the day, was bound to exercise reasonable care towards them, whether they were to be regarded as licensees or as using the track by invitation.

In Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Keck, 84 Ill. App. 159, Affirmed in 185 Ill. 400, 57 N. E. 197, an instruction that the law imposes upon a railroad company a less degree of care in the operation of its trains over a his legal right in an ordinarily careful manner.

Pleading—frightening horse—nonallegation of gentleness.

4. The complaint in an action for injuries resulting from the frightening of plaintiff's horse is not rendered demurrable by failure to allege that the horse was one of ordinary gentleness, if the injury is charged to have been caused by the negligent acts of defendant, the particulars of which are stated.

Railroad—crossing—frightening horse—liability.

5. A railroad company may be liable, for placing an object calculated to frighten horses upon its right of way near a crossing, to one receiving injuries through the frightening of his horse thereon.

farm crossing than if the place was a public crossing was held to be as favorable to the railroad company as it had a right to ask, if not more so.

In Murphy v. Boston & A. R. Co. 133 Mass. 121, it was held that the trial court rightfully refused to instruct the jury that the planking and paving of a private crossing, and permitting vehicles and persons to cross there, did not create any obligation or duty to provide additional protection by another flagman, or otherwise.

In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Dooley, 77 Ark. 561, 92 S. W. 789, it was held that, if the railroad company constructed steps over its right-of-way fence, and expressly or impliedly invited, induced, or led persons to cross the same, it was liable in damages to them for injuries occasioned by the unsafe condition thereof, if it was the result of its failure to use ordinary care to keep the same in safe condition.

In Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. v. Watson, 82 Miss. 89, 33 So. 942, it was held that, whether a road was technically a public or a private road, a railroad company which built approaches to its track, knowing that the road was used by the public, was bound to make them so that they would not be dangerous for travel by teams and vehicles managed with ordinary care.

In Morris v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 24 N. Y. Week. Dig. 160, it was held that the mere fact of the existence of a farm crossing provided by the railroad company requires of it no signal of the approach of its train or reduction of its speed, but that it owes to the proprietor of the bisected farm the duty not unnecessarily to subject him or his property to injury upon such crossing; and, to that end, its employees engaged in running its trains have the duty of continuous observance of the situation in advance, that no needless injury may be done.

This note, as indicated in the title, is confined to the general measure of care required of the railroad company as affected by the fact that it constructed the private crossing and acquiesced in its use by the injured person. It is not concerned with the question as to specific duties that fall within the general measure of care.

The act of appellant in placing the hand car on the crossing in such a way as to frighten appellee's team was negligence.

Kirland v. Kline, 16 Ind. 313.

Gillette, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

According to appellee's complaint, appellant carelessly and negligently left within the traveled way of a farm crossing, and as an obstruction to the free use of the same, a hand car, having upon it tools, tin dinner buckets, and clothing, and, as a result of the negligence charged, one of the animals, a mule, composing the team which appellee was driving along said way and across said track, became frightened at the hand car and ran away, throwing appellee out of his wagon and injuring him. Appellant, having been defeated in the trial court, prosecutes this appeal, and by its first assignment of error draws in question the propriety of the ruling of the court below in overruling a demurrer to the complaint.

It is contended by appellant's counsel that, so far as the complaint shows, appellee was a bare licensee, and that, having availed himself of the privilege of using the crossing, he was bound to accept it as he found it; or, in other words, that appellant could not properly be charged with negligence in having the car within the way. The allegations of the complaint concerning appellee's authority to use the crossing are as follows: "That said part of said railroad which runs through the said Clark county extends from the city of New Albany to the city of North Vernon, Indiana; that, at a point on said line of road, about 5 miles northeast of the said city of New Albany, Indiana, and about 300 yards northeast of what is called and known as the 'K. and L.' cement mills, defendant had, before the said — day of November, 1903, constructed a private wagon road crossing of its said railroad track at said point, and which said crossing was then and there for the use and benefit of the owners of the adjoining lands on opposite sides of said railroad track at said point, and for their tenants, and for all others who might have occasion to cross over and use the same in the use of the said lands aforesaid; that said crossing was, on said day, properly constructed by fastening planks 8 feet wide to the ties in said track and filling in between them with broken stone; and defendant had also constructed approaches, being constructed of earth thrown up in the form of embankments and covered with broken stone; and the said approaches were about 30 feet in length and not to exceed 10 feet in width; that on said day plaintiff was a tenant of the person who owned the adjoining lands on either side of said track at said crossing, and had been for more than one year, and had on many occasions before said day used the said crossing in the prosecution of his said work as tenant; and that he cultivated the said adjoining lands as farming lands as such tenant, and on said day was entitled, as such tenant, to use the said crossing with wagons and teams in the prosecution of his said work; . . . that about 5 o'clock in the afternoon of said day the said plaintiff was lawfully driving a team consisting of one mule and one horse, attached to a two-horse wagon, from one portion of his said farm to another on the opposite side of said track of defendant, and, in so doing, had occasion to drive over and upon said crossing." In their statement of the contents of the complaint, appellant's counsel fully admit that it appears that appellee was a tenant of the adjacent farm, and that he went upon the crossing in the prosecution of his farm work. It is doubtless the rule that a bare licensee who goes upon the premises of another for some purpose with which the owner or occupant has no concern, and without any enticement, allurement, or inducement being held out to him by the owner or occupant, assumes the perils arising from defects existing in the premises. Within this class of cases are Lingenfelter v. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. 154 Ind. 49, 55 N. E. 1021, and Cannon v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 157 Ind. 883, 62 N. E. 8.

Putting aside all question as to the effect of the act of April 8, 1885 (§§ 5320 et seq., Burns's Anno. Stat. 1901), we are nevertheless of opinion that the facts charged do not make out a case in which appellee's entry upon the railroad was simply not opposed and prevented. While it is true that it does not appear that the intent of the company in respect to the construction and maintenance of the crossing was ever communicated to anyone, or that appellee acted upon the assumption that the crossing was designed for his use, yet, taking the subjective intent in respect to the purpose of its construction and maintenance, coupled with the fact that the planking of the space between the rails and the building of the long approaches on either side tended to show objectively what the intent was, and adding to this the frequent prior user of the way by appellee, we have a case wherein it appears to us that it would be contrary to good morals to permit appellant in effect to shift its ground, after the injury and after it had been haled into court, by asserting that appellee had ventured upon the crossing without invitation and at his own risk. Not to refine too much, it seems to us not unreasonable that the company should be subjected in the circumstances to the consequences of having extended an invitation which had been acted on. In Indiana, B. & W. R. Co. v. Barnhart, 115 Ind. 399, 16 N. E. 121, this court said: "When a person has a license to go upon the grounds or the inclosure of another, he takes the premises as he finds them, and accepts whatever perils he incurs in the use of such license. But when the owner or occupant, by enticement, allurement, or inducement, whether express or implied, causes another to come upon his lands, he then assumes the obligation of providing for the safety and protection of the person so coming; and for any breach of duty in that respect such owner or occupant becomes liable for any injury which may result to the person so caused to come onto his lands. The enticement, allurement, or inducement, as the case may be, must be the equivalent of an express or implied invitation. Mere acquiescence in the use of one's lands by another is not sufficient. Such an implied invitation may be inferred from some act or line of conduct, or from some designation or dedication. This general doctrine was affirmed in the case of Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Griffin, 100 Ind. 221, 50 Am. Rep. 783, and it is well supported by a long line of authorities. Sweeny v. Old Colony & N. R. Co. 10 Allen, 368, 87 Am. Dec. 644; *Smith v. London & St. K. Docks Co. The case as pleaded contains some of the elements of a dedication, and, while we would not be understood as applying that 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

doctrine to a private use, yet the consideration is not without value in determining whether it is just to hold that appellee occupied no higher plane of right, as respects negligence, than a mere trespasser. In Bennett v. Louisville & N. R. Co. supra, we find the court observing that "the deceased, when injured, was using the premises for some of the very purposes for which they had been appropriated, and to which they had been in a sense dedicated by the owner." An essentially similar observation is to be found in Indiana, B. & W. R. Co. v. Barnhart, supra. But the word "invitation," to which the cases on the subject under consideration so often refer, includes, both in its lexicographical and its legal sense, not only an actual bidding, but also an allurement or enticement. While an invitation may not, at least in most circumstances, grow out of mere passivity as respects the condition of the premises, yet the cases abundantly justify the assertion that where an owner constructs a way over his premises in such a manner as apparently to be for the use of certain persons, with the intent that they should use it, and they continue to enjoy it for a considerable period of time, he owes to them a duty to exercise ordinary care for their safety while pursuing the privilege, so far as his own acts are concerned; and this is especially true as to a new and unapprehended danger. In Corby v. Hill, 4 C. B. N. S. 562, the plaintiff was injured while driving along a private road extending from a turnpike to a lunatic asylum, owing to the presence of a quantity of slate which the defendant had deposited upon the way. The latter attempted to justify under the permission of the owners of the soil. Cockburn, Ch. J., said: "The proprietors of the soil held out an allurement whereby the plaintiff was induced to come upon the place in question. They held out this road to all persons having occasion to proceed to the asylum as the means of access thereto. . . . Having, so to speak, dedicated the way to such of the general public as might have occasion to use it for that purpose, and having held it out as a safe and convenient mode of access to the establishment, without any reservation, it was not competent for them to place thereon any obstruction calculated to render the road unsafe and likely to cause injury to those persons to whom they had held it out as a way along which they might safely go. If that be so, a third person could not acquire the right to do so under their license or permission." In the same case, Williams, J., said: "I see no reason why the plaintiff should not have a remedy against such a wrongdoer, just as much as if the obstruction had taken place upon a public road."

Good sense and justice require that he should have a remedy, and there is no authority against it." Willes, J., remarked: "The defendant has no right to set a trap for the plaintiff. One who comes upon another's land by the owner's permission or invitation has a right to expect that the owner will not dig a pit thereon, or permit another to dig a pit thereon, so that persons lawfully coming there may receive injury." It is our conclusion that the facts pleaded show that appellee was more than a bare licensee, and that he was entitled to complain of the negligence charged.

Thus far we have dealt with a question, owing to the generality of the points made, which it was, perhaps, not the intention of counsel for appellant to raise. While it asserts that appellee was a bare licensee to whom appellant was not liable for its negligence, yet its whole ground for this assertion, so far as anything definite in its brief is concerned, is based on the statement in Bennett v. Louisville & N. R. Co. supra, to the effect that it is stated by Campbell, in his treatise on Negligence, that the principle "appears to be that invitation is inferred where there is a common interest or mutual advantage, while a license is inferred where the object is the mere pleasure or benefit of the person using it." But even in the Bennett Case the court states that no definite rule can be laid down, and the whole trend of the opinion is against the position of counsel. In the absence of further proof of the circumstances of the party's entry than that it was for his pleasure or benefit, there may be a presumption that he was a bare licensee; but the view is utterly wrong that this fact forms the basis of a controlling principle. In the leading case of Sweeny v. Old Colony & N. R. Co. 10 Allen, 368, 87 Am. Dec. 644, the company was held liable for the negligence of its flagman in signalling that the way was clear, at a crossing which belonged to the railroad, but which it had permitted the public to use for the purposes of travel. It was argued on behalf of the company, that to hold it liable would involve the anomaly of charging it with a failure to guard a place which it was not bound to keep open; but Bigelow, Ch. J., said: "If a person undertakes to do an act or discharge a duty by which the conduct of others may properly be regulated and governed, he is bound to perform it in such manner that those who rightfully are led to a course of conduct or action, on the faith that the act or duty will be duly and properly performed, shall not suffer loss or injury by reason of his negligence." And so we find it stated by Judge Cooley that, if one "expressly or by implication invites others to come upon his premises, whether for business or for any other purpose, it is his duty to be reasonably sure that he is not inviting them into danger; and to that end he must exercise ordinary care and prudence to render the premises reasonably safe for the visit." Torts, 605.

The next objection which appellant's counsel urge against the complaint is that it fails to aver that the hand car and articles thereon were calculated to frighten horses of ordinary gentleness. There is no doubt that this is an essential element in the case, but it does not follow that it must be specifically alleged. It is charged that the defendant carelessly and negligently placed said hand car lengthwise upon the crossing, and carelessly and negligently obstructed the free use of the same by said hand car, and also that the accident and injuries set forth were caused by, and the direct result of, the negligence charged. We are of opinion that it was not necessary to plead more specifically as to the nature of the defect. It is a general rule, both in this state and elsewhere, that, in complaints or declarations for negligence, it is competent, after showing the existence of a duty by appropriate allegations, to predicate negligence, charged in general terms, upon any act or omission whereby it is claimed that that duty was violated. If the pleading is not sufficiently specific, the remedy is by motion; it cannot be taken advantage of by demurrer. Brookville & C. Turnp. Co. v. Pumphrey, 59 Ind. 78, 26 Am. Rep. 76; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Collarn, 73 Ind. 261, 38 Am. Rep. 134; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Krimming, 87 Ind. 351; Cleveland, C. C. & I. R. Co. v. Wynant, 100 Ind. 160; Cincinnati, I. St. L. & C. R. Co. v. Gaines, 104 Ind. 526, 54 Am. Rep. 334, 4 N. E. 34, 5 N. E. 746; Rushville v. Adams, 107 Ind. 475, 57 Am. Rep. 124, 8 N. E. 292; Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Kitley, 118 Ind. 152, 20 N. E. 727; Cleveland, C. C. & I. R. Co. v. Wynant, 119 Ind. 539, 20 N. E. 730; Rodgers v. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. 150 Ind. 397, 49 N. E. 453, and cases cited; Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. McFall, 165 Ind. 574, 76 N. E. 400; and note to King v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. as reported in 59 L.R.A. 209. It is not necessary, in order to justify the submission of the question of negligence to a trial, that it should appear that the effect of the act or omission complained of as negligent would, in all cases, or even ordinarily, be to produce the consequences which followed. It is sufficient to present a trial question if it was to be reasonably apprehended that such an injury might thereby occur to another while exercising his legal right in an ordinarily careful manner. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Trowbridge, 126 Ind. 391, 26

N. E. 64. It is not an uncommon thing, as the courts judicially know, for horses to be frightened at unusual objects. Billman v. Indianapolis C. & L. R. Co. 76 Ind. 160, 40 Am. Rep. 230; Wharton, Neg. § 107. Whether the act of placing the hand car within the limits of a crossing was so calculated to frighten horses which might pass along the way as to render it negligent to do such an act was a mixed question of law and fact, and it was presented by the issue formed upon the allegation that the act was negligently done. In Cleveland, C. C. & I. R. Co. v. Wynant, 114 Ind. 525, 5 Am. St. Rep. 644, 17 N. E. 118, Mitchell, Ch. J., said: "All horses are disposed to scare or shy at objects of an unusual character in a highway. Roads are prepared with reference to this generally known disposition, and persons who place or leave objects in a highway are likewise charged with notice of this habit. There are things which every adult person of ordinary experience must be presumed to know. It is not, therefore, a subject to be pleaded and proved, whether a box car, or any other particular object, is naturally calculated to frighten horses. This is to be determined by the experience, observation, and intelligence of the court and jury as applied to all the facts of the particular case before them." But, without further discussion of the objection stated, we content ourselves with the statement that in several cases this court has treated as unnecessary the averment that the object complained of was calculated to frighten horses of ordinary gentleness. Brookville & C. Turnp. Co. v. Pumphrey; Cincinnati, I. St. L. & C. R. Co. v. Gaines; Rushville v. Adams; Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Kitley; and Rodgers v. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co.,—supra.

The further objection is made to the complaint that it fails to aver that appellee's mule was an animal of ordinary gentleness. The allegation which the complaint contains is that the mule was "well broken and not fractious or balky." If this be not an equivalent allegation, we are nevertheless of opinion that the general charges in respect to negligence rendered the complaint good on demurrer. Conceding, as we do, that there is no liability where the object which occasioned the mischief was not naturally calculated to frighten horses of ordinary gentleness, yet it by no means follows that the owner of a high-spirited horse is remediless for an injury occasioned by its running away, owing to its being frightened by an object naturally calculated to frighten horses of ordinary docility. In view of the statute, we cannot assume that appellee was guilty of contributory negligence in driving the animal in question, and that this element subtracted from the case as presented by the complaint; appellee appears to be entitled to recover on the facts admitted by the demurrer, as it is averred in the complaint that appellant was negligent in the particulars stated and that such negligence was the cause of, and directly resulted in, the accident and injury. If, without the contributory fault of the driver, a horse runs away, and the negligent act of another is so far an efficient cause that, but for such negligence, the horse would not have run away, it would seem, on general principles that the latter would be liable for an injury thereby caused to the driver. Grimes v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 3 Ind. App. 573, 30 N. E. 200, and cases cited. This state of facts seems, in legal effect, to be shown by the complaint before us when it is subjected to the rules of construction which govern complaints in negligence cases. It was assumed in Rushville v. Adams, supra, not only that it is required that the object or obstruction should be one calculated to frighten horses of ordinary gentleness, but also that the particular horse should be of that character. In answer, however, to the objection that these facts did not appear from the complaint, the court in that case said: "The general averment in the complaint before us,—that the injury was not caused by any negligence or carelessness on the part of the plaintiff, but was caused wholly by the negligence of the town in permitting the person to maintain and carry on the business of making candy on the street,—we think, makes the complaint good as against the demurrer for want of facts." Bearing in mind the effect of the contributory-negligence statute since passed, the case from which we have just quoted appears to be an apposite precedent in support of the view—whether the character of the particular animal be an element or not—that the general charge of negligence, coupled with the averment that the injury was thereby caused, sufficiently shows that the legal rights of the complaining party have been invaded. See also Keeley Brewing Co. v. Parnin, 13 Ind. App. 588, 41 N. E. 471. We hold that the complaint is sufficient.

Under an assignment of error based on the overruling of a motion for a new trial, appellant's counsel argue that, in a number of particulars, the evidence fails to sustain the verdict. We have read the testimony, as set out in the bill of exceptions, and are of opinion that it cannot be said that there is an entire lack of evidence in support of any proposition which appellee was called on to maintain under the issues. The point which counsel for appellant places most stress upon under the assignment in question is that the testimony shows that the hand car was at one side of, and not in, the way; and it is claimed that, for this reason, the evidence failed to maintain the theory of the complaint. There seems to be some confusion in the testimony between the way, as it was graded up, and the ordinary or traveled track. There is some testimony that the hand car was within the way. But, if it can be said that the evidence shows that the hand car was outside of, although very near, the way, yet it does not follow that appellant was not entitled to recover. Where an object calculated to frighten horses is placed near, but not in, a public highway, there would be a question as to the liability of the city therefor, owing to the fact that the municipality did not have control over the place where the object was located. We can perceive no reason, however, for the holding that where the title to a way and the adjoining lands is in the same person there is no liability. Even in the case of a conveyance of a way of a fixed width, it would be to permit the holder of the servient estate to derogate from his own grant to uphold him in his act of placing an object calculated to frighten horses so near the way as to impair the value of the use. The placing of the hand car where it was, if the act was really calculated to produce the mischief complained of, impinged upon the rights of appellee, although perhaps in a lesser degree than would have been the case had there been a physical obstruction of the way. Even in a case of a public road, a municipality may be liable for placing an obstruction calculated to frighten horses within the margin thereof. Forshay v. Glen Haven, 25 Wis. 288, 3 Am. Rep. 73; Morse v. Richmond, 41 Vt. 435, 98 Am. Dec. 600. As indicated in the latter case, the right to control the whole width of the road gives rise to a corresponding duty. There are perils attending the use of farm crossings which are concomitants of the use, such as the dangers occasioned by the passing of trains and the like; but the act in question caused a wholly unnecessary peril, and one which was in no wise inherent in the use, and it was the invasion of appellee's right in this particular which really constituted the gist of this action. If it can be said that evidence that the hand car was placed on the margin of the way does not substantially prove the allegation as laid, yet, at most, there was but a technical variance, which it is our duty to treat as if the defect had been obviated by amendment. Farley v. Eller, 29 Ind. 322; Reddick v. Keesling, 129 Ind. 128, 28 N. E. 316; Latshaw v. State, 156 Ind. 194, 59 N. E. 471; Hartwell Bros. v. William E. Peck & Co. 163 Ind. 357, 71 N. E. 958; M. S. Huey Co. v. Johnston, 164 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Ind. 489, 73 N. E. 996. This was the holding in Bristol Hydraulic Co. v. Boyer, 67 Ind. 236, where the supposed variance was of the same character as it is contended existed in this case. We find no error.

Judgment affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

SAMUEL L. GRAHAM, Admr., etc., of Roy Graham, Deceased, CHICAGO & NORTHWESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

(— Iowa, —, 107 N. W. 595.)

Carrier—vestibule train—attempt to board—duty.

1. A railway company owes no duty to one who, in violation of law, attempts to board a moving train at a closed vestibule door, until his position of danger is made known to employees in charge of the train.

Same—negligence.

2. No actionable negligence on the part of a railroad company is shown by the fact that those in charge of a vestibule train, upon receiving notice that an intending passenger was outside of a closed door of the moving train, attempted to rescue him by going the length of the car and opening the door, rather than by operating the emergency brakes.

Case Note.—Duty to and negligence of passenger who attempts to board car when door or gate is closed:—The authorities support the rule that a passenger who persists in his attempt to board a car when his entrance thereto is prevented by the fact that the door or gate is closed and fastened, and, as a result, suffers personal injury, is guilty of such negligence as will bar a recovery of damages from the carrier. Thus, in Sanders v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 10 Okla. 325, 61 Pac. 1075, the court held it to be negligence per se for one to remain on the step of a passenger car after the train had started and after the vestibule doors were closed and locked, although he had a ticket for passage on that particular train, thinking that some of the trainmen would discover him and let him in, and who was accidentally thrown from the train while in motion without any force by, or negligence of, the agents of the company. And the court further held that the rule that railway companies are bound to provide proper accommodations, and to use all reasonable precautions, for the safety of their passengers, cannot be invoked to sustain a recovery. But the court said that, if the passenger had been denied a fair opportunity to get on the train after buying his ticket, provided he bought it in time to

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Monroe County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Reversed.

Statement by Bishop, J.:

Action to recover damages for a personal injury resulting in the death of plaintiff's intestate, Roy Graham. Graham was a young man nearly twenty-one years of age, and his home was in the city of Ottumwa, this state. The accident in which he lost his life occurred September 17, 1901, and in the city of Chicago, Illinois. Stated generally, the circumstances of the accident were as follows: In company with another young man named Hooyer, Graham had gone to Chicago for a visit. On the afternoon of the day of the accident they met a mutual friend, a young man named Newgren, and all three planned an evening visit at De Kalb, 65 miles out of Chicago, and on the line of defendant's railway: They agreed upon taking the train known as the "Overland Limited," at Oakley avenue station. That train was a fast through train, which left the principal station in the city at 6:30 P. M., and was due at Oakley avenue at 6:38

P. M. From there it made no stops until DeKalb was reached. Upon approaching Oakley avenue from the south, the young men discovered the train already standing at the station. They were on the side opposite from the station building and platform, and as they came up the train commenced to move out. It appears that the train was vestibuled throughout, and as the start was made from the station all the vestibules were closed on the south side. When closed the door of the vestibule sets in about 6 inches from the outer line of the car, and the lower edge is on a level with a trapdoor which, when let down over the steps, forms a continuation of the car platform. Graham ran to the moving train and caught on the front end of one of the cars by grasping the hand-holds or rods on each side of the vestibule door, and planting his feet on the lower step. He thus stood facing the vestibule door. As the rear end of the car came up the other boys caught on in like manner. Hooyer remained standing on the step facing the door, while Newgren found a footing between the vestibule ends of the cars. After a time Hooyer succeeding in attracting attention from the inside of the car, and he and Newgren were rescued from take passage on that particular train, under the rules of the company; and the train was one from which passengers were permitted to alight at his destination; and he had suffered damages by reason thereof,—he could have maintained an action to recover the same; but he cannot recover damages in this instance, because his injury was the result of his own rash act, which imperiled his life from the very moment the train reached full speed.

And in Robinson v. Manhattan R. Co. 5 Misc. 209, 25 N. Y. Supp. 91, it was considered to be negligence for a person to board a moving elevated railway train while the gate of the car was being closed, and to persist in clinging to the car until he came in contact with a guard rail at the end of the platform of the station. The court held, that in such a case the gateman was authorized to act upon the assumption that the intending passenger, when entrance into the car was thus denied him, would step back upon the platform.

In a similar action against an elevated railway company for injuries caused by an alleged premature closing of a car gate, the court, at plaintiff's request, charged, in substance, that, under the laws of the state, such railroad companies are not permitted to start a train until every passenger upon the platform or station desiring to board or enter the cars shall have actually boarded or entered the same; and the company shall not start the train until the gates are firmly closed; and that the plaintiff had the right to assume that the train which she attempted to board would be operated in accordance with such law. The railroad company thereupon asked the court to charge that when people had entered the train, who, in a manner apparent to the guards, actually evinced a desire to board it, at the station where plaintiff attempted to get on, the defendant had the right to close the car gates and start the train; and, even if the guard had closed the gates and started the train before the plaintiff had time to board, and even while she was walking toward the train, this would not justify her in attempting, from a place of safety, to board the train after it had started. The refusal of the court so to charge was held to be error, in Brown v. Manhattan R. Co. 82 App. Div. 222, 81 N. Y. Supp. 755, since such request was pertinent in connection with the request of the plaintiff, as it tended to qualify the rule of law applicable thereto in establishing the liability of the defendant if the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence; and the defendant was entitled to have this side of the question considered in view of the absolute statutory obligation which the court had charged as imposed upon the defendant.

And in the analogous case of Clark v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 68 App. Div. 49, 74 N. Y. Supp. 267 (Appeal Dismissed in 175 N. Y. 476, 67 N. E. 1081), an intending passenger was held to have taken the risk of injury of being hit on the knee by the lowering of the step which extended along the side of an open street car, while attempting to board the car on that side before it was ready for the reception of passengers.

their position. Upon going to the front end of the car it was discovered that Graham was missing. Shortly afterwards he was found by other parties lying dead beside the track about a mile west of Oakley avenue and near the west end of a viaduct crossing over Kedzie avenue. As no one saw the accident, the manner of its occurrence could not be told. It would seem certain, however, that he either lost his hold and fell against the viaduct structure, or was brushed off by such structure, as fresh blood was found at places thereon. The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for plaintiff, and the defendant appeals.

Messrs. J. C. Mabry, Clark & McLaughlin, and James C. Davis, for appellant:

In getting upon defendant's train while in motion, plaintiff's decedent was a trespasser, and guilty of negligence.

Raben v. Central Iowa R. Co. 74 Iowa, 735, 34 N. W. 621; Young v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 100 Iowa, 350, 69 N. W. 682.

Defendant owed him no duty until he was discovered by its agents in charge and control of the train, and then the only duty was not wantonly or wilfully to injure him.

It was not considered an act of negligence on the part of the carrier, in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Brown (Tex. Civ. App.) 39 S. W. 326, to have the rear door of its rear coach locked, so that a passenger could not enter his compartment, and consequently was obliged to remain on the rear platform to his injury, where it appeared that it was the rule of the company to keep such door locked at stations, and that the rule was reasonable and known to the passenger.

But the duty of the carrier to an intending passenger was held to have been violated in Brown v. Manhattan R. Co. supra, in which it appears that, as a woman passenger was about to board an elevated train, the guard slammed the gate together, catching her dress in the closed gate while she was still standing upon the station platform; and that the train was immediately started, and she was dragged along, her foot going down between the platform and moving car, inflicting serious injury.

And a verdict for the plaintiff was not disturbed in Ericius v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. 63 App. Div. 353, 71 N. Y. Supp. 596, in which plaintiff's evidence showed that, after the signal was given to start an elevated train, the plaintiff's decedent attempted to board one of the cars, and that, after he had stepped upon the car platform, the train started, and the guard or conductor shut the gate in such a way as to imprison his hand, and he was dragged along the track and crushed to death. On behalf of the defendant, evidence was given tending to show that the gate was securely closed and the train started before the deceased attempted to get on board, and that, while the train was in motion, he seized a hand rail on the edge of the body of the car, and endeavored in some way to secure a footing on the car platform, and, in spite of the cries of the guard to him to "let go," continued to hold on until he reached the railing, where he met his death.

One is not, as a matter of law, guilty of contributory negligence, who, though he might easily have boarded a street car by the rear entrance, attempted to do so by the front entrance, and, in consequence of the front door being locked, was obliged to remain on the platform until he was thrown from the car as it rounded a sharp curve at a high rate of speed; it appearing that the front entrance was like the rear one, and that there was no reason why it should not have been used as well as the rear one. Townsend v. Binghamton R. Co. 57 App. Div. 234, 68 N. Y. Supp. 121.

It is a question for the jury whether or not it was contributory negligence for a passenger to ride on the rear platform of a railroad train, where he sustained injury because he was unable to enter the car on account of the rear door being locked, according to a reasonable rule of the railroad company of which he was aware, where he first attempted to enter the car at the other entrance, but was directed by one in charge of the train to go to the rear door so as to enter the compartment provided for those of his race. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Brown, supra.

Bishop, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff's action is grounded upon negligence of the defendant. One of such grounds is that, when advised by Hooyer and Newgren of the peril to which Graham was exposed, the train employees failed to take such prompt and effective means as were within their reach to accomplish his rescue; and as the case went to the jury such was the only ground of negligence submitted. The plaintiff, of course, is not in position to complain of this, and accordingly we shall have no occasion to make inquiry respecting any of the other grounds alleged. By motion for a directed verdict at the close of all the evidence in the case, by request for instruction, and by motion for a new trial, defendant challenged the right of plaintiff to recover for that a case of actionable negligence had not been made out. In the motion for a directed verdict counsel for defendant state precisely the grounds of their contention, and they are as follows: First. The undisputed evidence shows that in boarding the train on the outside of the vestibule Graham acted not only in violation of the statutes of the state of Illinois, but without notice to, or knowledge on the part of, the defendant. He was therefore a trespasser and only entitled to rights as such. Second. The evidence fails to show that defendant's employees in charge of the train were notified of Graham's presence on the train prior to his injury. Third. That, as soon as notified that Graham was riding on the outside, the employees in charge of the train adopted the quickest and safest way to relieve him, by going to the vestibule where, according to the information given them, he was supposed to be riding.

1. That, under the circumstances, Graham was a trespasser, and acted in violation of law, is too clear for argument. The trial court so instructed the jury, and counsel for appellee do not take space to question the correctness of the instruction. Being a trespasser, the defendant owed Graham no duty until his position of danger was made known to the employees in charge of the train, and then only to act with reasonable promptness in adopting such means as were available and appropriate to accomplish his rescue. Masser v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 68 Iowa, 602, 27 N. W. 776; Burg v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 90 Iowa, 106, 48 Am. St. Rep. 419, 57 N. W. 680; Baker v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 95 Iowa, 163, 63 N. W. 667; Earl v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 109 Iowa, 14, 77 Am. St. Rep. 516, 79 N. W. 381.

2. Confessedly, the first information to the effect that Graham had boarded the train on the outside came to the train employees from Hooyer and Newgren after the latter had been admitted to the train; and, as we have seen, Graham fell or was brushed off at or near the Kedzie avenue viaduct. Of vital importance to plaintiff's case, therefore, is the location of the train with reference to the viaduct when such information was imparted. As we read the record, and we have gone over it with much care, there seems no reasonable ground to conclude otherwise than that at the time in question the train had passed the viaduct. This being true, there is no possible theory upon which the verdict and judgment can be upheld. We shall recite the evidence sufficiently in detail to make clear the situation. The boy Hooyer was the only witness for plaintiff who testified on the subject. He says that he was wholly unacquainted in the neighborhood, that he had never been there before, and has never been there since; that he did not know of the existence of Kedzie avenue or the viaduct. On direct examination, he testified that he had since been informed as to the existence of the viaduct, and as to the distance thereof from Oakley avenue; and he gave it as his judgment that, at the time he was taken into the train, about one third of the distance had been traveled. Being asked as to the rate of speed at which the train was running he answered that in his judgment it was about 15 miles an hour. On cross-examination, he answered that from the time he boarded the car he was standing face inward, hugging close to the vestibule door, and looking steadily through the window in such door; that he gave no attention whatever to landmarks or objects that were being passed by the train; that he realized he was in a position of great peril, and was frightened, and that he kept rapping on the window until the brakeman came to his relief.

On the subject of the speed of the train he answered that there was not very much acceleration as they went on.

Q. They kept increasing speed as you went on?

A. I never took particular notice.

Q. They might have increased in speed, and you not noticed it?

A. Well, they were not going very fast.

Q. Are you a judge of the speed of railroad trains?

A. No, sir.

Q. You cannot tell a vestibule train when you see it?

A. I do not know about that.

Q. But you can judge as to the speed of a train?

A. Well, about as near as anybody in my position, I guess.

Now, for the defendant, Newgren testified in positive terms that the train had passed Kedzie avenue before he and Hooyer were taken in; that he was familiar with the viaduct, and knew when they passed it. "Yes, sir; I knew it. I had gone over it lots of times. You can tell by the sound. It is just like over a bridge or river. When we went over, the railing of the subway just touched my back, just so I could feel it." The porter of the Pullman car, who, with a brakeman named Wright, was present when Hooyer and Newgren were taken in, testified that they were then near the Kedzie viaduct; that he could not say whether it was just before or just after, but thinks it was just after they passed the viaduct. Two brakemen and the conductor of the train each testified that within his positive knowledge the train had proceeded some distance to the west of the viaduct before the presence of the boys on the train was discovered and they were taken in. Each of such witnesses testified further that at the time the train passed the viaduct the rate of speed at which it was running was from 25 to 30 miles an hour.

We have not overlooked the contention in argument of counsel for appellee to the effect that Hooyer and Newgren must have been taken into the train before the viaduct was reached because the space between the car and the girder of the viaduct was not sufficient to permit of the passage of a man standing on the car steps and clinging to the hand-holds; that accordingly, and if the fact as to the location of the train was otherwise than as testified to by Hooyer, all three of the boys would have brushed off when the viaduct was reached. The trouble with this contention arises out of the proof. The distance between the extreme south edge of the car step and the viaduct girder is shown to be 18 and a fraction inches, while the vestibule door is set in 6 inches from the outer line of the car. There was then a clearance of fully 2 feet. Hooyer was a slender boy, and he says he kept his body close up to the vestibule door, while Newgren, a much larger man, was partially in between the vestibule ends. Such being the facts, it was entirely possible for both to pass through without striking against the girder. Such, then, is, the state of the evidence. As it seems to us, consideration thereof from any point of view must lead to the conclusion that the train had reached the viaduct, and Graham had fallen to his death before any warning of his peril had been given. It must be manifest that at best the estimate of Hooyer as to the distance the train had traveled can be taken for nothing more than sheer guesswork; a present guess as to a matter of fact respecting which he does not claim to have formed an opinion as of the time, and to which, as he declares, his attention had not been subsequently called until shortly before the trial, some three years after the happening of the accident. Being wholly unacquainted with his surroundings, and giving not the slightest heed at the time to any object which could serve as a basis for computing distance with the eye, judgment on his part as to location was only possible by taking into account the speed of the train and estimating therefrom the distance run. Taking the circumstances as presented, it is inconceivable, within our view, that any judgment could have been formed by him on the subject. Here was an inexperienced boy nineteen years of age in the precarious position of clinging to the outside of a rapidly moving train; he says he fully realized his peril and was frightened thereat; that his attention was centered upon maintaining his hold, and that his hope was to attract attention by continual rapping on the window, and his rescue be thus brought about. It was not a time for judgment as to any matter not directly associated with his peril; it was not a time for thought even, save as connected with his chances for relief. And the witness does not pretend otherwise. His judgment is not as of that time, but of time three years later when a witness on the trial. To permit the mere opinion of such witness, thus formed and expressed, as to the speed of the train, and its location at the time in question, to outweigh the positive evidence of four witnesses, each speaking from knowledge as to the fact involved, would be, in our judgment, at once absurd and wholly unreasonable. 3. But, if it could be said that the conclusion reached by us in the foregoing division of this opinion is open to doubt as to its correctness, still it remains to be said that defendant was entitled to a favorable ruling on its motion for new trial based on the subject-matter set forth in the third ground of the motion to instruct. By the third instruction given, the jury was told that the measure of duty on the part of defendant "was not to wilfully or wantonly injure him after the said Graham had placed himself in a position of danger, and the employees of the defendant in charge and control of the train had actual knowledge of his position of danger, and, by the exercise of reasonable care, could have extricated him from same." In the tenth instruction it was said that, "if the conductor and brakemen, after being notified of Graham's position, could have stepped to the front end of the car and taken him in from the vestibule as quickly as the train could have been stopped by the use of the emergency, then it was their duty to go to the vestibule rather than stop the train." And in the eleventh instructions this: "In determining whether or not the conductor or brakeman should have stopped the train by using the emergency brake, you must consider the safety of the passengers on the train, and if the use of such brake would have endangered the safety of the passengers there was no duty which defendant owed Graham to so endanger the passengers." And such instructions became the law of the case. Crane v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 74 Iowa, 330, 7 Am. St. Rep. 479, 37 N. W. 397; Reynolds v. Keokuk, 72 Iowa, 371, 34 N. W. 167. Now, it is the evidence of Hooyer and Newgren that when they were taken into the car the brakeman, Wright, demanded to know what they were doing out there, and if they had tickets. Hooyer says that he replied saying that "Graham, who was on the other end of the coach in the same position he was in, had the tickets." Newgren says that Wright was told simply that a friend up ahead had the tickets. Both agree that they at once started forward, and when about half way through the car they met the conductor, who demanded their tickets. They told him that Graham had them, and that he was on the front end of that car outside. The conductor turned back and went with them to the vestibule, opened it, and found no one there.

The contention of plaintiff here, as in the court below, is that, upon being informed that Graham was on the front end of the car, it became the duty of the brakeman, and in turn, that of the conductor, to act at once by setting the emergency brakes on the train. And it is the failure to so act that is relied upon to sustain the verdict. A contradiction in the evidence as to what was done by Wright may be here noticed. Hooyer testified that Wright accompanied them as they went forward and met the conductor, while Wright says that he was not told that the boys had a companion on the outside at the head end of the car, and that as the boys started forward he went inside the car and sat down. Now, as bearing upon the phase of the situation instantly under consideration, plaintiff brought forward no evidence save that the conductor who was in charge of the train in question was put upon the stand and testified that the train was equipped with air brakes; that these could be operated either from a valve placed in the closet of each car, or by the engineer upon signal given by pulling a rope which extended through the train and connected with the air whistle located in the cab of the engine. The witness further testified that in his judgment the train, running at 15 miles an hour, could have been stopped in from 450 to 500 feet. On cross-examination the witness answered that stopping a train by use of a valve in one of the cars, called an "emergency stop," would be very unwise, unless in case of very serious accident; that the effect is to lock the wheels on the train, and is liable to injure passengers in the train. For the defendant, several witnesses, including the conductor, brakeman, and a division superintendent, were called, and all agree that an emergency stop, whether made by use of a car valve or from the engine, is fraught with danger; that it is liable to injure passengers by throwing them down if in the car aisles, or out of their seats if sitting; that, if made by use of a car valve, there is especial danger to the train, as it is liable to be torn in two. This is explained by pointing out that the wheels of the train become suddenly locked while the engineer is continuing to work steam; and reference is made to instances of accident and injury thus occurring. In addition to this, said witnesses testify uniformly that less time would be consumed in going the length of a car and opening the vestibule door than would be required to stop the train, whatever the means employed. In the absence of any opposing testimony there can be no reason why such witnesses should not be believed and their evidence given controlling effect. Under the circumstances shown, therefore, it would be unreasonable in the extreme to hold that the conductor was the responsible cause of a wilful or wanton injury. Conceding knowledge of the peril to Graham on the part of brakeman Wright, it must be said for him, that, in view of the uncontradicted evidence on the subject and the law of the instructions as given to the jury, he was doubly justified in not going to the car closet and setting the brakes on the train; there was the danger to the train and its passengers; and the most expeditious method of affording relief was by going to and opening the vestibule door. If then, as testified to by Hooyer, Wright started forward with the boys to go to the rescue,—and plaintiff rested his case upon this theory,—there can be no room for complaint of his action. If, on the other hand, as testified to by Wright, he went into the car and sat down,—a proceeding scarcely believable if it had come to his understanding that Graham was clinging to the outside of the car,—still there is nothing in the record from which it can be said that the work of rescue was interfered with or delayed thereby. The vestibule door was opened just as quick as it would have been, had he also gone to the forward end of the car.

The considerations expressed foregoing lead to the conclusion that the motion of defendant for a new trial should have been sustained, and the cause will be remanded that such may obtain.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

EDWIN H. PRATT, Appt.

v.

PARMELIA J. DAVIS.

Trial—burden of proof—harmless ruling.

1. A ruling that defendant in an action for damages for performing an unauthorized surgical operation upon a married woman has the burden of showing leave and license, notwithstanding the declaration avers want of consent by herself "or anyone authorized to act for her," to which defendant pleaded leave and license, which was denied by plaintiff, is harmless, if error, where it is shown that plaintiff herself did not consent, and evidence of the conduct of her husband, the only one claimed to be authorized to consent for her, tends to negative consent on his part.

Surgeon—operation—consent.

2. The consent by a man to an operation upon his insane wife upon taking her to a hospital is exhausted when the operation is performed and she is taken away, so as not to justify another operation if she subsequently returns to the institution.

Same—implied consent.

3. Consent by a man to an operation upon his wife for the removal of her uterus and ovaries is not shown by the fact that, after an operation of a minor nature to which he consented, which did not prove successful, he complied with a direction to bring his wife again to the surgeon for treatment.

Same—pleading—estoppel.

4. An averment of consent to an operation, in the declaration in an action which is disposed of without any determination of the rights of the parties, does not estop plaintiff, in a subsequent suit, to show want of consent.

Appeal—incompetent evidence—harmless error.

5. Error in admitting incompetent evidence in an action tried without a jury does not require reversal if there is abundant competent evidence to justify the finding of the court.

Damages—proof—inference.

6. Proof of pain and suffering following the removal of a woman's uterus is not necessary to render them an element of damages against the one performing the operation, since they are inferred by law.

Surgeon—operation—consent.

7. When a patient consents to an operation, and unexpected conditions develop, or are discovered in the course of the operation; or when a surgeon is called in an emergency, and some immediate action is found necessary for the preservation of the life or health of the patient,—where it is impracticable to obtain the consent of the patient or anyone authorized to speak for him, the surgeon may perform such operation as good surgery demands, without consent.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for trespass in performing an unauthorized operation upon plaintiff. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Walker & Williams and Roy C. Merrick, for appellant:

The relations existing between appellant and appellee were such as to confer upon appellant, as a matter of law, authority to perform the operation complained of; and the burden of proof to show want of consent was upon appellee.

A physician or surgeon is liable in damages whenever he fails to give to a case which he undertakes such care and treatment as are dictated by his best judgment.

Case Note.—Liability for performing surgical operation without consent of patient:

—The question of the liability of a surgeon for performing an operation on a patient without consent is practically new. For an exhaustive note upon the subject, see Mohr v. Williams, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 439. The case of PRATT v. DAVIS affirms the decision of the lower court, there referred to and commented upon. The law thus far established is that a physician is liable for operating upon a patient, unless he obtains the consent either of the patient, if competent to give such consent, or, if not, of someone who, under such circumstances, would be legally authorized to give the requisite consent; that in certain instances consent will be presumed, unless the person operated upon has been the victim of false or fraudulent representations, or has been deliberately deceived, as was the case in PRATT v. DAVIS. In addition to the note to Mohr v. Williams, see also Bakker v. Welsh, post, 612, for rule as to operation on minor without parent's consent.

As a corollary, he cannot be liable for having performed an operation, or given a treatment, which his learning and judgment tell him is necessary and proper in a given case.

Mr. Samuel J. Howe for appellee.

Scott, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment of the appellate court for the first district affirming a judgment of the circuit court of Cook county in favor of appellee and against appellant, for the sum of $3,000, in an action for trespass to the person.

Appellant is a physician in the city of Chicago, and at the time of the wrong charged was engaged in conducting a sanitarium on Diversey boulevard. Appellee, a married woman about forty years of age and a resident of the same city, came to this sanitarium for treatment for epilepsy in May, 1896. She had been subject to epileptic seizures for a period of fifteen years, but up to this time she had been able to perform her household duties and had borne four children, three since she first exhibited symptoms of epilepsy. The seizures had gradually been increasing in frequency. Following each of them she would be very weak in body and dazed and uncertain in mind for several hours. The evidence of those who knew her in her daily life is generally to the effect that her mind, except during the periods immediately following these attacks, was normal. Appellant made an examination of the pelvic organs, and found that the uterus was contracted and lacerated, and that the lower portion of the rectum was diseased. On May 13, 1896, he operated for these difficulties. Thereafter she remained in the sanitarium without improvement several weeks, and then returned home. On July 29, 1896, her brother-in-law, at request of her husband, took her again to the sanitarium, and on the next day appellant performed a second surgical operation upon her, removing her ovaries and uterus. She continued at the sanitarium until the 8th day of August, 1896, and then was removed to her home. Neither operation was successful, so far as improving her health was concerned. She grew gradually worse mentally, and on August 25, 1898, was adjudged insane and sent to the state asylum at Kankakee, and was not a witness in the trial of this case. The cause of action is based on the removal of the uterus at the second operation. It is not claimed that the operation was unskillfully performed, but that it was performed without the authority or consent of appellee, and constituted a trespass to her person.

The declaration, so far as now material, averred that appellee had placed herself under the care of appellant, and that he, without her consent or the consent of anyone authorized to act for her, anesthetized her and removed the uterus. Appellant interposed the general issue and a special plea of leave and license for doing the acts complained of. To the special plea a replication was filed during the leave and license. There is no pretense that appellee herself consented to the removal of the uterus. In fact, appellant himself testifies that he told Mrs. Davis just enough about her condition, and what he proposed to do, to get her consent to the first operation, and says, quoting his own language: "I worked her deliberately and systematically, taking chances which she did not realize the full aspect of, deliberately and calmly deceiving the woman; that is, I did not tell her the whole truth." And, referring to the first operation, he says: "She knew that the womb was to be operated upon, and she was willing that should be done. Consent for further work was not obtained." The record does not disclose the circumstances under which the anæsthetic was administered prior to the second operation. Appellant, however, contended that the appellee was so mentally unsound as to be incapable of consenting, or of giving intelligent consideration to her condition; and that her husband authorized the second operation. Whether appellee was then mentally incapable of consenting was a question as to which the evidence was conflicting. The trial court held a proposition of law stating that the burden of proof was upon the appellant to show leave and license; and it is said that this was improper in view of the averments of the declaration. If the declaration made necessary proof of the fact that the operation was performed without the consent of appellee or someone who, under the law, could act for her, the plea setting up leave and license was plainly useless. Ordinarily, where the patient is in full possession of all his mental faculties, and in such physical health as to be able to consult about his condition without the consultation itself being fraught with dangerous consequences to the patient's health; and when no emergency exists making it impracticable to confer with him,—it is manifest that his consent should be a prerequisite to a surgical operation. Where the narr. shows the act to have been a trespass to the person, or avers it to have been without the consent of the patient, it would seem to be unnecessary to go farther and negative the fact that some other person lawfully authorized to act for the patient consented. The question of the consent of such other person, if in the case, might well be left to be presented by a plea in bar.

We have carefully reviewed the evidence as abstracted, and are satisfied that it does not tend to show that the husband consented to the second operation. He testified that he did not, and that, when he first took his wife to the sanitarium, appellant told him the operation would be a trifling one; and appellant says that, while he may have said this, "Davis said he was willing that I should do anything I thought necessary; only he made the request that I do as little as possible;" and that appellant then told Davis, in substance, that two operations might be necessary. Following that conversation, the first operation was performed, and later the woman went home. While she was at home, appellant says: "Mr. Davis, plaintiff's husband, told me she was no better. I told him to bring her back for the finishing work. I did not tell him what the finishing work would be. I had but one comprehensive talk with him. That was the time he was there with the plaintiff." These two conversations are relied upon by appellant as authority given by the husband for the second operation. Without deciding what legal effect should be given to the husband's request or consent that a grave surgical operation be performed upon his insane wife, we think it manifest that the authority given by the husband in the conversation first above quoted from appellant's testimony was exhausted when the first operation was performed and the patient taken away. While it is true that appellant says he told the husband in that conversation that he could not tell the extent of the surgery that would be necessary, and says that Davis gave him carte blanche to do whatever he saw fit, it is yet apparent that neither then contemplated that the wife would be taken home after the first operation and later brought a second time to the sanitarium for the purpose of undergoing a second operation; and we think it equally apparent from appellant's testimony that the husband did not, at the time he was directed to bring his wife again to appellant for treatment, understand that any such operation as the removal of the ovaries and the uterus was to be performed, and that the mere fact that he, after that conversation, had his brother take appellee to the sanitarium, is not to be regarded as tending to show consent to surgery of that character. As appellee did not consent, and the evidence does not tend to show consent given by the husband, it is unnecessary to determine whether the holding of the trial judge to which we have above adverted was correct in the anomalous state of the pleadings. In any event it was harmless.

Appellant then contends that, in the absence of express authority to remove the uterus, the law will imply the necessary consent from the fact that consent was, as he says, obtained for the removal of the ovaries. Before bringing this suit, appellee instituted a former suit against appellant, which seems to have been disposed of without any determination of the rights of the parties. In that suit the declaration, which was filed on September 11, 1896, averred that the ovaries had been, with the consent of appellee, removed at the first operation upon the promise of appellant that their removal would cure plaintiff, but that their removal, instead of alleviating her condition, aggravated her troubles; and that she thereafter returned to the sanitarium, and that appellant then, without her consent or that of her husband, removed the uterus. In this suit the only claim is for damages occasioned by the removal of the uterus; and in the course of the trial of the case now at bar counsel for appellee stated that he was claiming nothing on account of the removal of the ovaries. Appellant argues that it appears from the facts thus recited that consent was obtained for the removal of the ovaries, and that correct surgical practice requires, that, when the ovaries are removed, the uterus should also be removed, and that, consent for the removal of the ovaries having been obtained, the right to remove the uterus followed. Appellee, by her brief, says that consent was given for the first operation, and that when she brought the first suit she erroneously believed that the ovaries were removed at that operation. Be this as it may, the declaration in the first suit does not estop appellee to show that she never consented to their removal, and, as there is no evidence which tends to show that any permission was obtained for the second operation, when they were in fact removed, there is therefore nothing to raise the implication in question.

It is also urged that consent is to be implied from the relation of the parties; and the following proposition of law was submitted as embodying that defense: "The court holds, as a proposition of law, that, when a patient places herself in the care of a surgeon for treatment, without instructions to the surgeon or limitations upon his authority, she thereby, in law, consents that he may perform such operation as in his best judgment, care, and skill is necessary, proper, and essential to her welfare; and, in case the surgeon performs an operation upon the plaintiff, and there is no complaint against the surgeon for want of the exercise of care and skill, there can be no recovery." The court held this good as an abstract proposition of law, but did not regard it as controlling here, for the reason, as we must assume, that the evidence did not show a state of facts that made this proposition determinative of the controversy. We are therefore not called upon to decide whether this was a correct statement of the law.

Complaint is made of the action of the court in overruling objections to testimony elicited by appellee from her expert medical witnesses in answer to hypothetical questions. This was a trial without the intervention of a jury, and errors in this regard, if they exist, do not require reversal, as there is in the record abundant competent evidence to justify the finding of the court. Merchants' Despatch Transp. Co. v. Jøesting, 89 Ill. 152.

It is next urged that the evidence shows no actual damages, that the judgment must therefore be made up of nominal damages and exemplary damages, and that this is not a proper case for the infliction of a penalty; wherefore the judgment should be reversed. The claim that there is no proof of actual damages is based upon this statement found in appellant's argument: "There is nowhere in the record a syllable showing any pain or suffering as a result of the removal of the uterus." Some facts require no direct proof. That pain and suffering follow the removal of the uterus is one of such facts. The law infers pain and suffering from personal injury. 1 Sutherland, Damages, 1st ed. p. 766.

Further objections are made to the action of the court in passing upon the propositions of law submitted. These objections, in so far as they are worthy of serious consideration, are disposed of by what has already been said in this opinion. Where the patient desires or consents that an operation be performed, and unexpected conditions develop or are discovered in the course of the operation, it is the duty of the surgeon, in dealing with these conditions, to act on his own discretion, making the highest use of his skill and ability to meet the exigencies which confront him; and, in the nature of things, he must frequently do this without consultation or conference with anyone, except, perhaps, other members of his profession who are assisting him. Emergencies arise; and when a surgeon is called, it is sometimes found that some action must be taken immediately for the preservation of the life or health of the patient, where it is impracticable to obtain the consent of the ailing or injured one, or of anyone authorized to speak for him. In such event, the surgeon may lawfully, and it is his duty to, perform such operation as good surgery demands, without such consent. The case before us, however, does not fall within either of these two classes.

The judgment of the Appellate Court will be affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Stephen Bakker died upon the operating table at a hospital in Grand Rapids, while defendant Apted was administering to him chloroform preparatory to the removal of a tumor by the defendant Welsh. The plaintiff is the father of the deceased, and, after being appointed administrator of the estate of deceased, brought this suit; his counsel stating upon the trial that his claim was under what is known by the lawyers and the courts as the "death act." The trial judge directed a verdict in favor of the defendants. The case is brought here by writ of error.

Stephen Bakker was seventeen years old. He lived with his father on a farm. He was a large, healthy-appearing person. He had a tumor upon his left ear about the size of a dove's egg. Some time before his death he had received treatment, and the tumor nearly disappeared; but prior to the middle of February, 1904, it reappeared, and he came to Grand Rapids to consult some physician about it. He had an aunt about sixty years old and two adult sisters living in Grand Rapids, with whom he went to the office of the defendant Welsh, who was a specialist and had practised medicine and surgery a long time. After an examination he was told it would be necessary to have a microscopic examination made to determine the character of the growth, and he was sent to Dr. Williams, another specialist, who made an incision and obtained a specimen from the tumor, and young Bakker returned to his father's. On the following Saturday or Sunday he again went to the office of Dr. Welsh, accompanied by at least one of his sisters, and was informed of the report made by Dr. Williams, and was told it would be best to have the tumor removed by a surgical operation at the hospital.

The testimony is somewhat conflicting as to what was said. The sister claims Stephen objected to taking an anæsthetic, and was told there was no danger. The doctor says that he told him there was always some danger in taking an anæsthetic, and that he advised him to have the operation performed. On Tuesday afternoon Stephen, with his aunt and at least one sister, went again to the office of Dr. Welsh and was sent from there to the hospital, where they all understood an operation should be performed the following day. In the meantime Dr. Welsh had arranged with Dr. Apted, an expert in the administration of anæsthetics, to administer the chloroform. A careful examination of the heart and lungs of the young man was made. They appeared to be normal, and in the presence of the hospital nurse and the doctors, with the usual appliances for successful operations at hand, young Bakker was put upon the table. Dr. Apted began to administer chloroform by means of the mask and drop method, and had administered about one third of an ounce, taking from seven to ten minutes in which to do it, and Dr. Welsh was just about to commence the operation, when suddenly the heart of the patient stopped beating. Every means known to the profession was used to revive the patient, but he was already dead. The record shows the father did not know an operation was to be performed. There were two counts in the declaration. Stripped of legal verbiage the first count stated that Stephen Baker was a minor, and it was known to the defendant Welsh he was a minor, and that it was Dr. Welsh's duty to inform the father and get his consent before entering upon this operation. The second count charges what is known as malpractice or want of skill in the operation, and that young Bakker died by reason of an improper administration of an anæsthetic. The record, instead of disclosing want of skill in the operation, shows quite the contrary. We have no hesitancy in saying the trial judge was quite right in so saying when he directed a verdict.

We then come to the question: Are defendants liable in this action because they engaged in this operation without obtaining the consent of the father? Counsel for the plaintiff are very frank with the court, and say in their brief: "We are unable to aid the court by reference to any decisions in point. We have devoted much time and research to this interesting question, but have been unable to find any decisions of a higher court either supporting or opposing the plaintiff's contention, and we will therefore have to be content by calling the court's attention to such general reasoning as leads us to take the view herein contended for." They then argue at length and with a good deal of force that, as the father is the natural guardian of the child and is entitled to his custody and his services, he cannot be deprived of them without his consent. We quote: "We contend that it is wrong in every sense, except in cases of emergency, for a physician and surgeon to enter upon a dangerous operation, or, as in this case, the administration of an anæsthetic, conceded to be always accompanied with danger that death may result, without the knowledge and consent of the parent or guardian. It is against public policy and the sacred rights we have in our children that surgeons should take them in charge without our knowledge, and send to us a corpse as the first notice or intimation of their relation to the case." On the part of defendants, it is contended: (1) Consent of the father was unnecessary. (2) The lack of consent was not the cause of the boy's death, hence not actionable. (3) That, if it were, the action does not survive under the death act. (4) That the action, if any, is in the father; not in the administrator.

We do not think it necessary to a disposition of the case to decide all of the defenses interposed by the defendant. The record shows a young fellow almost grown into manhood, who has been for a considerable period of time, while living with his father, afflicted with a tumor. He has attempted, while at home, to have it removed by absorption. It does disappear, but after a time it reappears. He goes up to a large city, and with an aunt and two sisters, all adults, submits to examination, receives some advice, and goes back to his father with an agreement to return later to receive the report of the expert who is to make the microscopic examination. He returns accordingly, and with at least some of his adult relatives arranges to have a surgical operation of a not very dangerous character performed. Preparations are made for its performance. There is nothing in the record to indicate that, if the consent of the father had been asked, it would not have been freely given. There is nothing in the record to indicate to the doctors, before entering upon the operation, that the father did not approve of his son's going with his aunt and adult sisters, and consulting a physician as to his ailment, and following his advice. We think it would be altogether too harsh a rule to say that, under the circumstances disclosed by this record, in a suit under the statute declared upon, the defendants should be held liable because they did not obtain the consent of the father to the administration of the anæsthetic.

GEORGE SCHWER, Appt.,

v.

WILLIAM MARTIN.

(29 Ky. L. Rep. 1221, 97 S. W. 12.)

Way—inconsistent agreement—tenant.

1. An agreement by a tenant to pay rent for the use of a right of way over adjoining property which is appurtenant to the estate is not binding on his lessor if made without his knowledge.

Same—estoppel.

2. The acknowledgment by a tenant that a right of way over adjoining property is permissive and subject to revocation will not bind him after he secures title to the landlord's estate, to which the right of way is appurtenant.

Same—right to close—burden of proof.

3. One undertaking to close a pass way

Case Note.—Effect of acts or agreement with respect to real property, made by one while a tenant of such property, to estop him after he has purchased the fee:—

The only case, aside from SCHWER v. MARTIN, strictly in point, seems to be Noyes v. Morrill, 108 Mass. 396, holding that declarations of a tenant in possession of land, to which he afterwards acquires the title, that another has a right of way across the land so occupied by him, are not admissible against declarant's grantees, when it is sought to charge the land with such easement. The court said: "The declarations of Watt in 1833 were not admissible to charge the plaintiff's estate with an easement in favor of those under whom the defendant claims. There was no evidence that Watt was then the owner of the land, or claimed any interest therein. At most, he was only in the occupation of the premises, and acquired title afterwards by the deed over his land, which has been enjoyed by a neighbor for nearly fifty years, has the burden of showing that the use was merely permissive, and to explain away the presumption that it was under color of right.

Same—permission—absence of—effect.

4. The mere facts that one using a pass way over another's land never asked permission, and that the owner of the land never gave it, are not of themselves sufficient to overcome the presumption, arising from long-continued use, that it was claimed as matter of right.

(November 1, 1906.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Kenton County in plaintiff's favor in a suit to enjoin interference with a right of way. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Robert C. Simmons, for appellant:

The change from an amicable to a hostile user of a pass way, in its origin merely permissive, must be evidenced by some affirmative step or act brought to the notice of the owner of the servient estate.

Patterson v. Griffith, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 334, 62 S. W. 884; Washb. Easements, 154; Monmouthshire Canal Co. v. Harford, 1 Crompt. M. & R. 614; Wiseman v. Lucksinger, 84 N. Y. 31, 38 Am. Rep. 479; Taylor v. Gerrish, 59 N. H. 569; Arbuckle v. Ward, 29 Vt. 52; 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1198.

The written agreement between Stuntenbeck and appellee's vendor, Joseph Martin, besides furnishing conclusive evidence of the permissive use of the pass way in question, estops appellee to question the permissive character of such use.

Douglass v. Scott, 5 Ohio, 198; Wright v. Williams, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1379, 77 S. W. 1128.

Mr. Frank M. Tracy, for appellee:

The use of a road for fifteen years under claim of right creates the presumption to him in 1835. The nature of his tenancy before that does not appear. The declarations of a former owner are admissible to qualify or disparage his title to the exclusive use and occupation of the estate which he holds. If made while the title is in him, they are evidence against another who is privy in estate. They cannot affect any estate subsequently acquired by the person who makes them. It is the title derived by Watt in 1835, to which the plaintiff stands in privity, and that title is not to be thus qualified."

A somewhat similar case is that of Tyler v. Mather, 9 Gray, 177, where it was held that admissions as to the extent of another's right to flow lands by means of a dam, and to raise the water above a certain rock in a pond, made at a time when declarant had no interest or title in the premises afforded no interest or title in the premises affect, title to which he afterward acquired, and through whom defendants claim, were incompetent. The court said: "At the time when he [declarant] had the conversation of which testimony was allowed to be given to the jury, he had no interest of any kind in the mill, or dam, or lands above it. . . . But the principle which makes the admissions of persons, not parties to the record, yet interested in the event of the suit, competent evidence, restricts the proof to such statements and declarations, only as were made at times when they had some interest in the matter in controversy. . . . Applying this restriction to the evidence of the declarations of . . . [declarant], it is obvious that those which were proved, having been made before his interest accrued, were inadmissible, and should have been excluded."

Carroll, C., filed the following opinion:

The appellee, alleging that he was entitled to the use of a pass way leading from his land over the land of appellant to the Dudley road, brought this action against appellant to enjoin him from obstructing the pass way. About sixty years ago, William McCarthy owned the land now owned by appellee, and a Mr. Sandford owned the land now owned by appellant. At this time the land of Sandford was a woodland, and there was a pass way over Sandford's land for the use of the McCarthy place. About this time, Sandford built a new fence along the road, and left a place for a gate that was erected by McCarthy. McCarthy's son testified that his father told him that Sandford said, if he would put the gate there, he could use the pass way as long as he lived. Whether Sandford made this statement or not, it is established conclusively that, from that time, down to 1878, a period affected, title to which he afterward acquired, and through whom defendants claim, were incompetent. The court said: "At the time when he [declarant] had the conversation of which testimony was allowed to be given to the jury, he had no interest of any kind in the mill, or dam, or lands above it. . . . But the principle which makes the admissions of persons, not parties to the record, yet interested in the event of the suit, competent evidence, restricts the proof to such statements and declarations, only as were made at times when they had some interest in the matter in controversy. . . . Applying this restriction to the evidence of the declarations of . . . [declarant], it is obvious that those which were proved, having been made before his interest accrued, were inadmissible, and should have been excluded."

of thirty years or more, this pass way was used by McCarthy and persons going to and from his premises without interference or disturbance of any kind by any person, although the Sandford land was sold to other parties in 1858. In 1874, Charles H. Stuntebeck became the owner of the Sandford land, now owned by appellant, and held it until December, 1879, when he sold to one Jacobs. During the time that Stuntebeck owned the land, Joseph Martin, the father of appellee, was occupying the McCarthy land as a tenant of McCarthy, and in 1878 Stuntebeck and Martin entered into a written agreement which set out that in March, 1877, Stuntebeck granted to Martin the use of the wagon road over the pass way in controversy for the period of one year; Martin paying $10 for the privilege. The agreement provided that the privilege should continue for another year, or until March, 1879, Martin paying the same amount; and further provided that Martin was not to permit any other person to use the pass way, except by the consent of Stuntebeck, and was to keep all gates and fences fastened; and, upon the failure of Martin to comply with the conditions imposed on him, the contract should become null and void, and Stuntebeck had the right to prevent any further use of the road by Martin. In February, 1879, this contract was renewed for the year ending March 1, 1880. In 1879 Stuntebeck sold to Jacobs, and in 1884 Jacobs sold to Duckee, and the land passed through the hands of several persons before appellant became the purchaser of it in 1903.

It appears that the agreement between Stuntebeck and Martin was delivered to each successive owner of the land, but neither of them exacted from Martin any compensation for the use of the pass way, nor was any effort made to enforce in any way its provisions; and from the time Jacobs became the owner of the land in December, 1879, until appellant purchased it in 1903, the pass way was used without interruption by appellee, Martin, and his father, Joseph Martin, who purchased the land from McCarthy's heirs about 1883, and sold it to appellee in 1905. It will thus be seen that this pass way was used and enjoyed by the occupants of the McCarthy farm for more than fifty years without objection or interference, excepting the three years from 1877 to 1880 that Stuntebeck required the tenant of McCarthy to pay an annual sum of $10 for its use. When appellant purchased the land over which the pass way ran, it was a well-defined, clearly marked road, sufficient to put the appellant upon notice that it was used as a pass way through the place. Wright v. Willis, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 565, 63 S. 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

W. 991; Sparks v. Rogers, 29 Ky. L. Rep. 1170, 97 S. W. 11. The evidence does not disclose why Stuntebeck exacted the agreement from Martin or why Martin entered into it; but, whatever the reasons for its execution were, it was not binding upon McCarthy, who was then the owner of the land occupied by Martin as his tenant, as the evidence does not disclose that McCarthy had any knowledge whatever of the contract, and at the time it was made the use of the pass way had continued for such a length of time, and been used in such manner, as to invest McCarthy with the right to enjoy it without interference by Stuntebeck.

Counsel for appellant insists that the use of the pass way had its origin in the permission of Sandford, and that, as the right to its enjoyment was obtained in the first place by permission, this right did not ripen into a grant that could not be revoked; and that, when Martin and Stuntebeck entered into this agreement, it was an acknowledgment of the fact that the use of the pass way was merely permissive, and that the owner of the servient estate had the right to revoke it at pleasure. This position is not tenable for the conclusive reason that Martin, with whom the agreement was made, was not the owner of the estate to which the pass way was an appurtenant, and could not bind the owner by any contract made without his knowledge or consent, or estop him from insisting on his right to the use of the pass way, or preclude him from its future enjoyment; nor does the fact that Martin, after the execution of this contract, became the owner of the McCarthy land, affect the question. When Martin purchased from McCarthy, his purchase invested him with all the rights, privileges, and easements connected with or appurtenant to the land that McCarthy was entitled to enjoy, and, this pass way being an easement appurtenant to the land, it passed to him, as neither McCarthy, nor any person authorized to act for him, had vested him of the easement in this pass way. The writing executed by Martin only affected him in the character in which he executed it; that is, as tenant of McCarthy. It was a personal matter between Stuntebeck and Martin as tenant. So that this case must be determined without reference to this written agreement, and as if it had not been made. It has been adjudged in a number of cases that, where the use of a pass way is merely permissive on the part of the owner of the land, a privilege extended by him to his neighbors, without any intention on his part to surrender his right to it, or purpose on their part to assert claim, and when there is no act or conduct by either that will indicate that allowing the use of the way was other than a neighborly act, and it is recognized that the privilege is one that may be revoked at any time by the owner of the land, its use for even fifty years will not confer the right to claim it as against the owner, or prohibit him from closing it. But, where the use has extended over a long period of years, very slight evidence will be sufficient to show that it was enjoyed under a claim of right; and, when the proprietor undertakes to close a pass way, the burden is on him to show that the use was merely permissive, and to explain away the presumption that its uninterrupted enjoyment for more than fifteen years was not exercised under a claim of right. The mere fact that the owner of the servient estate never gave, and the persons using the pass way never asked, permission, is not in itself sufficient to overcome the presumption in their favor arising from the long-continued use of the way.

This pass way having been used and enjoyed by the owners of the land now occupied by appellee for more than fifty years, without interruption or interference, the presumption must be indulged, in the absence of satisfactory evidence to the contrary, that its use was enjoyed as a matter of right, and it is now too late for the owner of the servient estate to close or discontinue this pass way. Smith v. Pennington, 28 Ky. L. Rep. 1282, 91 S. W. 730; Anderson v. Southworth, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 776, 76 S. W. 391; Bowen v. Cooper, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 2065, 66 S. W. 601; Clay v. Kennedy, 24 Ky. L. MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

GRACE E. KNAPP, Admrx., etc., of Freeman Fishbeck, Deceased,
v.

ALMA JESSUP et al., Plffs. in Err.

(— Mich —, 109 N. W. 666.)

Administrator—deposit—loss of funds.

1. An administrator who deposits funds in a bank in good standing in the community, and promptly distributes the interest to the next of kin, is not liable for losses caused by the failure of the bank, no negligence on his part being shown, and the exigencies of administration requiring the fund to be kept on hand.

Same—retention of funds.

2. The retaining in a bank, by an administrator, for three months, of money received by him, instead of distributing it, does not make him liable for its loss through failure of the bank, where he had a right to retain money for the use of testator's widow, which might be called for at any time.

Same—payment of unallowed claims.

3. Next of kin cannot complain of the payment of an item by the administrator without its allowance by the court, where it is less in amount than the balance due the administrator for overpayment in the distribution of the estate.

Same—construction of burial vault.

4. An administrator is entitled to credit for an item for the construction and repair, at reasonable expense, of a vault for the remains of the dead, according to the expressed wish of intestate.

Same—uncanceled mortgage—interest.

5. The estate of an administrator is not chargeable with interest on a mortgage which was part of the assets, which came into his possession and was paid, but not discharged, since the presumption is that it was promptly collected and included in the appraisal of assets.

Same—fees.

6. No fault can be found with the allowance of statutory fees to an administrator, where he collected the funds of the estate, cared for the real estate, looked after the widow, and promptly divided to each heir his share of the estate.

Statement by Grant, J.:

Freeman Fishbeck died July 21, 1882, leaving a widow and five children,—three sons, named William, Charles, and John, and two daughters, Mrs. Ida Smock and Alma Jessup. Upon the petition of Mrs. Jessup, Charles was appointed administrator, and filed a bond with John and William as sureties. September 6, 1882, an inventory was filed showing an appraisal of personal property of $11,752.47, real estate, $2,500,—total, $14,252.47. The personal property consisted of notes, merchandise, farm stock, tools, and household goods. Charles continued as administrator until his death, March 21, 1903. He never rendered an annual or final account, and no account was found showing an itemized statement of receipts and disbursements. For four years he was also judge of probate. No commissioners on claims were appointed, and no claims were presented to or allowed by the probate judge. His widow lived upon the small farm, the homestead, about 17 acres of which only was improved, until her death in 1892. Her estate was never probated. She had nothing except that to which she was entitled from her husband's estate. No allowance was made for her support and maintenance, neither was a dower admeasured to her. The small farm was leased, evidently, with the understanding on the part of all the heirs, to a tenant, who took care of their mother, with what assistance Charles provided her with out of the estate. Mrs. Smock testified that she was "perfectly willing Charles should take whatever needed, and pay it to her. I thought he was doing it." On January 1, 1883, the administrator distributed among the heirs $7,500; April 15, 1885, $1,000; May 20, 1892, $3,250. In all he has distributed to each of his brothers and sisters out of the estate the sum of $3,146.05, making a total, including the same amount to himself, of $15,730.25. Upon the death of the administrator, his daughter Grace Knapp was appointed administratrix de bonis non, and filed an account as near as it could be ascertained of receipts and disbursements by her father. To this allowance Mrs. Smock and Mrs. Jessup objected. The account was allowed by the probate court, and an appeal taken to the circuit court. The trial was there had before a jury. The account as filed showed credits of $19,843.18 and debits amounting to $19,266.28. In this account the jury made one correction, charging the administrator with an item of $355.47. Among the items so allowed was an item of services by the administrator for 21 years of $750. The court, in rendering judgment, reduced this item to the statutory allow-

If the executor or administrator, there-

If, however, the bank fails shortly after he makes the deposit, and he is cashier of the bank, and should know of its failing condition, he is liable. Re Scudder, 21 Misc. 179, 47 N. Y. Supp. 101.

In Germania Safety Vault & T. Co. v. Driskill, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 2050, 66 S. W. 610, it was held that, where the president of a trust company, acting as administrator, was also president of the bank where the funds of the estate were deposited, he must have known the condition of the bank, and the trust company would not be permitted to rely on the bank's reputation for solvency; and, in such case, the trust company would be held liable for the funds lost by reason of the bank's failure.

Where the money was deposited by the decedent during his lifetime, and the account, being in a bank of good repute, is transferred to the administrator, as administrator, and is left there by him, he is not liable for its loss upon failure of the bank. Sheerin v. Public Administrator, 2 Redf. 421; Boore v. Eure, 101 N. C. 11, 9 Am. St. Rep. 17, 7 N. E. 471; Hanbest's Appeal, 92 Pa. 482; Re Seamans, 2 Lack. Legal News, 271.

In Seidler's Estate, 5 Phila. 85, it was held that, although the executor was paying and receiving teller of the bank where the testator had deposited the money, he was not liable for leaving the deposit there, if he had no knowledge of the bank's actual condition.

But in Norwood v. Harness, 98 Ind. 134, 49 Am. Rep. 739, it was held that, where the administrator left the decedent's deposit in the same bank for over a year, during which time it had the reputation of being unsafe and weak, which reputation he could have learned by using reasonable or ordinary diligence, he was liable for its loss upon failure of the bank.

In Cook v. Barnes, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1533, 43 S. W. 682, the executor was held not liable for failure to withdraw the entire amount left on deposit by the testator, though he knew of the weak condition of the bank, but was advised by testator shortly before his death, and by prominent business men, that to attempt to withdraw the entire amount would precipitate the failure of the bank, and cause the loss of the entire fund, and that to draw out small amounts at a time was the safest way of getting the whole of the deposit.

If, however, the executor or administrator deposits the funds in his individual name, he will be personally liable to the estate if ance, so that the judgment as rendered made the credits $19,330.37 and the debits $19,266.28. It thus appears that the administrator had paid out $64.09 more than he received. The objections relate (1) to amount paid heirs at law; (2) to a loss by the administrator of funds deposited in a bank known as the "Weimeister Bank;" (3) to the payment of certain debts without their allowance by commissioners, or by the probate judge acting as commissioner; (4) expenses in erecting the vault; (5) a mortgage known as the "Yelland mortgage;" (6) administrator's fees; (7) the item of $750, allowed to the administrator as paid to the widow of Freeman Fishbeck.

No appearance for plaintiffs in error.

Nor will the fact that he informed the officers of the bank, at the time of making the deposit, that the funds were trust funds, relieve him of liability for a loss due to the bank's failure, if the deposit was made in his individual name. *Harward v. However, in Atterberry v. McDuffee, 31 Mo. App. 603, it was held that, where the bank cashier knew that the money belonged to the estate; and the executor did not direct, nor intend, that it should be placed to his individual credit; and it was entirely the fault of the cashier that it was not properly accredited; and the executor had no individual account at the bank,—he was not liable for its loss by reason of the failure of the bank.

The executor or administrator will be held liable for such a loss if he loans the money to a bank for a fixed time, instead of depositing it subject to withdrawal at pleas-

Grant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

And he will be liable for loss of the deposit by reason of the bank's failure, if he might and ought to have made final settlement and distribution long before the failure of the bank. Norwood v. Harness, 98 Ind. 134, 49 Am. Rep. 739.

In Mandeville v. Arnoult, 9 Rob. (La.) 447, the executor was held liable for the loss, where he permitted the money of the estate to lie two years or more in the bank, and there was no proper desire manifested to pay existing debts and legacies until the bank had suspended payment in specie.

In Wood v. Myrick, 17 Minn. 408, Gil. 386, the executor was held liable for loss by failure of the bank, he having kept the money on deposit for more than five years, and having made no effort to settle the estate.

In McNabb v. Wixom, 7 Nev. 163, the administrator was held liable for the loss due to the failure of the bank, where he allowed the money of the estate, which he had deposited in the bank, to remain there after the time when, if he had fulfilled his duty, it would have been distributed and in the hands of those entitled to it.

An executor who needlessly deposits or keeps money of the estate in a bank, when it is wanted for the immediate payment of debts of the estate, and pays these debts out of his own funds, will not be allowed, after the failure of the bank, to charge to the estate the amounts so paid. Guthrie v. Wheeler, 51 Conn. 207; Woodley v. Holley, 111 N. C. 380, 16 S. E. 419.

was reasonable and a fair charge, that the funeral expense was also reasonable and a proper charge, and that the physicians' bills for their mother should be allowed. The holding of this court in Brown v. Forsche, 43 Mich. 492, 5 N. W. 1011, speaking through Justice Cooley, is applicable to this case: "A probate case on appeal is to be tried and determined on the same principles that would be administered by the probate court itself. That court, in adjusting the accounts of administrators, is governed by broad principles of equity; and it is at all times competent for the administrator, unimpeded by technical rules, to show the fairness of his dealings, the real nature of his transactions, and to restrict the amount for which he should be held liable to that which equity demands." This case must be examined and determined upon equity principles. The contestants are presumed to know the law. There is no claim that they did not. The first distribution gave each of the heirs the full amount of the personal property aside from that which should have been assigned to the widow. There was no necessity of administration, except to pay the insignificant amount of the debts and distribute the estate. While there is no evidence of any express agreement between the heirs of Freeman Fishbeck that the estate should be divided without further expense of administration, the conclusion is irresistible that they trusted their brother Charles, the administrator, to divide the estate, which he promptly did, to retain enough for the care of their mother, and to preserve the homestead for her use while she lived. That the administrator faithfully and honestly did this is beyond dispute. Upon the death of the mother the real estate was sold by the heirs and the amount received divided between them.

We will now discuss the several claims of the respondent:

1. Without entering much into detail, we think it is clearly shown by the evidence that both contestants received each the same amount as the brothers received, to wit: $3,146.05. Mrs. Jessup was not a witness, neither was her deposition taken. The dispute in her case arises over a certificate of deposit for $700. It is sufficient to say that she received it from the administrator, and it was a payment upon her distributive share. Mrs. Smock claims that her amount is $300 short. This $300 is accounted for by the fact that her husband received it for her, and with the understanding that he received it as a part of her distributive share. She testified: "If my husband got it, I am willing to have it apply on my share." He testified that he did get it, and that it was to apply on her share of the estate.

2. The administrator deposited money as administrator in the Weimeister Bank. The bank then had good credit and standing in the community. It subsequently failed. The percentage received by the administrator from the bank was promptly divided among the heirs and receipted for by them. There is nothing in the record to show that the administrator was guilty of negligence in so depositing the funds. The law, therefore, does not hold him liable for the loss. Re Gammel, 120 Mich. 487, 79 N. W. 706, and authorities there cited. It is, however, claimed that the administrator's estate is liable for the loss, because he was dilatory in the settlement of the estate, and that, had he divided the estate seasonably, the loss would not have occurred; citing Wood v. Myrick, 17 Minn. 408, Gil. 386; Re Palmer, 1 Dougl. (Mich.) 422; 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 352, and note. This money was received by the administrator in payment of a mortgage on June 18, 1889. The bank failed three months and seven days thereafter. The administrator had the right to retain funds in his hands for the care of his mother, and it was evidently so understood by all the heirs that he should do so. She might at any time apply for her share of the estate. The principle of those cases therefore does not apply.

3. Whether, under any circumstances, an administrator may pay the debts of the estate which have not been allowed by commissioners or by the probate judge, we find it unnecessary to determine. The administrator kept no regular book account. In a tin box were found some receipted bills and memoranda of payments made by him for various items. Some are dated and some are not; the receipted bills not being printed in the record and the date not given. They were in evidence before the jury and the court. All the record shows in regard to the item of $35.50 for merchandise, purchased from Hickey & Goodnoe, appears from a witness who produced the papers from the tin box. After testifying to certain small items, consisting of repairs upon the barn, dated July 12, 1892, the witness said: "The next item of merchandise to Hickey & Goodnoe, $35.50, I got from the items in the tin box." Its date is not shown, and we cannot determine whether it was incurred by the deceased in his lifetime, or expended by the administrator for the support of his mother, or for repairs. As already stated, the answers of the respondents conceded the correctness of the services for medical attendance. This concession eliminates them from consideration. Aside from these items, the amount is so small that it is not equal to the balance due the administrator as allowed by the court.

4. The administrator was allowed $450 for the construction of a vault, and subsequently other items were allowed for repairing it. The three brothers contributed $200 apiece out of their own funds towards its construction. Mrs. Jessup subsequently contributed $100 towards repairing it. This repair was necessary for the preservation of the vault and the bodies there reposing. The erection of the vault was in accordance with the expressed wish of the father. The amount was reasonable and was properly allowed. Jackson v. Leech, 113 Mich. 391, 71 N. W. 846. To construct a vault for the repose of the dead is as proper as the erection of a monument. Re Shipman, 82 Hun, 108, 31 N. Y. Supp. 571. The two cemetery lots were purchased on which to erect the vault. The title of one lot was taken in the name of the mother. The title of the other was taken in the name of the three sons and the mother. It is immaterial that the title to the lots was taken in the names of the mother and the sons. Birkholm v. Wardell, 42 N. J. Eq. 337, 7 Atl. 569. The expenditure of a reasonable amount of money to keep the vault in repair was a proper charge against the estate. Bell v. Briggs, 63 N. H. 592, 4 Atl. 702.

5. One of the assets of the estate was a mortgage, dated February 27, 1877, due five years from date, and given by one Yelland for $700. This mortgage was found among the papers of the administrator after his death. The administratrix with the will annexed, in the honest belief that this had not been paid, commenced foreclosure suit. The bill was dismissed; the court finding that the mortgage had been paid. The foreclosure proceedings are not in the record, and it does not appear when the mortgage was paid to the administrator. He was charged with the face of the mortgage and the interest up to the time of the appraisal of the assets of the estate. It is stated in the brief of counsel for the appellee that the court found that the mortgage must have been paid soon after the death of Freeman Fishbeck, or soon after it became due. Why it was not discharged does not appear. In the absence of proof, the presumption is that past-due debts of the estate were promptly collected by the administrator. The court so held. It follows that the administrator is not chargeable with interest on this item.

6. The administrator was allowed the statutory fees. Considering that the administrator collected the funds of this estate, took care of the farm, looked after the care of his mother, and promptly divided to each his share, the court might with propriety have allowed some extra compensation. The petitioners cannot justly find fault with the allowance of the statutory fees.

7. It is evident that the mother could not be properly cared for upon the income from the little farm on which she lived. It is shown from the memoranda made by the administrator, found in the tin box, that from July, 1882, to October 4, 1884, he paid her cash amounting to $171.75. In making out the account the administratrix de bonis non credited him with $75 a year for the benefit of the mother. We think the evidence justifies this allowance.

8. It is entirely clear that the administrator acted with promptness in the collection and distribution of the estate among his brothers and sisters; that by the assent of all he provided for his mother, took her to his home during her last illness, paid her physicians' bills and funeral expenses; and that after her death he promptly divided among them what he had retained for her support. It is impossible to read this record without reaching the conclusion that he acted honestly, that none of the estate remained in his hands, and that all understood that the entire estate was divided. The contestants and their brothers were intelligent, were fully cognizant of their rights, and it is impossible to believe that they would have waited twenty years after the death of their father and ten years after the death of their mother, if they had supposed that their brother still retained in his hands moneys belonging to them. Undoubtedly the discovery of the Yelland mortgage after his death caused the proceedings for the appointment of an administratrix de bonis non. It proved that there was no estate left to administer.

The judgment is affirmed.

JAMES T. ELWELL, Respt.,

v.

EDGAR F. COMSTOCK, Appt.

(— Minn. —, 109 N. W. 698.)

Elections—secrecy.

1. Section 6 of article 7 of the Constitution, providing that all elections, except for town officers, shall be by ballot, was intended to secure to the elector the privilege of exercising his right of franchise secretly.

Headnotes by BROWN, J.

Case Note.—Use of voting machine as violation of constitutional requirement that all elections shall be by ballot: — and effectively; in view of which, it is held that any method of conducting elections, sanctioned by legislative authority, which will secure and effect that right, is a substantial compliance with the constitutional mandate.

Same—voting machine.

2. Chapter 267, p. 400, Laws 1905, providing for and authorizing, under certain conditions and restrictions, the use of voting machines at elections in this state, does not contravene the provision of the Constitution that all elections shall be by ballot.

Legislature—delegation of authority.

3. The legislature may delegate the power to determine some fact upon which a statute makes its own action depend.

Same—efficiency of machine.

4. The power delegated to the voting machine commission created by chapter 267, p. 400, Laws 1905, to determine the efficiency of the voting machine thereby authorized to be used at elections in this state, is neither legislative nor judicial, but administrative, in character.

Election—marked ballot.

5. A ballot cast at an election, which is so marked by the elector that his identity is thereby disclosed to any person other than the voter, is void.

Same—intent.

6. When such a mark of identification appears upon a ballot, the elector who cast it cannot be heard to say that he did not intend the mark for that purpose.

Assignments of error.

7. Assignments of error respecting the action of the trial court in counting and re-

There are but two other decisions on the point which were rendered under a constitutional provision in this identical form. Both of these cases, however, cite two previous decisions rendered under a somewhat different constitutional provision.

The first of these four cases in chronological order is that of Re McTammany Voting Machine, 19 R. I. 729, 36 L.R.A. 547, 36 Atl. 716, in which the governor requested the opinion of the justices as to the legality of the adoption of a voting machine under a constitutional provision that voting shall be by ballot; "and in all cases where an election is made by ballot or paper vote, the manner of balloting shall be the same as is now required in voting for general officers, until otherwise prescribed by law." The court said: "The purpose of the Constitution is evidently to provide a record more permanent than that of counting hands, and the like, by which the declared result may be verified. That the manner of securing this might be changed is evident from the use of the phrase 'until otherwise prescribed by law.' We think, therefore, that the present proposal is within the terms and purpose of the Constitution." One of the justices dissented on the ground that the mechanism of the machine was not visible to the voter, and he would have no knowledge through his senses that he had voted or how he had voted.

In Re House Bill No. 1291, 178 Mass. 605, 54 L.R.A. 430, 60 N. E. 129, the question presented to the court by the house of representatives was as to the right to adopt voting machines under the Constitution, which required that representatives "shall be chosen by written vote." Three of the justices rendered an opinion in which it was said: "No doubt the picture in the minds of those who used the words was that of a piece of paper with the names of the candidates voted for written upon it in manuscript, but the thing which they meant to stop was oral or hand voting, and the benefits which they meant to secure were the greater certainty and permanence of a material record of each voter's act and the relative privacy incident to doing that act 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) in silence. They did not require the signature of the voter, or any means of identifying his vote as his after it had been cast.

. . . It seems to us that the object, and even the words, of the Constitution in requiring 'written votes,' are satisfied when the voter makes a change in a material object,—for instance, by causing a wheel to revolve a fixed distance,—if the material object changed is so connected with or related to a written or printed name purporting to be the name of a candidate for office that, by the understanding of all, the making of the change expresses a vote for the candidate whose name is thus connected with the device." A fourth justice concurred in this opinion provided the result of the action of the machine in registering each vote cast was visible to the voter casting the vote, and the work of the machine, in adding up the votes cast, was done under the supervision of some person duly charged with counting the votes cast. Three of the justices dissented, and held that the choice of the voter under the Constitution must be indicated by some kind of writing upon some material thing which could be handled, sorted, and counted, and kept in a material form after the closing of the election.

The third case was that of Detroit v. Inspectors of Election, 139 Mich. 548, 69 L.R.A. 184, 111 Am. St. Rep. 430, 102 N. W. 1029, in which the court held, after hearing arguments of counsel, that a statute permitting the use of a voting machine which assured secrecy, free choice of candidates, a correct record of the vote, and a correct record and announcement of the total vote given for each candidate, did not contravene a constitutional requirement that all votes at elections shall be given by ballot.

The next and only other case to decide the precise question prior to ELWELL v. COMSTOCK was Lynch v. Malley, 215 Ill. 574, 74 N. E. 723. The conclusion reached in this case was the same as that in the Michigan case just cited. Like that case, it also was decided after argument by counsel; and all the justices concurring in the opinion.

A PPEAL by contestee from a judgment of the District Court for Hennepin County in favor of contestant in a proceeding to contest the validity of a certificate of nomination for public office. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Welch, Hayne, & Hubáček and Hale & Montgomery for appellant.

Messrs. George S. Grimes and John H. Steele for respondent.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

James T. Elwell and Edgar F. Comstock were rival candidates for the Republican nomination for senator of the twenty-ninth senatorial district at the primary election held on the 18th day of September, 1906, and the proper canvassing board duly declared Comstock for nominee, issuing to him the usual certificate of nomination. Whereupon Elwell commenced this contest, under the provisions of § 203, Rev. Laws 1905, basing the same on several grounds, claiming that a majority of the legal votes at said election were cast for him. Issue was joined, and the matter came on for hearing before the court below, where it was found as a conclusion of fact that contestant had received a majority of one over contestee, and judgment was ordered declaring him the nominee. Contestee appealed.

Several questions are presented for consideration, which we dispose of in the order of their presentation on the argument. The city council of the city of Minneapolis, in which the senatorial district in question is located, had, under the provisions of chapter 267, p. 400, Laws 1905, prior to the election in question, provided for and authorized the use in certain of the precincts of this senatorial district of the Dean ballot machine, a mechanical contrivance for voting without the use of paper ballots, and such machines were used in two of the precincts of that district. A majority of the votes so cast were in favor of contestant, which, if declared illegal, would throw the nomination to contestee. It is contended by counsel for contestee that the use of these machines was illegal, and the votes cast thereon should be excluded from the canvass. This contention is based upon the claim that chapter 267, p. 400, Laws 1905, providing for and authorizing the use of the same, is unconstitutional and void. It is urged that the statute is void for the reasons: (1) That the subject-matter thereof is not sufficiently expressed in the title; (2) that it violates § 6, art. 7, of the Constitution, which provides that all elections shall be by ballot, except for town officers; and (3) that it violates § 1 of article 3 of the Constitution, in that it delegates legislative and judicial powers to the voting machine commission therein created.

1. The act is entitled "An Act to Authorize the Use of Voting Machines at Elections, and to Authorize Cities, Villages, and Towns to Issue Bonds to Defray the Cost of the Purchase Thereof, and to Repeal Existing Laws Relating to Voting Machines." Under this title, the legislature enacted generally for the purchase and use of voting machines under prescribed conditions and restrictions, and by § 3 created the "Minnesota voting machine commission," consisting of three members, including the attorney general of the state. The powers and duties of the commission are defined, and upon the result of its investigation and determination of the question whether a particular voting machine may be used effectually to express the will of the voters rests the authority of the municipality, through its legislative body, to sanction and provide for its use. The point made against the sufficiency of the title of the act is that the creation of this commission is not referred to, or in any way expressed, thereby, and consequently the act must fall. The objection is not sound. The object of the statute was to provide for the use of voting machines in this state, presumably as an experiment, and the creation of the commission to inspect and determine the efficiency of machines to do the work contemplated is clearly germane and within the comprehensive scope of the title to the act. The provisions for the commission were in no proper sense foreign or dissimilar to the principal subject of the legislation, but, on the contrary, are appropriately adapted to it. Within our decisions the title is sufficient. Ramsey County v. Heenan, 2 Minn. 330, Gil. 281; State v. Cassidy, 22 Minn. 312, 21 Am. Rep. 765; State ex rel. Olsen v. Board of Control, 85 Minn. 165, 88 N. W. 533. See also Flechten v. Lamberton, 69 Minn. 187, 72 N. W. 65. In that case it was contended that the act of the legislature of 1893, providing for the erection and construction of a new state capitol (chap. 2, p. 6, Laws, 1893), was unconstitutional for the reason, among others, that the subject-matter thereof was not sufficiently expressed in the title. The act was entitled "An Act to Provide a New Capitol for the State of Minnesota." Among its numerous provisions, was one creating a capitol commission, with power to purchase or condemn a site, select plans, erect and construct a new state building, The court held that the provisions for this commission were not foreign to the subject of the act, as expressed in its title, and the statute was upheld. The creation of the commission in that statute, as in the statute here under consideration, was a mere detail of the legislation, and in no way disconnected with or impertinent to the subject-matter expressed in the title.

2. It is next contended that the statute contravenes § 6, art. 7, of the Constitution, which provides that all elections, except for certain town officers, shall be by ballot. This provision of our fundamental law was construed in Brisbin v. Cleary, 26 Minn. 107, 1 N. W. 825, to mean a mode of designating an elector's choice of a person for an office by the deposit of a ticket bearing the name of such person in a receptacle provided for the purpose, in such a way as to secure to the elector the privilege of complete and inviolable secrecy in regard to the person voted for. "The privilege of secrecy," said the court, "may properly be regarded as the distinguishing feature of ballot voting." The voting machine is of recent origin and invention. It was neither known or thought of at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. The framers thereof did not have in mind any such method of conducting elections. What they had in view, and intended to secure, was, as held in the Brisbin Case, the privilege of the citizen to exercise his right of franchise in secret, as distinguished from the yea and nay method. Though the method of voting at the time the Constitution was adopted was, and since has been, by printed ballots or tickets, the Constitution should not be restrained to the strict sense in which, and in reference to which, its language was employed, if its main purpose may be otherwise fully attained. If, by any method substantially in accordance with its spirit, secret and effective exercise of the elective franchise may be accomplished, that method should not be held in violation of the fundamental law merely because not in accord with its letter.

Constitutions are not made for existing conditions only, nor in the view that the state of society will not advance or improve, but for future emergencies and conditions, and their terms and conditions are constantly expanded and enlarged by construction to meet the advancing and improving affairs of men. We cannot do better than to quote on this subject from Chief Justice Parker in Henshaw v. Foster, 9 Pick. 312, a case involving this immediate question. It appears from that case that the Constitution of Massachusetts provided that elections should be by written ballots; that at an election held in that state certain electors tendered their printed ballots, which were rejected as not in conformity with the Constitution. The court held that, though voting by printed ballots was unknown at the time of the adoption of the Constitution (1790), that method came fairly within the scope of the law, and that the printed ballots were improperly rejected by the election officers. In the course of the opinion Justice Parker said: "We are to suppose that those who were delegated to the great business of distributing the powers which emanated from the sovereignty of the people, and to the establishment of rules for the perpetual security of the rights of person and property, had the wisdom to adapt their language to future as well as existing emergencies, so that words competent to the then existing state of the community, and at the same time capable of being expanded to embrace more extensive relations, should not be restrained to their more obvious and immediate sense, if, consistently with the general object of the authors and the true principles of the compact, they can be extended to other relations and circumstances which an improved state of society may produce." The same question came up in the state of Maine in an early day, and a change from a written to a printed ballot was upheld. In Opinion of Justices, 7 Me. 495, it was said in that case that the framers of the Constitution intended by the provision that elections should be by written ballots to exclude all other modes by which elections are often decided in popular assemblies, and that the word "ballot" was used in contradistinction to voting by ayes and nays or the uplifted hand. Other authorities are in line with this view of the law. Ex parte Arnold, 128 Mo. 260, 33 L.R.A. 386, 49 Am. St. Rep. 557, 30 S. W. 768, 1036; Temple v. Mead, 4 Vt. 535; Williams v. Stein, 38 Ind. 90, 10 Am. Rep. 97.

The statute under consideration provides that voting machines may be used and employed at elections, when so constructed and operated as to secure to every elector an opportunity to vote in secret, to permit him to vote once for all candidates of his choice, whether of the same or different political parties, and to prevent a person from voting for more than one candidate, unless lawfully entitled to vote for more than one, and shall record his vote as cast. We are not concerned with the question whether the machine involved in the case at bar, or any similar machine is, or may be, so constructed and operated as to meet the requirements of the Constitution respecting the right of secrecy, or whether it enables the elector to express his choice of candidates understandingly and with the assurance that his vote will be counted as cast. The machine is not before us, and we are not advised of its mechanism. We assume, for the purposes of the case, that by the use of the machine every elector may thereby fully and fairly exercise his constitutional rights in this respect. The only question presented in this connection is whether this method of voting conforms to the constitutional mandate that all elections shall be by ballot. The precise question has been before the courts of our sister states. In Rhode Island under a constitutional provision like our own, it was held that the legislature had the power to authorize the use of the McTammany voting machine, of the precise mechanism of which we are not informed, but presume that it is substantially like the one used in this election (Re McTammany Voting Machine, 19 R. I. 729, 36 L.R.A. 547, 36 Atl. 716; Re McTammany Voting-Machine, 23 R. I. 630, 50 Atl. 265); and by a divided court, in Massachusetts (Re House Bill No. 1291, 178 Mass. 605, 54 L.R.A. 430, 60 N. E. 129). By the supreme court of Michigan (Detroit v. Inspectors of Election, 139 Mich. 548, 69 L.R.A. 184, 102 N. W. 1029), the question is discussed at some length, and pertinent authorities are there collected and commented upon; also by the supreme court of Illinois (Lynch v. Malley, 215 Ill. 574, 74 N. E. 723).

In view of the objects sought to be attained and secured by the framers of the Constitution, it is unnecessary to consult the lexicographers for a definition of the word "ballot." It was not employed in its literal sense, but only for the purpose of designating a method of conducting elections which would insure secrecy and the integrity of the ballot. From the earliest days of popular elections, constant improvement is shown in the methods of conducting the same, to the end that there may be a free and honest expression of choice at the polls. Every step has been contested in the courts only to be approved and upheld. The Australian ballot law, and the primary election for the nomination of candidates for office, on the whole a wise regulation of an important step in the selection of public servants, and designed to relieve in a measure party managers of the burdens heretofore cast upon or assumed by them respecting the management and results of political conventions, were both assailed as innovations upon constitutional rights, but have been sustained by the courts. The voting machine at this date is an experiment, and, if capable of accomplishing what is claimed for it, will overcome in a striking degree many of the evils now said to surround the conduct of elections. If by the use of the machine the main purpose of the Constitution can be effectuated, if the elector may cast his ballot in secret with the assurance that it will be counted as cast, there can be no sound reason why it should be dismissed as an innovation upon the letter of the law. It is of no material consequence that each elector is not supplied with a separate ballot, so long as he may register his choice secretly, upon an official record, in the charge of and under the control of public officers, whose sworn duty it is to observe the requirements of the law respecting the conduct of the election, which includes the preservation and report of the result of the ballot. For these reasons we hold that the use of the voting machine does not violate the constitutional requirement that all elections shall be by ballot.

3. It is also contended that the statute is unconstitutional, in that it delegates judicial and legislative functions to the commission therein designated. We find no special force in this contention. The statute expressly provides for the use of the machines under the restriction that they will permit an elector to exercise his right of franchise in accordance with the constitutional guaranty. The only question left or delegated to the commission for determination is whether any machine submitted for use will permit the accomplishment of that end. This amounts to no more than a condition upon which depends the right to use the machine, and not a conditional taking effect of the statute itself. It is well settled that the legislature may delegate the power to determine some fact or state of things upon which a statute makes, or intends to make, its own action depend. 8 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 830, and cases cited. The law on this subject is clearly and correctly summed up by Justice Mitchell in State ex rel. Hagestad v. Sullivan, 67 Minn. 379, 69 N. W. 1094, wherein the validity of chapter 229, p. 575, Laws 1895, providing for the establishment of municipal courts in certain cities, was involved. It was contended in that case that the statute there under consideration was unconstitutional, because it delegated legislative powers to the electors, in that it provided that the act should not go into effect except upon a four-fifths vote of the municipal council. In disposing of the question, Justice Mitchell said: "But it is equally well settled that it is not always essential that a legislative act must in any event take effect as law after it leaves the hands of the legislature. If the law is, in its provisions, a complete statute in other respects when it leaves the legislature, its taking effect may be made conditional upon some subsequent event. When that event happens, the statute takes effect, and becomes the law, by force of legislative action, as fully as if they had unconditionally fixed the time when it should take effect." The statute there under consideration, unlike the one in the case at bar, did not go into effect until favorable action by the municipal council, yet the court held it valid legislation. The voting machine statute goes into effect by its own terms from and after its passage, it being left to the commission to determine whether a particular voting machine will meet its requirements.

The "boiler inspector act" (chapter 253, p. 406, Laws 1889), providing for the inspection of steam boilers, was sustained in State ex rel. Graham v. McMahon, 65 Minn. 453, 68 N. W. 77, against the contention that the provisions thereof which exempted from its operation boilers which had been inspected by certain insurance companies and certified to be safe were a delegation of legislative power. Other cases in this court are to the same effect. State ex rel. Beek v. Wagener, 77 Minn. 483, 46 L.R.A. 442, 77 Am. St. Rep. 681, 80 N. W. 633, 778, 1134; State ex rel. Railroad & W. Commission v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 38 Minn. 281, 37 N. W. 782. This view of the question is upheld by other courts. A very similar case is Leeper v. State, 103 Tenn. 500, 48 L.R.A. 167, 53 S. W. 962. In that case, a "uniform text-book act" authorized the selection and adoption through a commission of a uniform series of text-books for the schools of the state. It was contended that the statute was unconstitutional, in that it delegated legislative power to the commission. The court held that it conferred executive or administrative functions only; that the act took effect from and after its passage, though details of administration of the act were, of necessity, put in the hands of a commission. See also Re Chapman, 166 U. S. 661, 41 L. ed. 1154, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 677; Turner v. Detroit, 104 Mich. 326, 62 N. W. 405; State v. Williams (State v. Thompson) 160 Mo. 333, 54 L.R.A. 950, 83 Am. St. Rep. 468, 60 S. W. 1077; Haney v. Bartow County, 91 Ga. 770, 18 S. E. 28; Kansas City v. Ward, 134 Mo. 172, 35 S. W. 600; Locke's Appeal, 72 Pa. 491, 13 Am. Rep. 716.

Our conclusion upon this branch of the case is that the duties imposed upon the voting machine commission by the statute are administrative in character, and in no proper sense either legislative or judicial.

4. It is further contended by contestee that the voting machine in question was never approved or its use authorized by the commission. Though the proceedings in this respect are somewhat indefinite, and perhaps irregular, we hold that sufficient authority was given by the commission to use the machine. At any rate, any irregularity in this respect should not result in disfranchising the electors. No fraud is charged, and, from aught that appears, the election was fairly and honestly conducted. Hankey v. Bowman, 82 Minn. 328, 84 N. W. 1002; State ex rel. Murphy v. Bernier (Minn.) 38 N. W. 309.

5. It is also contended that the court below erred in counting and refusing to count certain of the ballots cast at the election, and in the admission and exclusion of evidence in connection therewith. We find no error in this branch of the case sufficient to change the result reached by the trial court. A number of the ballots cast bore marks evidently placed thereon for the purpose of identification. The names of the electors were plainly written upon the face or back of the ballots, by which the identity of the voter was disclosed. The court below properly rejected all these ballots. Pennington v. Hare, 60 Minn. 150, 62 N. W. 116. In one or two instances the elector wrote his name on the back of the ballot, and then completely erased it, so it could not serve as a mark of identification. These were properly counted by the trial court. There were other ballots upon which appeared capital letters, apparently the initials of the name of the elector, such as "W. K." and "W. S. F." These came within the statute prohibiting the identification of ballots, and were illegal. It may be stated as a general rule that where an elector places upon his ballot some mark, whether by writing thereon the initials of his name or otherwise, the result of which is to identify the ballot cast by him and to disclose for whom he voted, he violates the statute and destroys his vote. It is unnecessary that the mark be of such a character as to enable every person inspecting it to identify the voter. The purpose of the statute in prohibiting marks of identification is not wholly that of secrecy, but in part, perhaps mainly, to prevent the corruption of the voter and to secure a free and untrammelled expression of the popular will. Any mark placed upon a ballot, therefore, by which the voter may be identified by any person, vitiates the ballot. The particular mark may be agreed upon by a corrupt elector with his corruptor, which might be wholly unintelligible to all other persons, yet the statute would be violated just as completely as though fully understood by all. Where such a mark appears upon a ballot, distinguishing it from others, the natural inference of which, and which the court can clearly say, is one of identification, the person who cast it cannot be heard to say that he did not intend to identify it. To permit explanations of this sort would open the door to gross frauds and corruption, which public policy and the law demand should be guarded against. In the case at bar, two electors indorsed the initials of their names upon the ballots cast by them immediately under the names of the judges of election. On the trial they were called as witnesses and testified that they had no intention of identifying their ballots, but understood the judges of election to direct them to indorse their initials thereon. In this particular case the explanation may be true. It undoubtedly is. But, if the statutes are to be enforced, and the purpose thereof effectuated, explanations of this kind must be excluded. The initials upon the back of these ballots were clearly in violation of the statute, and the court properly excluded them.

One of the contested ballots, which the trial court counted, had opposite the name of one of the candidates for mayor the word "nit." Upon another were written, after the names of the candidates for alderman, the words, "May the best man win." It is clearly apparent that these ballots were not so labeled for the purpose of identification, and they were properly counted, within the rule of Truelsen v. Hugo, 81 Minn. 73, 83 N. W. 500.

A number of other ballots were challenged by the respective parties, to which we deem it unnecessary to refer. Except in one or two instances, the rulings of the trial court were correct. Errors in this respect were on both sides, and neutralized each other.

Our conclusion is that of the legal votes cast at the election in question, contestant received a majority of two, instead of one, as found by the trial court; and he was therefore the regular nominee for the office of senator.

The action of the court below is affirmed.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

PRESIDENT, ETC., OF INSURANCE COMPANY OF NORTH AMERICA, Appt.,

v.

D. W. PITTS.

(— Miss. —, 41 So. 5.)

Insurance—sole ownership—vendor's lien.

1. One holding real estate under a conveyance in fee is sole and unconditional owner, within the meaning of a fire-insurance policy, notwithstanding he owes a portion of the purchase price, for which the statute gives a vendor's lien.

Same—vacancy—reoccupancy—revival of policy.

2. Reoccupancy, before the fire occurs, of an insured building after a vacancy, sufficient to avoid the policy under a condition against vacancy, revives the policy, so as to permit a recovery in case the fire occurs during the occupancy.

(June 4, 1906.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Tallahatchie County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a fire-insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Williamson, Wells, & Peyton for appellant.

Messrs. Dudley & Boatner and Harris & Powell for appellee.

Calhoon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The insurance company sought to defeat recovery of a fire loss because of two clauses in the policy, declaring that it should be void: (1) "If the interest of the insured be other than unconditional and sole ownership;" (2) if the building "be or become vacant or unoccupied, and so remain for ten days."

As to the first, the facts are that at the date of the policy Pitts was in possession under a conveyance of title in fee simple. But the conveyance recites a cash payment of $200 and four deferred annual payments of $200 each. It does not expressly reserve a vendor's lien to secure the deferred payments, but our law gives that. It is to be noted in this record that there was no written application for the insurance, nor any representations made. The policy was issued pursuant to telephonic request to an agent, and so the reliance of the company is on the terms of the policy itself, with no pretense of any misrepresentations. We have no trouble in taking alignment with those decisions holding that Mr. Pitts was sole and unconditional owner in the purview of the law, notwithstanding there was a debt for purchase price. Union Assur. Soc. v. Nalls, 101 Va. 613, 99 Am. St. Rep. 923, 44 S. E. 896; Milwaukee Mechanics' Ins. Co.

Case Note.—Vendor's lien as affecting sold and unconditional ownership:—

Fire-insurance policies generally contain a provision similar to that found in the one sued upon in INSURANCE CO. OF N. A. v. PITTS, that the policy shall be void if the insured's interest in the property covered by the policy is any other than the entire, unconditional, and sole ownership. It is well settled that this provision is not violated by the existence of a vendor's lien upon the insured property, in the absence of any wilfully false and fraudulent misrepresentations or concealment by the insured; and nearly all the authorities are in accord with the PITTS CASE upon this proposition.

v. Rhea, 60 C. C. A. 103, 123 Fed. 9; Ellis v. Insurance Co. of N. A. 32 Fed. 646; 19 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 693; Morotock Ins. Co. v. Rodefer, 53 Am. St. Rep. 846, and notes (92 Va. 747, 24 S. E. 393). Strict construction as against the insurer is the rule, and the clause relates to the legal character of the title. In Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. v. Cochran, 77 Miss. 348, 78 Am. St. Rep. 524, 26 So. 932, there was a written application for the insurance, and in it a deliberate misstatement that the applicants were the sole and unconditional owners, whereas, in fact, they owned only an undivided one-half interest. This case can have no influence on that at bar. The decision was clearly correct. In Rosenstock v. Mississippi Home Ins. Co. 82 Miss. 674, 35 So. 309, Rosenstock, the insured, was the vendor of the property, not in his possession, but of which he had put his vendee in possession, to whom he was under written agreement to convey on payment of a purchase price of which he had actually received much more than one half. He could not be regarded as unconditional owner. He was owner only on the express condition to convey. This decision does not affect the case before us, as its reasoning demonstrates.

On the second contention, the facts are that, pending the policy, the premises were at one time vacant for more than ten days,

Thus, in Planters' Mut. Ins. Asso. v. Hamilton, 77 Ark. 27, 90 S. W. 283, the court deemed it well settled that the encumbrance of a vendor's lien would work no forfeiture of a policy of fire insurance, though it contained the sole-ownership provision.

So, in McClelland v. Greenwich Ins. Co. 107 La. 124, 31 So. 691, it was held that the fact that the land upon which the insured building was located was still encumbered with the vendor's privilege to secure part of the original purchase price did not invalidate an insurance policy containing such provision, in the absence of a showing by the defendant "that a particular statement of interest had been required of the insured, and he had made fraudulent concealment or misrepresentation of such interest." Here the insured property was still further encumbered by a judgment lien and a mortgage. The court said that the mere fact that the insured owed debts which operated as liens on his property did not violate the unconditional, sole ownership requirement of the policy.

And in Southern Ins. Co. v. Estes, 106 Tenn. 472, 52 L.R.A. 915, 82 Am. St. Rep. 892, 62 S. W. 149, it was held that neither the existence of a vendor's lien on insured property, nor the institution of proceedings to foreclose it, would avoid a policy with such a provision.

And in Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. v. Ricker, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 264, 31 S. W. 248, it was held that a policy containing such provision would not be invalidated by the insured's failure to disclose that there were unpaid purchase-money notes outstanding against the insured property, and that the vendor had reserved a lien to secure their payment. Here the insured made no representation whatever to the company as to his ownership; nor was any inquiry made of him in regard thereto; and there was no part of the purchase money due at the time of the fire; nor had the insured made any default in the payment thereof; and, after the fire, he settled in full with his vendor for the notes.

The same result was reached in Alamo F. Ins. Co. v. Lancaster, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 677, 28 S. W. 126, in which it was held that the 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

unconditional-ownership clause referred to the quality of the title, and not to liens and encumbrances upon the property, and that therefore a policy of insurance that contained such clause would not be invalidated by the fact that there were purchase-money notes outstanding against the property. It was contended in this case that there was a vendor's lien upon the land by reason of these notes, and that therefore the policy was forfeited; but the court did not commit itself as to whether or not there was a vendor's lien under these circumstances.

Altogether similar in principle is Woody v. Old Dominion Ins. Co. 31 Gratt. 362, 31 Am. Rep. 732, though the policy sued upon contained a somewhat different provision as to the ownership, as follows: "Any interest in property insured, not absolute, or that is less than a perfect title, . . . must be specifically represented to the company and expressed in this policy in writing; otherwise the insurance shall be void." It was held that the assured's failure to disclose a vendor's lien upon the property insured did not avoid the policy. The court was of the opinion "that, under no proper construction, can these words be taken to have been intended to guard against mere encumbrances. If such had been the intention, language more appropriate for the purpose would have been employed, as we find in policies where disclosure of encumbrances is required. In such the requirement is generally plainly expressed. The mere failure, therefore, of the appellant to make known the existence of the lien which appeared on the face of the deed (the policy not requiring such disclosure, and no inquiries being made) did not vitiate the insurance, there being no fraudulent intent."

There seems to be some doubt whether this rule is altogether accepted by the Kentucky courts, and the only cases throwing any doubt upon it are found in that jurisdiction. Thus, in Security Ins. Co. v. Bronger, 6 Bush, 146, a policy of insurance containing the sole-ownership clause was held to be avoided, where it appeared that the houses covered by such policy were encumbered not only by a lien for the whole consideration which insured had bid for them but actual possession was resumed, and some time afterwards, and while occupied, the fire occurred. If the loss had occurred during the prohibited vacancy, there could be no recovery. This is everywhere held, and so decided by our own court in Home Ins. Co. v. Scales, 71 Miss. 975, 42 Am. St. Rep. 512, 15 So. 134. Authorities are not wanting to sustain the views of learned counsel for appellant, and they are sustained also, by Mr. Ostrander on Fire Insurance, 2d ed. 1897, § 145, and the numerical weight of the decisions he cites in note 5. We prefer to stand on the manifest trend and weight of modern authority, Born v. Home Ins. Co. 110 Iowa, 379, 81 N. W.

676, and on Freeman's note to that case in 80 Am. St. Rep. 310; Elliott, Ins. § 205, and the other citations of the briefs for appellee. If the insurance had been for three years or more, and the premium paid, and the vacancy during the first or last month, and the fire afterwards and during occupancy, it would be very unfair to deprive the insured protection. The common people who insure should not be entrapped by a harsh construction of a technical word. The insurance is revived by occupancy, though suspended during the vacancy.

at a decretal sale, but also by his wife's dower, as the widow of a former husband (as whose property, excepting the dower, it was sold), and at the date of the insurance policy, and even at the time of the trial, none of the purchase money had been paid. Here the policy provided that the ownership should be for the use and benefit of the insured in addition to requiring it to be entire, unconditional, and sole. It further appeared, however, in this case that the insured represented his title to the insurance company's agent as unencumbered, which statement was also made by him in his application, coupled with the further assertion that his title was exclusive, and that no other person had any interest in the property. In this the court deemed him guilty of voluntary fraud. It does not specifically appear that the legal title to the property covered by the policy was in the insured, but such is a fair presumption from the language of the opinion.

And in Farmers' & D. Ins. Co. v. Curry, 13 Bush, 312, 26 Am. Rep. 194, the foregoing case was followed, and a similar policy was held to be avoided, because the assured had failed to inform the company that the property covered by the policy was encumbered by a vendor's lien for unpaid purchase money, though there was nothing in the opinion to show that there was any fraudulent concealment or misrepresentation on the insured's part. The court said that the insured "held the property in trust for her vendor until the purchase money was paid. . . . Her ownership was therefore conditional, and to the extent of the unpaid purchase money was not for her use and benefit, but for the use and benefit of her vendor, and, her interest being untruly stated, the policy was void by its express terms."

But the strictness of the two preceding cases has to a great extent been modified by the later decisions of the same court, for in Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Coomes, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 238, it was held that an encumbrance upon the property insured would not invalidate a policy containing such a provision as to ownership, unless it was material to the risk, and that therefore a vendor's lien, which, together with the amount of the insurance, came to $500 less than the actual value of the property would not defeat a recovery by the assured.

And in Fireman's Fund Ins. Co. v. Meschendorf, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 757, it was held that the failure of an applicant for fire insurance to state the existence of a vendor's lien upon the property sought to be insured would not invalidate a policy containing a sole-ownership clause, where no inquiries were made by the insurance company as to that matter, unless the existence of the lien was intentionally and fraudulently concealed. Here the property was worth $300 more than the amount of the insurance and the lien together. The court said: "The lien retained by the vendor of personality is in effect a mortgage; nothing more . . . and will not, even where the fact is misrepresented, when the misrepresentation is not fraudulently made, affect the assured's right of recovery, unless it is such as to make his interest probably less than the amount of the insurance. But, when no inquiry is made of the assured as to his title or the encumbrances upon it, and there is no fraud upon his part, the assured, notwithstanding the provisions of the policy that, 'if he is not the sole, absolute, unconditional owner, etc., the policy shall be void', should be allowed to recover the loss which he has sustained."

A different question, and one not within the scope of this note, which is confined to those cases where the legal title is in the assured, is presented where the assured has but an equitable interest in the property covered by the insurance, while the legal title is vested in another. Still another and a different question, of course, arises where the policy contains a provision avoiding it if all encumbrances are not disclosed, and it is sought to defeat recovery upon the policy upon that ground. The question whether the holder of the legal title, who is under contract to convey, can be regarded as the sole and unconditional owner, is discussed in Insurance Co. of N. A. v. Erickson, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 512, and the note thereto.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF MISSOURI, Resp't.,

v.

ZACH MULHALL, Appt.

(199 Mo. 202, 97 S. W. 583.)

Evidence—contradiction of witness—absence of party.

1. After a witness for defendant in a criminal case has testified on cross-examination designed to show his interest, that he did not have a certain conversation with the prosecuting witness, evidence of such conversation may be admitted to contradict him, although accused was not present when it occurred.

Shooting at another—statutory offense.

2. The wounding of one while shooting at another with intent to kill will not sustain a prosecution for shooting the former with intent to kill, under a statute providing that every person who shall shoot at another with intent to kill such other shall be punished.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for the City of St. Louis convicting him of assault with intent to kill. Reversed.

Statement by Fox, J.:

This cause is here upon appeal by the defendant from a judgment of the circuit court of the city of St. Louis convicting the defendant of an assault with intent to kill. Omitting formal parts, the information upon which this judgment of conviction is based charges: "That Zach Mulhall on the eighteenth day of June in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and four, at the city of St. Louis aforesaid, with force and arms, in and upon one Ernest Morgan feloniously, wilfully, on purpose, and of his malice aforethought, did make an assault; and the said Zach Mulhall, with a certain weapon, to wit, a pistol loaded with gunpowder and leaden balls, then and there feloniously, wilfully, on purpose, and of his malice aforethought, did shoot off, at, against, and upon the said Ernest Morgan, then and there giving to the said Ernest Morgan with the pistol aforesaid one wound, with the intent then and there him, the said Ernest Morgan, feloniously, wilfully, on purpose, and of his malice aforethought to kill; contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state." To this charge there was waiver of formal arraignment and plea of not guilty, and at the December term, 1904, the defendant was put upon his trial.

In order to determine the legal propositions presented by the record in this cause, Case Note.—Charging assault with intent to kill when actual intent directed against another:—The court, in the above case, seems to have cited and discussed all the cases which support the position it takes upon this question, except Scott v. State, 49 Ark. 156, 4 S. W. 750. There are, however, a number of authorities which are not in harmony with the doctrine of those cases.

Thus, in Callahan v. State, 21 Ohio St. 306, the prosecution was under a statute which provided "that, if any person shall maliciously shoot . . . any other person with intent to kill, wound, or maim such person, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor." It was held that the law will not permit such reckless disregard of and indifference to results to pass with impunity, but will hold the intent to have embraced the victim, where a shot discharged at one injures another who is at the time known to be in such position or proximity that his injury may be reasonably apprehended as a probable consequence of the act; and the principle is the same whether one or many are imperiled. The indictment in this case charged the intent to kill the person who was actually wounded. The dissimilarity of the statute in this case and that upon which the prosecution was based in STATE v. MULHALL is not sufficient to justify the adverse conclusions of the two courts. But a distinguishing feature lies in the fact that in the one case the defendant saw and knew of the proximity of the injured party, while in the other he did not.

In Dunaway v. People, 110 Ill. 333, 51 Am. Rep. 686, it appeared that the statute under which defendant was indicted provided: "Whoever attempts to commit murder, . . . by any means, shall be guilty of the crime of an assault with intent to commit murder;" and the theory of the defense was that, if defendant intended to kill anyone, it was not the one he actually wounded; and, being charged with an assault with intent to murder the one he actually wounded, instead of the one he really intended to kill, he could not be guilty under the indictment. The court said: "The reasoning on this branch of the case is too subtle to be adopted with safety. Undoubtedly there are cases that hold the doctrine contended for, and so many of the earlier text writers wrote; but the better and more modern doctrine is against the position taken. Conceding, as is done, [that] had the shot fired by defendant killed Hendrickson, it would have been murder, the proposition [that] the severe wounding by the same shot would not have been done with intent to commit murder—that is, to commit the greater crime that might have been the result—finds no sanction either in reason or the analogies of the law."

In Mathis v. State, 39 Tex. Crim. Rep. 549, 47 S. W. 464, the court stated that "an assault with intent to murder can be committed with implied, as well as with it is only necessary to make a brief statement of the facts developed upon the trial. On the part of the state, the testimony tended to show that in the month of June, 1904, the defendant was connected with what was known as a "wild west show" giving exhibitions at the World's Fair in the city of St. Louis. The prosecuting witness, Ernest Morgan, who was about eighteen years of age, testified that he resided in the city of St. Louis, and on the 18th day of June, 1904, was in attendance at the World's Fair, and at about 9 o'clock in the evening of that day went to the Cummins's Wild West Show. According to his testimony the show concluded about 10 o'clock, and he started to leave the building. As he was going out of the show he saw about four or five men directly in front of him engaged in a scuffle, and then he heard a shot. He immediately turned to go back and get away, and when he had gone back four or five steps he heard a second shot. He turned around to see where the shots came from, and saw the defendant, a short distance away, holding a gun in his hands and pointing it directly towards him, the prosecuting witness; then a third shot was fired which prosecuting witness says struck him, and he fell to the ground dangerously wounded. Prosecuting witness testified that he knew the defendant, having seen him in a show before, and at five or six different times in the two or three years preceding the shooting. This witness further testified that when he saw the defendant pointing the revolver towards him he saw a man backing away from the defendant towards and very near to where the prosecuting witness was standing, and that the defendant was looking directly in the direction of Morgan, the prosecuting witness, and that the man who was backing away from defendant had his back toward Ernest Morgan, and was slightly to one side, but nearly in line and between defendant and Morgan. After the shooting, the defendant went through some adjoining buildings, and was making his way toward the rear of the yard of the Siberian Railway Building when arrested. When the defendant was arrested he had in his possession a 38-caliber Smith & Wesson revolver, long barrel. The bullet taken from Morgan's hip was a "38-Long Colt," also known as a "38-calibre Colt bullet." Prosecuting witness at the hospital, the defendant being brought into his presence, identified him as the man who fired the shot. He also identified him at the trial.

The defense interposed in this case is that whatever shots were fired by defendant were at a man by the name of Frank Reed, and that they were fired in proper defense of his person. On the part of the defense express, malice, and the statute defining this offense does not restrict the intent to kill to the person assaulted;" and thereupon held that if A shoots at B with intent of his malice aforethought to kill and murder B, but accidentally shoots C, and inflicts a wound upon him, the malice is carried over to C, makes it an assault with implied malice to murder C.

In Reg. v. Smith, 33 Eng. L. & Eq. 567, it appeared that the prisoner intending to murder one M., and, supposing one T. to be M., shot at and wounded T. It was held that the prisoner, on the above state of facts, had been properly convicted of wounding T. with intent to murder him.

In Walker v. State, 8 Ind. 290, the defendant was indicted and convicted under a statute of that state which declared that "every person who shall perpetrate an assault, or an assault and battery, and an intent to commit a felony, shall, upon conviction thereof, be imprisoned in the state prison;" and the defense insisted upon was that the defendant did not intend to shoot the prosecuting witness, and, therefore, the intent to murder, as laid in the indictment, was not proved. It appeared that defendant deliberately shot into a crowd of persons, among whom was the prosecuting witness, who was wounded by the shot. Although defendant may have intended to murder another person in the same crowd, it was held that, he having committed a battery on the prosecuting witness with a weapon likely to cause death, the jury was authorized to find the intent as charged in the indictment, on the principle that every man is supposed to intend the necessary consequences of his own act.

In State v. Gilman, 69 Me. 163, 31 Am. Rep. 257, the indictment charged an assault with intent to kill. If the prosecution was under statute there is no intimation in the opinion as to its phraseology. It appeared that the defendant deliberately discharged a loaded gun into a crowd. It was held proper to charge the jury that the intent to kill characterizes the act,—goes with it; and, if the blow reaches any person, it carries with it the criminal intent to kill and murder; and, if it takes effect upon a person other than the one intended, the crime is made out precisely the same as though the intention had been to kill and murder the person hit.

In Jennings v. United States, 2 Ind. Terr. 670, 53 S. W. 456, where it appeared that defendant fired into a body of men indiscriminately, it was held proper to refuse an instruction that, before the jury would be authorized to convict him of assault with intent to kill, it must appear from the evidence that he fired at the party named in the indictment with the specific intent to take his life, and that it would not be sufficient to authorize a conviction that he may have fired at someone else.

there was evidence tending to prove that after the Wild West Show was over, between 10 and 11 o'clock, the defendant and three or four friends together started to leave the show, and go out on what was called "the Pike," and that the defendant's attention was called to the fact that Frank Reed might undertake to kill him. There was testimony tending to show that Reed and the defendant had had previous trouble, and that Reed had made threats against the defendant. As the defendant, with these other parties, was walking toward the exit of the show ground and near the outer gate some one hollowed, "Look out, Colonel," and the defendant claims that he observed Reed starting to draw his pistol, and that he drew his revolver, and threw it into the face of Frank Reed; then a scuffle ensued and there were three shots fired from the pistol of the defendant, one of the shots striking Reed. L. S. Corbett and George H. Williams, two of the parties with the defendant, both testified as to the trouble between Reed and the defendant. Corbett testified to seeing, during the trouble, a stout, heavy-set man, and saw in his hand what appeared to him to be a Derringer pistol pointing toward Mulhall. He also testified to several shots being fired, but did not state positively as to who fired the shots. Witness Williams testified as to the scuffle, and that there were several shots fired, and that he saw Mr. Reed during the time working for his gun. He further testified as to a conversation between himself and the prosecuting witness, but as to such conversation there was a conflict between the testimony of the prosecuting witness and Williams and Corbett. There was also a conflict in the testimony offered by the state and the defendant as to the manner of the shooting and the position of the parties.

The defendant, Zach Mulhall, testified in his own behalf. He testified that he saw the prosecuting witness after he was wounded that night, and states that he never saw him before that time to his knowledge or recollection.

He gives his version of the difficulty as follows:

Q. Now, Mr. Mulhall, just state all that occurred with reference to this shooting from the time you left the show up to the time that you were brought in the presence of Morgan.

A. I left the show after the show was over, and went to the dressing room to change my clothes. I had been told several times that evening that Reed had made a threat that he was going to kill me. Well, I didn't pay much attention to it. I didn't care anything about it. He had made several of those kind of threats to the cowboys there, and had been put in jail for it on 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

one or two occasions, and tried for it. And after the show was over, I changed my clothes, and I walked down the entrance to the Pike with Mr. Williams—the two, Mr. Williams and Mr. Corbett, and that was all, I think, three of us—and myself. And on our way down, Johnny Murray and another cowpuncher by the name of Jourdan says, "Yes, you better look out for him. He says he is going to kill you." I never expected he would. I didn't care. I didn't think anything of it. Just before I got out of the entrance I saw him standing up alongside of one of the pillars, and just as I got my eye on him he put his hand behind him for his six-shooter, and I grabbed and threw a six-shooter in his face, and told him to stop it. And Johnny Murray and he grabbed my gun, and they both had a hand apiece on it, and he had his hand on the gun back in his hip pocket. I had one of my hands on this gun, and with the other I reached over and got his hand, and jerked it away from it, and slapped it down on this gun of mine, and held it there, and, in the tussle, this gun of mine went off, and hit Johnny Murray, and when I hit Johnny Murray, he fell back.

Q. That was the first time that the gun exploded?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. That the cartridge exploded?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where did it strike Murray?

A. Hit him right in here and out right below the nipple (indicating). Then he fell back and that let me loose, and I jerked the gun on Reed, and told him to stop, and he pulled his gun,—he was reaching for it all the time. It seemed he couldn't get it out.

Q. Did you see the gun at the time?

A. I never saw it. No, sir. I never fired until I did see it. And he had some difficulty in getting the gun out of his pocket and I told him to stop. I says, "Quit now, quit." And he couldn't get it out. And he reached both hands around for the gun, and when he pulled it I threwed the six-shooter at him, and shot him in the arm. I had aimed at his arm, and broke his arm. When I hit him he jerked the gun in his hand (indicating), and pulled down on me, and I pulled down on him.

Q. Did the second shot hit him again?

A. Yes, I hit him again.

Q. Where?

A. Right in the neck there (indicating).

Q. Your gun exploded three times, the first time it went off as you were scuffling, the second time it struck Reed in the arm?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the third time it struck him in the neck?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How large a man was Reed?

A. I think Reed was about my size.

Q. Well, about what height are you?

A. About 5 feet 10½, weight about 190.

He might have weighed 200, I don't know. About 190 or 195 pounds.

Q. How often did Reed shoot at you, do you know?

A. Reed shot at me three times.

Q. Was there any other shooting besides that?

A. There was other shooting. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, was there anyone in the line between you and Reed in the rear of Reed at that time that you shot the third shot, or the second shot, either one of those times?

A. Not a soul, anyways in line with Reed and myself; that is, my line to Reed, not a soul.

Q. Had any threats been communicated to you that Reed had made about you, about "doing you up" or killing you?

A. Yes, sir; he made open threats there that evening that he was going to kill me.

There was testimony offered in rebuttal by the state, that, when Reed was backing away from the defendant, he was not trying to get a pistol out of his pocket, and other testimony which was in conflict with that offered by the defendant. This is a sufficient indication of the nature and character of the testimony offered upon which this cause was submitted to the jury. At the close of the evidence the court instructed the jury. The record discloses that counsel for appellant properly preserved objections and exceptions to each and all of the instructions given by the court, for the reason that each and all of said instructions are erroneous. Further objections and exceptions were preserved to the failure of the court to fully instruct the jurors on all questions of law arising in the case necessary for their information in the determination of the cause. We deem it unnecessary to reproduce here in full the instructions given by the court. They will be given proper attention during the course of the opinion. The cause was submitted to the jury upon the testimony introduced and the instructions of the court, and they returned a verdict finding the defendant guilty of an assault with intent to kill without malice aforethought, and assessed his punishment at three years' imprisonment in the penitentiary. Timely motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment were filed by the defendant, and by the court taken up and overruled. From the judgment and sentence entered in this cause the defendant prosecutes his appeal to this court, and the record is now before us for consideration.

Messrs. T. J. Rowe and Henry Rowe, for appellant:

A witness cannot be cross-examined as to a collateral matter merely for the purpose of contradicting him.

Messrs. Herbert S. Hadley, Attorney General, and John Kennish for the State.

Fox, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The record in this cause presents numerous complaints of error on the part of the appellant as grounds for the reversal of the judgment in this cause; however, it is manifest from a careful analysis of the record before us that the most vital and important questions are presented in the sixth and eighth grounds alleged in the motion for new trial, which are as follows: "Sixth, The court erred in permitting the prosecuting witness, Ernest Morgan, in rebuttal, to testify to conversations with one George H. Williams, when defendant was not present. Eighth. The court gave erroneous, illegal, and improper instructions." It is the propositions involved in these two complaints of error to which learned counsel for appellant, in his brief, particularly calls our attention. We shall therefore direct our attention to the consideration of the propositions as suggested and indicated above.

1. It is sufficient to say upon the complaint that the court erred in permitting the prosecuting witness, Ernest Morgan, in rebuttal, to testify to a conversation with one George H. Williams when the defendant was not present, that we have examined the record as to the conversation referred to, and are of the opinion that there was no error in the admission of this testimony. The record discloses that Williams was a friend and witness for the defendant, and while on the stand, evidently for the purpose of showing his interest in the case and for the purpose of affecting the weight of his testimony, he was asked upon cross-examination if he did not say to Morgan at the hospital, soon after the shooting, "that a brother of his had seen the shooting, but that he hadn't;" that he stated to Morgan in the conversation that he "called to see how he was getting along, and as soon as he was well enough he wanted him to go to Texas with him, and that he would make a man of him." The witness stated that he had no such conversation. This witness having denied any such conversation, there was no error in the court permitting the prosecuting witness to contradict him, and state in fact what conversation occurred. It is true the defendant was not present, but this testimony was simply admissible for the purpose of indicating the interest of the witness in the case that the jury might take such fact into consideration in weighing his testimony.

2. This brings us to the consideration of the most serious proposition with which we are confronted by the record in this cause; that is, that the court gave erroneous, illegal, and improper instructions to the jury. This proposition necessitates a most careful consideration of the section of the statute upon which this prosecution is based, as well as the tendency of the testimony introduced at the trial, and the theory upon which this cause was submitted to the jury by the instructions of the court. The information in this cause is predicated upon § 1847, Rev. Stat. 1899, which provides: "Every person who shall, on purpose and of malice aforethought, shoot at or stab another, or assault or beat another with a deadly weapon, or by any other means or force likely to produce death or great bodily harm, with intent to kill, maim, ravish, or rob such person, or in the attempt to commit any burglary or other felony, or in resisting the execution of legal process, shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary not exceeding ten years." It is apparent from the instructions given by the court that this cause was submitted to the jury upon two theories: First, that the defendant shot at and assaulted the prosecuting witness, Ernest Morgan, with intent to kill him; second, that he shot at and assaulted one Frank Reed with the intent to kill him, and in making such assault upon Frank Reed shot and wounded the prosecuting witness, Ernest Morgan. The first theory is indicated by instruction No. 1, which in plain and unambiguous terms required the jury to find that the defendant wilfully, on purpose, and with malice aforethought did shoot at and wound Ernest Morgan with the intent to kill him. The second theory is clearly manifested by instructions Nos. 3 and 4, in which the court declared the law as follows: "Third, if, from the evidence and under these instructions, you find and believe that the defendant, Zach Mulhall, on purpose and of his malice aforethought and with the intent to kill, and under the circumstances set out in instruction No. 1 above, shot and wounded Ernest Morgan, then it is no defense that his intent to kill may, as a matter of fact, have been against one Frank Reed, and that his desire was to assault Frank Reed rather than Ernest Morgan; for if a man with intent to kill one person wilfully, unlawfully, and on purpose, and of his malice aforethought shoots to accomplish such intent, but, as a matter of fact, the bullet flies towards and strikes and wounds another whom he did not intend to injure, he is guilty of the same offense as though the bullet had struck and wounded the one whom he intended to kill. Fourth, unless from the evidence and under these instructions you believe and find that defendant, Zach Mulhall, on or about the 18th day of June, 1904, or at any time within three years next before the filing of the information herein, at the city of St. Louis and the state of Missouri, did wilfully, on purpose, and of his malice aforethought, shoot and wound Ernest Morgan with a pistol loaded as aforesaid, and with the intent to kill him, or did at said time and place wilfully, on purpose, and of his malice aforethought, and with the intent to kill Frank Reed, shoot to accomplish such intent, and that the ball struck and wounded Ernest Morgan, then you will acquit the defendant." This last theory is further indicated by instruction No. 5, which was one upon the right of self-defense, in shooting at and assaulting Frank Reed. In other words, that instruction, practically construed, means this,—that, if the jury believe and find from the evidence that the shooting was at Frank Reed with intent to kill, but that the prosecuting witness, Ernest Morgan, was wounded, although he was not in fact shot at, unless the jury reached the conclusion that the defendant Mulhall was justified in shooting at Reed, they could not acquit the defendant on the charge contained in the information, for shooting at Ernest Morgan.

It is made manifest from the declarations of law in this case, that the trial court took the position that it made no difference, so far as the commission of the offense defined by § 1847 is concerned, whether the defendant shot at the prosecuting witness and wounded him, with intent to kill him, or whether he shot at Frank Reed without justification, with intent to kill him, and in the commission of such wrongful act the prosecuting witness was wounded; under either state of facts the defendant would be equally guilty of the offense defined by the statute. We are unable to give our assent to that position. It will be observed that this charge is predicated upon that subdivision of the statute which provides that "every person who shall, on purpose, and of his malice aforethought, shoot at . . . another with intent to kill." In other words, the information charges that the defendant, Zach Mulhall, shot at Ernest Morgan, with a pistol, with the intent to kill him. It is clear that, under that provision of the statute, there are two essential elements necessary to constitute such offense: First, that the defendant shot at Ernest Morgan, and second, that he did so with intent to kill him; and before a conviction can be had upon this charge, it is incumbent upon the state to establish by the proof both elements of such offense. It is not enough that the defendant shot at Ernest Morgan, but as well that at the time of such shooting he intended to kill him. The fact that Ernest Morgan was seriously wounded, and such wound may have been occasioned by a shot from the pistol of the defendant, is not enough, for the fact that he was so wounded must not be confounded with the essential elements to constitute the offense with which he is charged. While the wound may be shown in evidence, and its character, for the purpose of establishing the essential elements of the crime,—that is, that he shot at him with intent to kill,—yet such wounding does not constitute any part of the offense. The charge of the offense is complete when it is alleged that the defendant shot at Ernest Morgan with a pistol with intent to kill him. As was said by Sherwood, J., in State v. Agee, 68 Mo. 264, "it is as much an offense under that section to shoot at a man and miss him, as to shoot at him and hit him." While, as before stated, the wounding of Ernest Morgan was competent evidence for the jury to consider in determining the intent of the defendant, yet such wounding does not constitute any essential element of the offense; and, unless such wounding was the result of the commission of the acts necessary to constitute such offense as defined by the statute,—that is, that he shot at Ernest Morgan with the intent to kill him,—then there can be no conviction for an assault with intent to kill.

The supreme court of California, in the case of People v. Keefer, 18 Cal. 636, clearly announced the principle applicable to the case at bar. In that case the defendant was indicted for an assault with intent to murder one John R. Evans, and convicted of the crime of an assault with a deadly weapon, with intent to do great bodily harm. The trial court instructed the jury that, if a loaded gun was presented within shooting range, at Wilson or Evans, or at the dog, under circumstances not justified by the law, and under circumstances showing an abandoned and malignant heart, and that the gun was fired off, and inflicted a dangerous wound upon the witness Evans, then the crime of an assault with a deadly weapon, with intent to inflict a bodily injury upon the witness Evans, has been proved; and it would only remain for them to inquire whether or not the defendant was guilty of the crime. The pertinency of this charge, as we gather from the case, was shown by proofs which conduced to prove that Keefer fired a gun in the direction of Wilson and Evans and of a dog near them, there being some dispute as to whether with the intent to kill or wound the dog, or these men, or one of them. Baldwin, J., who delivered the opinion of the court in that case, in discussing the correctness of the instructions of the trial court, said: "It is true that a person may be convicted of murder or of an assault, though no specific intent may have existed to commit the crime of murder or assault upon the person charged. The familiar illustration is that of a man shooting at one person and killing another. In these cases, the general malice and the unlawful act are enough to constitute the offense. No doubt exists that a man may be guilty of manslaughter under some circumstances, by his mere carelessness. But this rule has no application to a statutory offense like that of which the defendant was convicted. This is an assault with a deadly weapon, with intent to do great bodily harm to another person. The offense is not constituted in any part by the battery or wounding, but is complete by the assault, the weapon, and the intent, as, if A snaps a loaded pistol at B within striking distance, the offense would be no more under this clause of the statute if the shot took effect. It could scarcely be contended, if a man shot at another's dog or chicken, when such shooting would be a trespass and wholly illegal, that the trespasser was guilty of this crime of assault upon a man with intent, etc., merely from the fact that the owner of the animal was near by and within range of the shot, or the shot went through his hat or clothes; and yet the reason of holding thus in that case is as great as in this. So, if a man carelessly handling bricks on the roof of a house should throw them into the street below, though he might be liable, civilly and criminally, for injury done to persons thereby, he could not be guilty of the statutory offense of assault with intent to kill. The words of the statute, 'with intent to do great bodily harm to a person' (Wood's Dig. 335), are not merely formal, but they are substantial,—they constitute the very gravamen of the offense; and the statute, like all other penal laws, must be strictly construed. It is nothing, in this view, that the defendant is guilty of some crime; he must be guilty of the very crime charged, which cannot be unless the elements of the crime, as defined by the legislature, appear. This is the universal rule applicable to criminal proceedings; and it is as plainly supported by common sense as by technical law. We cannot make the proposition plainer by illustration." So it may be said as to the case at bar. If the defendant shot at Ernest Morgan with a pistol, with the intent to kill him, and missed him, the offense would be just as complete as if such shot had taken effect; and, on the other hand, if he did not shoot at him, and did not intend to kill him, although he may have wounded him in the commission of some other unlawful act, there being an entire absence of the necessary elements of the offense as defined by the statute,—that is, that he shot at him with a pistol with intent to kill him,—there could be no conviction of that statutory offense.

The fundamental error assumed by the contention on the part of the state in this prosecution is the confounding of the purely statutory offense of an assault with intent to kill, which is defined by the statute to be the commission of certain acts with a specific intent, with that line of cases where the party shoots at one man and kills another. There is no dispute as to the law applicable to cases where the party is killed. In those cases the common-law rules are strictly applied, and the text writers and the rules announced by this court, as well as the courts in all other states where the question has been brought before them, are uniform in announcing the principle that, "where the party shoots at one man, and kills another, malice will be implied as to the latter, and the felonious intent is transferred on the same ground as where poison is laid to destroy one person, and taken by another;" and with the rules announced in the leading cases in this state upon that subject (State v. Payton, 90 Mo. 220, 2 S. W. 394; State v. Gilmore, 95 Mo. 554, 8 S. W. 359, 912; State v. Pollard, 139 Mo. 220, 40 S. W. 949, and State v. Clark, 147 Mo. 20, 47 S. W. 886) we are entirely satisfied. But, on the other hand, that there is a clear distinction between those cases where the common-law rules are most strictly applied and the clearly defined statutory offense of an assault with intent to kill by shooting at another with a pistol with intent to kill, we have no doubt; and the appellate courts of the various states that have had this question before them and the question sharply presented and carefully considered by such courts have in no uncertain terms recognized such distinction. As was said by the California court in the Keefe Case, "if a man carelessly handling bricks on the roof of a house should throw them into the street below, though he might be liable, civilly and criminally, for injury done to persons thereby, he could not be guilty of the statutory offense of assault with intent to kill." No one, however, would contend for a moment that if the bricks thrown from the house into the street should have killed an individual that the party could not have been charged with some grade of crime for causing the death of the individual. The offense with which the defendant in this case is charged is clearly defined by the statute, consisting of shooting at another with intent to kill him; and he cannot be guilty of such offense unless the elements of the crime defined by the lawmaking power appear.

The high court of errors and appeals of the state of Mississippi had in judgment before it the case of Morgan v. State, 13 Smedes & M. 242, which is so strikingly similar to the case at bar, upon a statute substantially the same as the statute upon which the prosecution in this case is based, that we cannot better discuss this proposition than by reproducing at length the rules so clearly announced in that case. The provisions of the Mississippi statute upon which the charge against the defendant in that case was predicated, were that "every person who shall be convicted of shooting at another, with the intent to kill, maim, etc., such other person, shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term not exceeding ten years." Mr. Justice Smith thus stated the case in discussing the legal propositions involved: "Upon the trial of the issue, the prisoner, by his counsel, requested the court to charge the jury 'that, under this indictment, it is necessary for the prosecution to prove that said defendant shot at Foster (the person on whom the assault was alleged to have been committed) with the intent to kill said Foster, before the defendant can be legally convicted.' This instruction was refused; whereupon the counsel for the state requested the court to charge the jury as follows: (1) 'That, if the jury believe, from the evidence, that the prisoner shot into the crowd with the intention of killing anyone in the crowd, but not with the intention of killing Foster; and that the shooting was not, at the time, in the necessary self-defense of the prisoner, they should find him guilty.' (2) 'That, if the jury believe that Morgan shot at Loftin with a premeditated design to kill him, Loftin; and that said shooting was not in the necessary self-defense, although he missed Loftin and shot Foster, they should find him guilty, though he entertained no malice towards Foster.' The correctness of these instructions presents the first question for the consideration of this court; and it is obvious that, if the former be correct, the latter must be erroneous.

"It is a universal principle of evidence that a man shall be understood to intend that which he does, or which is the natural and necessary consequence of his act. Hence, in the absence of any explanatory testimony, we should be bound to presume that the prisoner intended to perpetrate the assault charged, upon the person of Foster; and to hold the offense as charged clearly made out. But the instructions asked for, as well by the state as by the prisoner, clearly show that evidence had been adduced on the trial, which tended to establish the fact that Loftin, and not Foster, was the object of the assault. The instructions, then, did not propound abstract propositions, which could in no wise affect the verdict of the jury. It is a well-understood rule of law, where a general felonious intention is sufficient to constitute the offense, that it is no ground of excuse, where a party who intended to commit one felony has committed another. 2 Starkie, Ev. 5th Am. ed. p. 416; East, P. C. 514. In the case at bar the malicious intent might be clearly inferred from the character of the weapon used; and, if the alleged attempt had been consummated in the death of Foster, the prisoner would have been guilty of murder, although he entertained no malice as to him. This principle, however, is applicable only to cases where one felony is contemplated, and another committed. But the offense of which the prisoner stands convicted is, we apprehend, no felony by the laws of this state. If, however, the offense here charged be in fact a felony, nevertheless, this rule does not apply; for an essential ingredient of the offense created by the section of the statute above quoted, and charged in the indictment, is the specific intention of killing the person shot at. In the case of Jones v. State, 11 Smedes & M. 315, this court expressly recognized this construction of the act. They say this statute 'specifies the intent to kill the person shot at, as one of the intents made essential to constitute the offense.' The same construction has been given by the English courts to the statute of 9 Geo. IV. chap. 31, §§ 11 and 12, which is similar to our own (Rex v. Holt, 7 Car. & P. 518); and we hold it to be correct. If, then, the specific intention of killing the particular person alleged to have been shot at be 'an essential ingredient of the offense charged in the indictment,' proof of a general felonious or malicious intention was not sufficient. It was incumbent on the state to prove the specific intent as charged. 2 Starkie, Ev. 5th Am. ed. p. 416, note s; 7 Car. & P. 518. The charge requested by the prisoner's counsel was correct, and the court erred in refusing it."

The court of appeals of Kentucky, in the case of Com. v. Morgan, 11 Bush, 601, ruled that, under a statute which provided that "if any person shall wilfully and maliciously shoot at and wound another with an intention to kill him," in order to warrant a conviction for such offense it was essential to prove all of the elements constituting the offense. In that case the defendant shot and wounded one W. T. Buntin. The indictment and proof showed that he shot at one Asa Oliver, and not at the prosecuting witness. The representative of the state, upon the facts developed upon the trial, requested the following instruction: "If the jury believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that in Anderson county, and before the finding of this indictment, the accused, North Morgan, wilfully and with malice aforethought shot at Asa Oliver with the intent to kill him, and, missing his aim, wounded W. T. Buntin, then he is guilty of malicious wounding; and so they must find, and fix his punishment at confinement in the penitentiary for not less than one, nor more than five years;" which was refused by the court. In discussing the action of the court in refusing this instruction, Judge Lindsay, speaking for the court, said: "The statute provides that, 'if any person shall wilfully and maliciously shoot at and wound another with an intention to kill him, so that he does not die thereby, with a gun or other instrument loaded with a leaden bullet, or other hard substance, . . . he shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than one nor more than five years.' The language of the statute does not embrace the offense for which the appellee was put upon his trial. To constitute the statutory crime it is necessary that the party accused 'shall wilfully and maliciously shoot at and wound another, with an intention to kill him.' Here he did not wound the person at whom he shot, on the one hand; nor did he shoot at the person whom he did wound, on the other. The two facts essentially necessary to constitute the felony do not conjoin, and hence the instruction asked for was properly refused."

In Jones v. State, supra, which was referred to and approved in the case cited, of Morgan v. State, the objection was urged that the intent was not sufficiently averred in this, that the act was not alleged to have been done with the intention of killing some particular person. The statute in judgment in that case was substantially the same as the statute upon which the case at bar is predicated. The court, in discussing that case, said: "The objection is that the intent is not sufficiently averred in this,—that the act is not alleged to have been done with the intention of killing the said Mixon or any other person. The statute (Howard & H. 698, § 33), quoted above, specifies the intent to kill the person shot at, as one of the intents made essential to constitute the offense. Such being, probably, the main intent in this case, the indictment should have charged that intent. Rex v. Gillow, 1 Moody, C. C. 85; Rex v. Duffin, Russ. & R. C. C. 365. The indictment is uncertain. There is no allegation of an intent to kill any particular person. In Rex v. Holt, supra, the indictment framed under the statute 9 Geo. IV. chap. 31, §§ 11, 12, was for shooting 'at one John Hill, with intent to murder the said John Hill.' The jury found the prisoner guilty of shooting at Mr. Hill, with intent to do Mr. Lee some grievous bodily harm. The court ordered a verdict of not guilty to be recorded. To come, therefore, within this statute, we think the accused must be charged with having shot at a certain person, with intent to kill that person." In the case of Morman v. State, 24 Miss. loc. cit. 57, the rules as announced in the foregoing cases of Morgan v. State and Jones v. State, supra, were followed and approved. To the same effect is Barcus v. State, 49 Miss. 17, 19 Am. Rep. 1. In People v. Robinson, 6 Utah, 101, 21 Pac. 403, it was expressly ruled that, "where the indictment charged that defendant assaulted H with a pistol, and shot at H with intent to kill him, and the evidence showed that defendant shot at J intending to kill J, but accidentally hit H because he missed J, a conviction for assault with intent to kill cannot be sustained." In the supreme court of Arkansas in Lacefield v. State, 34 Ark. 275, 36 Am. Rep. 8, the rules announced in the foregoing cases were followed, and it was held by that the court, "when one, intending to kill A, shoots and wounds B, or if it be doubtful which he shoots at, he cannot be convicted of an assault with intent to kill B." The rules of law so clearly announced in the foregoing cases cited, in our opinion, correctly announce the law as applicable to an offense of an assault with intent to kill. The principles announced in those cases are predicated upon statutes substantially the same as the one upon which the offense at bar is predicated. However, upon this proposition we are confronted with two cases in this state directly in conflict with the conclusions herein reached. State v. Jump, 90 Mo. 171, 2 S. W. 279, and State v. Montgomery, 91 Mo. 52, 3 S. W. 379. Doubtless the learned trial judge, recognizing the rule that the decisions of this court furnish a rule to govern as well as to guide, followed those cases and submitted this cause to the jury upon the theories as indicated by the instructions.

It is apparent from an examination of those two cases that the proposition confronting the court was not discussed. In neither of them were any briefs filed by the appellant, and a careful analysis of those cases makes it manifest that the distinction between murder cases and cases of assault with intent to kill, defined by the statute, was not sharply presented to the court for their consideration. This is made apparent by the citation of authorities in support of the rules announced. In support of the Montgomery Case, the case of State v. Henson, 81 Mo. 384, and State v. Payton, 90 Mo. 220, 2 S. W. 394, are cited as expressly approving the principles announced. In State v. Jump no authorities are cited, and the learned and esteemed judge simply says that, if some point is overlooked, the defendant has no right to complain, for the reason that no suggestions by brief or otherwise are made as to the questions involved. The cases of State v. Henson and State v. Payton, supra, cited in support of the conclusions reached in the Montgomery Case, were murder cases, and therefore, in accordance with the conclusions as herein reached, are not applicable to the offense charged in the case at bar.

We have endeavored to point out the distinction that should be observed in the application of the rules of law between cases of murder or manslaughter and the offense of an assault with intent to kill as defined by the statute. The cases cited as supporting the conclusions we have reached in this cause had in judgment the identical question, under substantially the same statutory provisions as are involved in the case at bar; and the rules announced in those cases upon which we predicate our conclusions are fully supported by both reason and authority. The learned judges who wrote the opinions in the Montgomery and Jump Cases, heretofore referred to (there being no presentation by brief or otherwise of the propositions involved), doubtless concluded that the same rules of law were applicable to those cases as had previously been applied to cases of murder or manslaughter; and we are convinced that, had the question been sharply and fully presented to the court in those cases, the same conclusions would have been reached as is herein indicated in the case at bar.

After diligent search we are unable to find any authority in support of the rules announced as applicable to the Jump and Montgomery Cases by this court, except the principle announced applying to murder cases; and we have heretofore pointed out the distinction between those two classes of cases. With the greatest deference and respect for the opinions of the learned judges who announced the conclusions in the Jump and Montgomery Cases by this court, we are unable to concur with their views, and, after a full discussion and consideration of the proposition confronting us, and a careful examination of the authorities upon the subject, we are convinced that the conclusions reached in those cases are unsound and not supported by well-considered authority; therefore they should no longer be followed as announcing the correct rule applicable to the question in the case at bar.

The conclusions reached upon this proposition by no means relieve the defendant of punishment, if he is guilty of the commission of a wrongful act. The statutes of this state cover every phase of this case. First, if the defendant shot at Frank Reed without being justified, with a pistol, with the intent to kill him, the state may proceed against the defendant, upon that charge; second, if the defendant, without being justified, made an assault with a pistol upon Frank Reed, and in the commission of such unlawful act maimed, wounded, or disfigured Ernest Morgan, and such wound was inflicted under circumstances which would have constituted murder or manslaughter if Ernest Morgan had died, the defendant may then be prosecuted under the provisions of § 1849, Rev. Stat. 1899; and third, if the testimony on the part of the state is sufficient to show that the defendant shot at Ernest Morgan with intent to kill him, as charged in the information in this prosecution, the defendant may be prosecuted and convicted of that offense. However, if it is sought to convict the defendant under this information for shooting at Ernest Morgan with the intent to kill him, as indicated from the conclusions reached in this cause, the court should avoid submitting the cause to the jury upon the erroneous theory that if he assaulted Frank Reed with intent to kill him, and, in the commission of such offense, he wounded Ernest Morgan, he might be convicted of an assault with intent to kill Ernest Morgan. The statute defining the offense of an assault with intent to kill by shooting at another with intent to kill should be held to mean what it says; and, to constitute such offense and authorize a conviction of the defendant for shooting at Ernest Morgan with intent to kill him, it is essential that both elements of that offense be established by the testimony in the cause: First, that he shot at Ernest Morgan; secondly, that he did so with the intent to kill him. This is the only practical and common-sense interpretation of the statute 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

which defines the offense with which the defendant is charged. We have thus indicated our views upon the most vital propositions involved in this prosecution. It was error on the part of the court to submit this cause to the jury as indicated by the instructions heretofore pointed out, upon the theory that the defendant shot at Frank Reed with intent to kill him and in the commission of that act wounded Ernest Morgan, and instructing the jury that upon that state of facts they would be warranted in convicting the defendant of an assault with intent to kill Ernest Morgan, as charged in the information.

For this error the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded for the purpose of giving the state an opportunity of proceeding against the defendant in accordance with the views herein expressed, and it is so ordered.

All concur.

(Division No. 1.)

KANSAS CITY, Respt.,
v.
LOUIS K. HYDE, Appt.

RE TWENTY-FIRST STREET.

(196 Mo. 498, 96 S. W. 201.)

Highway — opening — public benefit — evidence.

1. In a proceeding to open a street, which, as proposed, would result in a mere cul-de-sac, and therefore be of no benefit to the public, evidence is admissible of a proposal to extend another street at right angles to its termination, and thereby secure the necessary thoroughfare and public benefit.

Ordinance—illegality—evidence.

2. A property owner may, upon an attempt by a municipal corporation to apply a street-opening ordinance to the injury of his Case Note.—Fraud in proceedings for opening or extending highway as defense to proceedings to acquire property for that purpose: — As a general proposition, the courts will not question the motive which prompts the institution of proceedings to open or extend a highway; but, when fraud or illegality taints the proceedings, then the courts will not hesitate to interfere in behalf of one whose property is to be taken against his will. In addition to the authorities set out in the above opinion, the only case in point which a search has disclosed is Parham v. Inferior Ct. Justices, 9 Ga. 341, in which the court enjoined proceedings to open a new public road which would pass through uninclosed lands of the complainant, who alleged that the petition pre-property rights, show, if possible, that its passage was obtained by fraud or other unlawful means, or for an unlawful purpose. Eminent domain—purpose of exercise—evidence.

3. One whose property is sought by right of eminent domain to widen a street may introduce evidence to prove that the purpose of the widening is to accommodate a railway connection with private property. Highway—switch tracks.

4. A street cannot be created under the power of eminent domain, to be devoted to the purpose of railway switch tracks for the benefit of business concerns in the vicinity.

Ordinance—invalidity—adjudication.

5. The court will adjudge void municipal ordinances passed for the purpose of opening and widening streets for the extension of railway switches for the accommodation of private business enterprises.

Eminent domain—evidence.

6. That a jury in an eminent domain proceeding is impaneled merely to try the question of damages does not preclude the admission of evidence, for the consideration of the court, that the proceeding is instituted for private, and not for public benefit.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jackson County fixing the compensation in a proceeding to condemn land for the opening of a street. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Lathrop, Morrow, Fox, & Moore, for appellant:

The ordinance is unreasonable, and operates to deprive the appellant of his property without just compensation.

Messrs. Edwin C. Meservey and John H. Thacher, for respondent:

The city ordinance, showing on its face that the lands taken herein are for public use, is conclusive against the appellant's contention that this is a proceeding to take private property for private use.

This city ordinance is presumptively valid.

Kansas City v. Morton, 117 Mo. 454, 23 S. W. 127.

Valliant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Re Twenty-First street. This is a proceeding under an ordinance of the city to extend Twenty-first street into certain property of the defendant, Hyde, and for that purpose to assess his damages for the property to be taken or damaged, and to sented for the opening of the road was signed by many persons who did not live in the neighborhood; that the same was gotten up not for public convenience, but by persons interested in having a road to a certain landing on a river; that the court evidenced its partiality in the appointment of reviewers and commissioners to open the road; and that the same were not proper and discreet persons,—one of them wished the road to pass his house, where he kept liquors for sale, another had but lately moved into the county, and the third had acted as principal agent in procuring signatures to the petition. The complainant further objected to the appointment of anyone because this road would not be the nearest 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

and most practicable route between the points specified as the termini of the road, because it would cause irreparable injury to his land and crops, and because he offered to the court, at his own expense, to cut out and open a shorter and better road between the points designated.

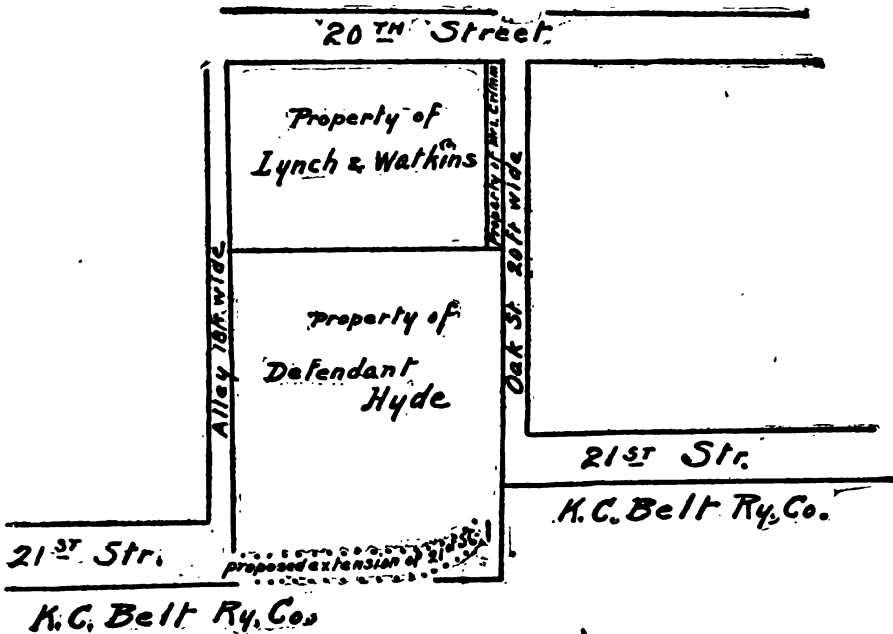

But in a somewhat similar case, in Morse v. Westport, 136 Mo. 276, 37 S. W. 932, the court did not consider the enactment, about the same time, of many ordinances for street improvement, in view of an impending change of the city charter, to be such proof of fraud in the municipal action as to warrant the court, in a suit by a property owner, in restraining the city from letting contracts for the improvements.

assess the benefits over a district prescribed by the ordinance, in which district is included remaining property of defendant. The jury assessed the defendant's damages at $5,000 and his benefits at $2,577.10, and from the judgment of condemnation that followed on those assessments the defendant has appealed.

Defendant Hyde owns a tract of land nearly square in shape, containing about 60,000 square feet, bounded on the east by Oak street 20 feet wide, west by an alley 18 feet wide, and on the south by the right of way of the Kansas City belt Railway. Twenty-first street, 60 feet wide, coming from the west, terminates on the west line of defendant's property; its south line being nearly coincident with the south line of defendant's property. The following diagram gives a general idea of the location:

the two disconnected ends of Twenty-first street, nor to carry the street entirely through defendant's property, but to terminate it in defendant's property at a point 10 feet west of his east line; nor does the ordinance aim to carry the street to its full width even as far as it purposes to go, but to the width only of 30 feet. Another feature of the route marked out by the ordinance is that, after going 68 feet along the south line of defendant's land, it changes course to the northeast to the terminus named, and that, too, at an angle which, even if the course were extended to defendant's east line, would not connect it with that end of Twenty-first street.

Appellant contends that it appears on the face of the ordinance, when applied to the physical facts above stated, that the public has no interest in this proceeding; that the extension of Twenty-first street as proposed

Twenty-first street, as will appear from the diagram, does not extend across defendant's property, but it ends on the west against defendant's west line, and begins again going east at defendant's east line, and not then on a line with its own west end but considerably north of it. The ordinance in question does not aim to unite would simply create a cul-de-sac in defendant's property, which would be of use to no one; and that we think is correct. But to meet that objection the city undertook to prove that there was another fact to be considered which would show that this extension was for a public use and would serve the public, namely, that there was pending at the same time and in the same court another proceeding the purpose of which was to widen Oak street and bring it down to connect with this extension of Twenty-first street and to the right of way of the Kansas City Belt Railway Company. But, on the objection of defendant, the testimony offered by the city on that point was excluded. The idea advanced was that this case would have to stand or fall by its own strength, and could not be helped out by another proceeding, the result of which was only problematical. We have now under consideration the appeal of this same defendant in the Oak Street Case (196 Mo. 515, 96 S. W. 206), both cases having been submitted for our judgment at the same time, and in that case, to meet the objection of the defendant that the widening and extending of Oak street would only carry it to an unprofitable end, the city offered to prove that it was, at the same time, moving to extend Twenty-first street so as to connect it with the widened and extended Oak street; but, on like objection by the defendant, that evidence was excluded. In spite of the ruling of the court, however, the evidence in its full force got to the jury, and must have had its effect, because the jury could not, with reason, have assessed any benefits in this case if there was no purpose shown to connect the two streets. The court erred in excluding that evidence. Assuming that it was to the public interest that these two streets should be connected in the manner that they would be if both of those ordinances were carried into effect, and that the common council so determined, yet, since proceedings to widen or extend both streets cannot be embraced in one suit, it would be impossible to carry the scheme into effect if each proceeding had to rest alone on its own facts without taking into account the purpose of the other. If each proceeding depends for its success on a condition that does not already exist, but that can be brought about only by a successful prosecution of the other; and if neither can proceed until the other is finished,—then the one defeats the other and both must fail. That cannot be the law. The danger suggested in the possible failure of the other proceeding can be avoided without any difficulty by the court in its control of its judgment; it, can withhold its final judgment, or its ruling on a motion for a new trial, or otherwise suspend final action, until judgments are reached in both cases. Nothing that it is necessary for the court to know in order to reach a correct conclusion in a given case can be said to be irrelevant or immaterial.

If the opening or extending of a particular proposed street is but a part of a general scheme, the court should know what the scheme is in order to appreciate the value of the particular street in question. That scheme may be shown by contemporaneous ordinances if it has been put into that record form, or it may be shown by the best evidence of which the fact is susceptible, if it has not been made a matter of record. While the passing of an ordinance to establish, widen, or extend a street is the exercise by the city of a delegated governmental power, legislative in its character, and, therefore, not subject to judicial direction (Albright v. Fisher, 164 Mo. 56, 64 S. W. 106; State ex rel. Abel v. Gates, 190 Mo. 540, 89 S. W. 881), yet, after the ordinance has become an accomplished fact, if attempt is made to apply it to the injury of the property rights of a citizen, he may, if he can, show that its passage was obtained by fraud or other unlawful means, or for an unlawful purpose. In Glasgow v. St. Louis, 107 Mo. 198, 17 S. W. 743, this court, per Black, J., said: "The rule of law is well established that the courts will not inquire into the motives of the legislature in enacting a law, even where fraud and corruption is alleged. Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th. ed. 225. But the rule is somewhat relaxed as to municipal bodies. Speaking of such bodies, it is said: 'We suppose it to be a sound proposition that their acts, whether in the form of resolutions or ordinances, may be impeached for fraud at the instance of persons injured thereby.' 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 311." That doctrine has been iterated by this court in other cases. Knapp S. & Co. v. St. Louis, 156 Mo. 343, 56 S. W. 1102; State ex rel. Abel v. Gates, supra.

At the trial of this case the defendant offered to prove that one of the men who owned the property adjoining his on the north was, at the time of the passage of these ordinances, the speaker of the lower house of the common council, to whose property a switch could not be run from the Kansas City Belt Railway unless the streets were extended and widened as in these ordinances was proposed; that he, through his partner, had approached defendant with a proposition that if he, defendant, would sell him a right of way to the belt railway, the ordinances would not be passed, but defendant declined and the ordinances were passed; that the purpose of the ordinances was not to widen or extend the streets for use as public highways, but solely for the purpose of affording the speaker of the lower house and his business partner access, by means of a switch track, to the belt railway, and that, when widened and extended, as proposed in these ordinances, and turned over to the railway to be covered with switch tracks the public would be practically excluded from the use of those streets. The court, on objection of the plaintiff, rejected the evidence, and exception was saved. The rejection of that evidence raises the serious question in this case. If it is a fact that the purpose of the council in passing the ordinances was that these streets, when widened and extended as proposed, were to be given over to railway switch tracks, then the common council was proceeding to condemn private property for a purpose for which it had no right to condemn. When we say that the validity of a city ordinance may be attacked on the ground of fraud in its procurement, we do not necessarily mean that actual bribery or corruption must be shown, but it is sufficient if the fraud charged is of that character that has been defined to be the wilful doing of an unlawful act. The common council has authority to establish, extend, and widen streets for the purpose of public highways, and, when established, extended, or widened, it has authority, within certain bounds, to allow railway tracks to be laid in the streets and trains to pass over them. But those streets are established for public use, and the cost of establishing them is charged as a special tax on the benefit district affected. The common council has no authority to establish a street, or a system of streets, at the expense of the property owners in the district for the use of a private individual or number of individuals. And if the council should undertake to use the power that has been intrusted to it for the public benefit to serve private interests, it is an abuse of the power, a violation of the trust, a wilful doing of an unlawful act, a legal fraud. It has been decided by this court that an ordinance of the city of St. Louis, essaying to grant a railroad company the right to lay its tracks in a street that was so narrow that when the tracks were laid and trains operated on them, the street was practically unsafe for a public highway, was illegal and of no effect. Lockwood v. Wabash R. Co. 122 Mo. 86, 24 L.R.A. 516, 43 Am. St. Rep. 547, 26 S. W. 698. As was held in the case of Glasgow v. St. Louis, above mentioned, the city has the power to vacate a street when it deems it no longer of public use, and, in the absence of fraud, it is no ground for holding the vacating ordinance illegal because the effect is to give the use of the ground to an adjoining manufacturing concern, or even if it was done for that purpose. The controlling idea in that case is that if, without fraud, the city authorities are well satisfied that the street is of no use to the public, and could be advantageously used by the adjoining manufacturing concern, the ordinance vacating it is not illegal.

But in the case at bar the common council come saying: "We need this ground for a public highway; we are going to condemn it for the use of the public, and we are going to make those who own property lying within a certain district pay for it. We are going to make this defendant, whose property to the value of $5,000 we will take, pay, as for the benefit it will do him, more than half the sum we give him." Surely, if for nothing more than showing the questionable extent of his benefits, the defendant ought to be allowed to show the purpose to which the proposed streets are to be put, if that purpose is already a part of the general scheme. If, along with these two ordinances, the common council had passed an ordinance authorizing the belt railway company to so occupy the proposed streets, when completed, with switch tracks, as to give certain individuals switch connection for their property with the belt railway, that would be a fact that would necessarily influence the jury in the assessment of the benefits which the defendant would be required to pay, and it might be an important fact for the court to know, when the time should come to pass on the question of the validity of the ordinance; and if such was the purpose the common council would have been more candid to have so avowed it; but if such was in fact the purpose, though not so avowed, it is just as important for the court to know it, and the defendant has the right to prove it. What is called Oak street is now only 20 feet wide. It terminates in that part of Twenty-first street that lies east of the defendant's property, it stands at such an angle to the belt railway as seems to make it impracticable to run a switch track into it. The property of the firm, in whose interest alone, as the defendant contends, this proceeding is being prosecuted, lies adjoining, on the north, defendant's property, and is separated from Oak street by a strip 10 feet wide belonging to Mrs. Crimm. The scheme as shown by the ordinance in the Oak street property is to take Mrs. Crimm's 10-foot strip and a strip of like width off the east side of defendant's property, thus making Oak street 30 feet wide and giving the firm mentioned a front for the full length of its property on that street; then the sharp angle, that would otherwise hinder the laying of a track from the belt line into Oak street, is reduced by the turn of the course of the proposed extension of Twenty-first street to the northeast. If the purpose is, as defendant offered to prove that it was, to shape these streets for the convenient introduction of the switch track mentioned, the plan proposed would facilitate that purpose. Then if we contemplate what Oak street would be, 30 feet in width and a railroad track through it, the question would arise as to whether that street was any longer susceptible of being used as a public highway. In the case of Lockwood v. Wabash R. Co. above mentioned, the street was 40 feet wide, from building line to building line, and 24 feet from curb to curb, and this court held that the railroad tracks amounted to a practical exclusion of the public from the street, and that the ordinance was therefore void.

If there was now no scheme to turn these streets over to the use of the belt railway company, if they were now already extended, widened, and established as proposed, and if the common council was now proposing to grant the belt railway company the right to lay its tracks through Oak street, if we should adhere to what we said in the Lockwood Case, we would have to hold that the city council could not so drive the public off that highway. And it does not alter the case that there are other lots along the line that might be rendered more available for business purposes if they were afforded connection by switch tracks with the belt road. The common council can no more create a street for the especial benefit of a given number of people than it can for that of one individual. If it is to be a street, it must be a highway for the public, and no use of it can be granted inconsistent with the use of the general public. And, while it is competent, as we have seen in the Glasgow Case, above mentioned, to vacate a street which is no longer of any use to the public, yet it is not competent to create a street in the name of the public for the purpose of vacating it in the interest of whom it may concern. In Ligare v. Chicago, 139 Ill. 46, 32 Am. St. Rep. 179, 28 N. E. 934, the city council had passed two ordinances, one to widen Archer avenue, the other granting a railroad company the right to lay its tracks in the street when it should be so widened. The court said: "It is, to our minds, clear that both ordinances before us in this case are but parts of a single and entire scheme. They were adopted on the same day, and the latter expressly refers to, and is by its terms dependent upon, the adoption and enforcement of the former; and it requires that the entire cost and expense of enforcing both ordinances, and all damages which may be adjudged against the city by reason of their being adopted and enforced, shall be paid by the railroad companies." In that case the city council was entirely candid in the expression of its purpose, and was careful not to impose the burden of cost, expense, and damage on the persons whose property was to be taken, or on those owning other property in the vicinity. The court went on to say: "Moreover, the attempt to widen Archer avenue for the limited distance and in the peculiar manner described in the first ordinance is manifestly to meet a local want in that respect, and the second ordinance conclusively shows that that local want is space for laying down additional railroad tracks, and nothing else." Then after showing how completely the street, when widened, would be occupied by railroad tracks, the court, continuing, said: "Hemmed in by the wall on one side and by the buildings or inclosures on private property on the other, no rational being would, at the risk of the inevitable dangers from passing engines and cars, use this part of the street as a common highway, unless under stress of most extraordinary circumstances. It is not material that the public are not, by the words of the ordinance, forbidden the use of this part of the street,—the effect of the grant is inevitably an exclusion of all but these railroads from its use, and the law deals with results, and not with mere forms, in such matters. . . . It is so familiar that we need not stop to demonstrate it, that cities, villages, and towns are only empowered to lay out, open, and improve streets for such public use as that persons and property within the municipality may be legitimately assessed or taxed for payment thereof, and that persons and property within a municipality cannot be legitimately assessed or taxed for the right of way or the making or improving of a road for a railroad company alone. . . . We do not deny that the city has power to widen streets, generally, and that, when it has undertaken to do so, the motives that may have actuated those in authority are not the subject of judicial investigation; but the purpose for which a thing is done is very different from the motives which may have actuated those by whom it is done, and is, in the present instance, a legitimate subject of judicial investigation, for the right to exercise the power of eminent domain is, in all cases, limited by the purpose for which it shall be exercised,—as thus, private property may be condemned for public use; but it may be shown that the use, in fact, is not public, but private. . . . A railroad company, under authority to condemn property for its right of way, cannot condemn property for a street of a city, and . . . a city cannot, under authority to condemn property for streets, condemn property for a railroad track, for the principle must be the same."

The facts of the case at bar illustrate forcibly the necessity for the admission of evidence of kind offered by the defendant. To the city council the state has delegated the power to condemn land for a public use, it has no power to condemn for a private use. "Public" in that connection means everybody. If the use is not for everybody, it is a private use. If to an individual, or to any number of individuals, is given the right to use the property in such manner as will practically exclude the general public, it is a giving of the property to private use, and a destruction of its public-service character. Now, suppose an influential individual, to whom a slice of his neighbor's property would be very convenient, should ask the city council to condemn that property for his use, and the council should pass an ordinance, as requested, declaring that it condemned the property for the use of the individual, of course the ordinance would be void on its face. But suppose the council, intending the condemnation to be really for the sole benefit of the individual, in order to give it validity, should say in the ordinance that the property was to be condemned for a public street, would such a false recital in the ordinance be conclusive? Would it put the man whose property was to be taken, and the people in the district who were to be taxed to pay for it, beyond the protection of the constitutional guaranty that their property should not be taken for private use? Could the city council, by a false recital in the ordinance, give it a validity which it would not have if it recited the truth? And when the city comes to ask the aid of the court to carry the ordinance into effect, is it possible that the court must be a mere tool to do the will of the council, with no power to inquire into the truth of the matter? What protection has a citizen for his constitutional rights, if the courts cannot look through a sham and see the truth, and how can the courts learn the truth if they must take the recitals in the ordinance as conclusive, and reject all evidence to show their untruth? What a reproach it would be to our system of jurisprudence, and how humiliating would be the attitude of our courts, if they were so powerless. But our law is not so lame, and our courts are not so impotent. The courts in such case will hear the evidence and find the facts. If the truth lies only in an unwritten agreement or understanding, it can be proved only by oral testimony, and, that being the best evidence of which the fact is susceptible, the court must receive it and weigh it. Defendant, in such case, is not driven to a suit in equity to reform the ordinance or assail its integrity. This is a summary proceeding, no pleadings are prescribed by the charter or by statute, and the party has a right to demand that the court hear the evidence and find whether or not the purpose of the proceeding is to condemn his property for a public use or for the use of an individual or individuals. If, as the defendant offered to prove, the real purpose for which these ordinances were passed was to make a way for a switch track or switch tracks to property of an individual or any number of individuals, then it was a purpose for which the city council had no authority to condemn property, and the passage of the ordinances was an abuse of its power, and the court should adjudge the ordinances void. But, even if switch tracks are not intended and will not be laid in the streets, still, on what possible theory can it be said that this defendant will be benefited by the opening of this street through his land? It gives him no connection that he has not already, and it cuts him off from his connection with the right of way of the belt railway. The only change in his situation, besides that of depriving him of a large slice of his property, will be to put him at the mercy of the city council if he should ever want a switch track into his premises connecting with the belt railway.

It is said, in behalf of respondent, that no pleadings were filed alleging that this was a proceeding to condemn private property for a private use, and that therefore there is no such question in the case. Under the provisions of the city charter prescribing the procedure in such case, formal pleadings are not required. Nevertheless the defendant in this case did file what is called a motion averring that the ordinance was invalid for several reasons, specified among which was that it was a proceeding to take his property not for a public, but for a private use, and prayed that the suit for those reasons be dismissed; which motion the court overruled without hearing evidence, and defendant excepted. It is true, as contended by respondent, that the jury was not impaneled to try any questions except those relating to the damages and benefits; and therefore, except as bearing on those questions, the jury had nothing to do with determining whether this was a proceeding in good faith to condemn property for a public street; but that was a question addressed to the court, on which the court ought to have heard the evidence offered, and, if satisfied that it was a proceeding to condemn the property of the defendant for the use of one individual or individuals, it ought to have rendered judgment for defendant, dismissing the proceeding. The court could have tried that issue before impaneling the jury, or during the jury trial, or afterwards as it might see fit to do, since there is no particular procedure prescribed in the charter or elsewhere.

For the reasons above given, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded to the Circuit Court to be proceeded with according to the law as hereinabove expressed.

All concur.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT.

FRANK SHACKETT

v.

M. F. BICKFORD.

(74 N. H. 57, 65 Atl. 252.)

Deceit—suspicion of falsity.

Suspicion that a statement of facts made to effect the sale of a chattel may be false is sufficient, if it proves to be so, to sustain an action for deceit.

(November 7, 1906.)

RESERVATION on defendant's exceptions after verdict for plaintiff by the Superior Court for Sullivan County for the opinion of the Supreme Court, of an action brought to recover damages for deceit in the sale of a horse. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Henry F. Hollis, for defendant:

In an action on the case for deceit in the sale of a horse, it is essential to prove scienter.

Mahurin v. Harding, 28 N. H. 128, 59 Am. Dec. 401; Spend v. Tomlinson, 73 N. H. 46, 68 L.R.A. 432, 59 Atl. 376; Syracuse Knitting Co. v. Blanchard, 69 N. H. 447, 43 Atl. 637; Stewart v. Stearns, 63 N. H. 99, 56 Am. Rep. 496; Rowell v. Chase, 61 N. H.

Case Note.—Some American views of the case of Derry v. Peek: — The above case, in holding that a suspicion on the part of the maker of a statement, that such statement may be false, is equivalent to actual knowledge of its falsity, for the purpose of giving a right of action for deceit to a party injured thereby, is fully in accord with authority, since, under such circumstances, there is evidently a want of good faith. But the English case of Derry v. Peek, cited in the opinion in the case reported, and which restates the principles underlying actions for fraud, in imposing the restriction that such an action is not maintainable where the statements are made in good faith, irrespective of whether the person making them has reasonable grounds for believing them to be true, runs counter to a number of decisions; and for this reason a review of the American cases in which it has been cited as bearing upon this question is deemed of interest, as tending to indicate the attitude of our courts toward its doctrine.

It was cited in Watson v. Jones, 41 Fla. 241, 25 So. 678, in which, after alluding to the necessity of alleging and proving, in an action for deceit, the knowledge of defendant that his representations were false, the court proceeds to discuss the quantity and character of proof necessary to sustain the allegation of scienter, and holds that the ultimate fact of knowledge may be established by proof that defendant's situation or means of knowledge was such as made it his duty to know whether a statement was true or false. In reviewing a number of American decisions, the court said: "In Alabama, Colorado, Nebraska, and some other states the courts do not seem to require proof of scienter in cases where the party making a false representation professes to speak from his own knowledge. Munroe v. Pritchett, 16 Ala. 785, 50 Am. Dec. 203; Jordan v. Pickett, 78 Ala. 331; Goodale v. Middaugh, 8 Colo. App. 223, 46 Pac. 11; Johnson v. Gulick, 46 Neb. 817, 50 Am. St. Rep. 629, 65 N. W. 883. In other states the charge of fraudulent intent in actions for deceit may be maintained by proof of a statement made as of a party's own knowledge, which is false, provided the thing stated is not merely a matter of opinion, estimate, or judgment, but is susceptible of actual knowledge; in which case it is deemed that the fraud consists in stating that the party knows the thing to exist when he does not know it to exist, and in such cases a belief of its existence will not warrant or excuse a statement of actual knowledge. Fisher v. Mellen, 103 Mass. 503; Chatham Furnace Co. v. Moffatt, 147 Mass. 403, 9 Am. St. Rep. 727, 18 N. E. 168; Haddock v. Osmer, 153 N. Y. 604, 47 N. E. 923; Bullitt v. Farrar, 42 Minn. 8, 6 L.R.A. 149, 18 Am. St. Rep. 486, 43 N. W. 566. It is also held in these states that, if the representations were not made as of the party's own knowledge, then the evidence must show that the party knew them to be untrue; and evidence that he had reasonable cause to believe that they were untrue will not constitute sufficient proof of scienter. Pearson v. Howe, 1 Allen, 207; Stone v. Denny, 4 Met. 151; Tryon v. Whitmarsh, 1 Met. 1, 35 Am. Dec. 339; Marsh v. Falker, 40 N. Y. 562; Marshall v. Fowler, 7 Hun, 237; McKown v. Furgason, 47 Iowa, 636. The question was considered by this court in Wheeler v. Baars, 33 Fla. 696, 15 So. 584, and the defendant in error relies upon the decision in that case in support of the position assumed by him in this one. It is there said that the scienter may be proved by showing, first, actual knowledge of the falsity of the representation by defendant; second, that defendant made the

Limerick Nat. Bank v. Adams, 70 Vt. 132, 40 Atl. 166; Limerick Nat. Bank v. Howard, 71 N. H. 13, 93 Am. St. Rep. 489, 51 Atl. 641. Mr. Jesse M. Barton, for plaintiff:

Scienter is satisfied, not alone by absolute knowledge, but by certain equivalents, namely: (a) making material statements recklessly, without knowing whether they are true or false; (b) making material statements as of the defendant's knowledge; (c) making material statements under circumstances in which the defendant is bound to know the facts.

Rowell v. Chase, 61 N. H. 135.

Bingham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The important question in this case arises on the defendant's exception to the charge of the court to the jury. The action was statement as of his own knowledge, or in such absolute, unqualified, and positive terms as to imply his personal knowledge of the fact, when in truth defendant had no knowledge whether the statement was true or false; or, third, that the party's special situation or means of knowledge were such as to make it his duty to know as to the truth or falsity of the representation. Under each phase, the proof must show that the statement was in fact false, and in addition, under the first, that defendant had actual knowledge that it was false; under the second, that defendant made the statement as of his own knowledge, when in fact he had no knowledge whether it was true or false, which seems to bear a close resemblance to the English rule, 'without belief in its truth, or recklessly careless whether it be true or false;' and, under the third, that defendant's special situation or means of knowledge were such as made it his duty to know as to the truth or falsity of the representation."

In Goodwin v. Massachusetts Loan & T. Co. 152 Mass. 189, 25 N. E. 100, it was said in passing that the law of Massachusetts, in actions for deceit, is, perhaps, not precisely that declared by the House of Lords in Derry v. Peek; but in Nash v. Minnesota Title Ins. & T. Co. 163 Mass. 574, 28 L.R.A. 753, 47 Am. St. Rep. 489, 40 N. E. 1039, the doctrine of the English case, that mere ignorance, or negligence, or stupidity on the part of the person making the representations does not constitute fraud if he intends honestly to tell the truth, was fully approved; the court saying: "In this particular the decisions in this commonwealth are of similar import. Tryon v. Whitmarsh, supra; Page v. Bent, 2 Met. 371; Pearson v. Howe, supra; King v. Eagle Mills, 10 Allen, 548; Hartford Live Stock Ins. Co. v. Matthews, 102 Mass. 221; 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) deceit in the sale of a horse, and the ground upon which the trial proceeded was that the defendant knew his representations were false. The court charged the jury "that it was enough, upon the question of the defendant's knowledge, if he knew, or if he suspected, that the representations were not true." In other words, that suspicion by the maker that his representations are false is the legal equivalent of knowledge of their falsity, and fraudulent.

What will constitute fraud in such an action has recently been considered by the English courts. The leading case upon the subject is Derry v. Peek, L. R. 14 App. Cas. 337, decided in the House of Lords in 1889. The complainant in that case charged the defendants with knowingly making false representations. It was found in the court of first instance that the representations had been honestly made, believing them to be true; and the court of appeal (L. R. 37 Ch. Div. 541) held that, notwithstanding Chatham Furnace Co. v. Moffatt and Fisher v. Mellen, supra; Holst v. Stewart, 154 Mass. 445, 28 N. E. 574. See also Page v. Parker, 40 N. H. 47; Hammatt v. Emerson, 27 Me. 308, 46 Am. Dec. 598; Marsh v. Falker, supra; Chester v. Comstock, 40 N. Y. 575, note; Cowley v. Smyth, 46 N. J. L. 380, 50 Am. Rep. 432. There is a good reason for this rule. The general test to determine whether there is a liability in an action of tort is the question whether the defendant has, by act or omission, disregarded his duty. In applying this test, it is always necessary, first, to inquire what the defendant's duty is. In an action of deceit, the defendant is ordinarily sued as one whose only relation to the transaction is that of a gratuitous informer, who had no interest in the subject to which the representations related. On the necessary allegations of the declaration, he may be assumed to have answered inquiries put by a stranger, or to have volunteered statements out of apparent friendship. Under such circumstances, although he thinks that his statements will be acted upon by the inquirer, he has no higher duty than to answer honestly and in good faith. If one makes a statement for a consideration as a part of a contract, it is his duty to be accurate, and ignorance or mistake will not relieve him from the consequences of an error. In seeking a remedy from him for a mistake so made, the plaintiff, in his declaration, states his relation to the transaction, and sues in contract. But one who merely answers the inquiries of a stranger, or courteously volunteers information in a matter which does not concern him, is in a position analogous to that of a gratuitous bailee of property, from whom a less degree of care is required than from a bailee for hire. He must not intentionally mislead;

this fact, the representations must be taken to be fraudulent because the defendants had no reasonable ground for that belief. The question, therefore, which was presented for the consideration of the House of Lords, when the case came before that body in L. R. 14 App. Cas. 337, was whether a statement honestly made and believed to be true should be treated as fraudulent because those who made it had no reasonable ground for entertaining that belief. In the House of Lords the decision of the court of appeal was reversed, and it was there held, in conformity with the universally recognized rule, that an action of deceit is based upon fraud; that an action for negligent misrepresentation, as distinguished from fraudulent misrepresentation, could not be maintained; that want of reasonable ground for believing a representation to be true might be evidence of fraud, if the circumstances indicated such recklessness or negligent disregard for the truth as to be incompatible with the idea of honesty, but that even gross negligence, in the absence of dishonesty, did not of itself amount to fraud; that, notwithstanding a court or jury might find that the speaker had no reasonable ground for believing his representations were true, he may nevertheless have honestly entertained such belief, and consequently that fraud could not be predicated upon such a finding. Lord Herschell, who delivered the leading judgment in the case, said (p. 374): "I think the authorities establish the following propositions: First, in order to sustain an action of deceit there must be proof of fraud, and nothing short of that will suffice. Secondly, fraud is proved when it is shown that a false rep-

but, if he answers honestly, to the best of his ability, he does his whole duty. If he is an ignorant, stupid man, and on that account the inquirer is led astray, it is not his fault, but the fault or misfortune of the person who relies upon him. It would be unjust to visit upon him the consequences of his ignorance in a matter in which he had no interest."

It is also cited in Speed v. Tomlinson, 73 N. H. 46, 68 L.R.A. 432, 59 Atl. 376, in support of the proposition that, in an action for deceit, the plaintiff must allege and prove not only that the representation was false, but also that it was made with a fraudulent intent; and it was there held that, when the representation relates to a matter which is susceptible of personal knowledge, and is made as of the maker's own knowledge, the jury may find, from the fact that it is false, that it was made with a fraudulent intent.

In Kountze v. Kennedy, 147 N. Y. 124, 29 L.R.A. 360, 49 Am. St. Rep. 651, 41 N. E. 414, Derry v. Peek was expressly approved, the court saying that, where an act is attributable to an honest belief, a fraudulent intent is lacking and a charge of deceit fails; although the court further states that it was not necessary to go to this extent to uphold the judgment in question, it having been found that there were reasonable grounds for the belief.

In Penn Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Mechanics' Sav. Bank & T. Co. 38 L.R.A. 70, 19 C. C. A. 316, 43 U. S. App. 75, 73 Fed. 653, the court, though holding it unnecessary to determine the question in the case before it, said: "Whether actual bad faith must be shown in common-law actions for deceit, to justify a recovery, has been the subject of much controversy, and it has been finally settled in England, by the decision of the House of Lords in Derry v. Peek, L. R. 14 App. Cas. 337, that there can be no recovery in such an action whenever the defendant made the statement complained of in the honest belief of its truth, however unreasonable such belief. Such, too, would seem to the holding of the Supreme Court of the United States in Lord v. Goddard, 13 How. 198, 14 L. ed. 111 (see also Biggs v. Barry, 2 Curt. C. C. 259, Fed. Cas. No. 1,402), though, in view of some of its later cases, the question may still be an open one in the latter court. Lehigh Zinc & Iron Co. v. Bamford, 150 U. S. 665, 37 L. ed. 1215, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 219. There is much authority in this country supporting the view that an action for deceit may be maintained against one making an untrue statement, though in the honest belief of its truth, if there was no reasonable ground for such belief; or, to put it in another way, if he ought to have known the truth. Cooley, Torts, 2d ed. p. 585. . . . The conflict of authority in regard to actions for deceit is whether actual bad faith is necessary to sustain the action, and not whether an untrue statement, founded on an honest belief in its truth, though inadvertently or forgetfully or negligently made, is a statement in bad faith. Here the statute expressly declares the material issue to be whether the misrepresentation was made in bad faith. This relieves us of all difficulty. The statute means what it says. It does not mean constructive bad faith. It does not mean gross negligence, which some courts have held sufficient to sustain an action for deceit. It means the same actual intent to mislead that must be found in convicting one of the crime of false pretenses; and surely honest belief in the misstatement, through forgetfulness and inadvertence, is a defense to such a charge. The reference to the essential basis of recovery in common-law actions for deceit only tends to confusion because of the conflict of authority, and is in no way helpful in constraining the statute."

In Hindman v. First Nat. Bank, 57 L.R.A. 108, 50 C. C. A. 623, 112 Fed. 931, it was cited in support of the proposition that, before the plaintiff can recover in an action of deceit, he must prove two things,—that the resentation has been made (1) knowingly or (2) without belief in its truth, or (3) recklessly, careless whether it be true or false. Although I have treated the second and third as distinct cases, I think the third is but an instance of the second; for one who makes a statement under such circumstances can have no real belief in the truth of what he states. To prevent a false statement being fraudulent, there must, I think, always be an honest belief in its truth. And this probably covers the whole ground; for one who knowingly alleges that which is false has obviously no such honest belief. Thirdly, if fraud be proved, the motive of the person guilty of it is immaterial. It matters not that there was no intention to cheat or injure the person to whom the statement was made." In Angus v. Clifford [1891] 2 Ch. 449, 465, 466, Lindley, L. J., in commenting upon this statement of Lord Herschell, said: "You may have . . . a false statement made, but made without the matter being present to your mind, and made carelessly; and, if that is the fact, that is not fraud, but carelessness, for which an action will not lie. . . . The passages about knowledge—knowingly making it, and making a statement without believing its truth—are based upon the supposition that the matter was really before the mind of the person making the statement; and, if the evidence is that he never really intended to mislead, that he did not see the effect, or dream that the effect of what he was saying could mislead, and that that particular part of what he was saying was not present to his mind at all, that, I should say, is proof of carelessness rather than of fraud. I base my judgment . . . on the representation was false, and that the person making it knew it was false; though in such an action it is not enough to show that the representation is untrue, for, if it was honestly believed to be true, that is a good defense; but that the grounds of belief, and the means of knowledge, in possession of the person making a statement, are to be considered in determining the honesty of the belief.

In Kimber v. Young, 70 C. C. A. 178, 137 Fed. 744, the court said: "The basis of the action of deceit is the actual fraud of defendant,—his moral delinquency; and therefore his knowledge of the falsity of the representation, or that which in law is equivalent thereto, must be averred and proved. There is much confusion in the authorities upon this subject, due in part to the erroneous assumption that that which is merely evidence of fraud is equivalent to the ultimate fact which it tends to prove, and also to the assumption, likewise erroneous, that an untrue representation which would be sufficient to support a suit in equity for a rescission of a contract is equally as available in an action of deceit;" proceeding then to quote from Derry v. Peek, which is termed "a well-reasoned case."

Derry v. Peek, however, recognizes the fact that a false representation, though made without actual fraudulent intent, may warrant the rescission of the contract based thereon; and in Adams v. Reed, 11 Utah, 480, 40 Pac. 720, it was cited in support of the proposition that material representations which are untrue, though innocently made, or the concealment of material facts by mistake or inadvertence, when relied on, and which have become the foundation of the active relations between the parties, constitute such fraud as will move a court of equity to decree the rescission of an executory contract.

same authority, that a contract resting upon a misrepresentation cannot stand, however honestly the misrepresentation may have been made, scienter being immaterial in an action for rescission.

The decisions which run apparently counter to the doctrine under discussion cannot here be taken up in detail for the purpose of indicating their exact relation thereto. It is suggested, however, that many of the cases which seem to hold that a statement honestly made may form a basis for an action for fraud are susceptible of justification, although incorrect in theory, on some one of the following grounds, none of which conflicts with the rule laid down in Derry v. Peek:

That the statement was contractual in its nature, so as to permit the recovery of damages where it proves to be false, as for breach of implied warranty.

That the statement was such as to warrant a recovery of the consideration on the theory that the contract was entered into under mutual mistake.

Whether or not a person may escape liability on one or the other of the foregoing grounds depends upon the relation of the parties to the transaction, want of actual bad faith operating to relieve one who sustains no contractual relation; but there is another ground on which one may be held liable irrespective of contractual relation, which is:

That the person not only made the statement as true, but further represented himself as knowing its truth; in which case the element of bad faith lies in an affirmation of actual knowledge which he knows he does not possess.

Liability for damages accruing because of reliance on statements made in good faith, but which prove untrue, may also sometimes be predicated upon a breach of duty arising from circumstances or the relation of the parties, to ascertain the actual facts.

. . . ground that . . . an action of this kind cannot be supported without proof of fraud, an intention to deceive, and that it is not sufficient that there is blundering carelessness, however gross, unless there is wilful recklessness, by which I mean wilfully shutting one's eyes, which is, of course, fraud." In Le Lievre v. Gould [1893] 1 Q. B. 491, 498, Lord Esher, M. R., states: "A charge of fraud . . . against a man . . . cannot be maintained in any court unless it is shown that he had a wicked mind. . . . If a man tells a wilful falsehood, with the intention that it shall be acted upon by the person to whom he tells it, his mind is plainly wicked, and he must be said to be acting fraudulently. Again, a man must be said to have a fraudulent mind if he recklessly makes a statement intending it to be acted upon, and not caring whether it be true or false. I do not hesitate to say that a man who thus acts must have a wicked mind." And Bowen, L. J., in the same case, says (pp. 500, 501): "But his mind is wicked, not because he is negligent, but because he is dishonest in not caring about the truth of his statement. In the first case it is the knowledge of the falsehood, in the second it is the wicked indifference, which constitutes the fraud. There seems to have been some sort of an idea that . . . whether the man had made the representation, not knowing and not caring whether his statement was true or false, the expression 'not caring' had something to do with his not taking care. But that expression did not mean not taking care to find out whether the statement was true or false. It meant not caring in the man's own heart and conscience whether it was true or false; and that would be wicked indifference and recklessness."

It is apparent from the views expressed by the judges in these cases that to establish fraud you must prove a dishonest mental state or condition of mind on the part of the speaker with reference to the truthfulness of his statement; that, when he makes a statement of fact, intending it to be relied upon, he of necessity affirms his belief in its truth (Smith v. Chadwick, L. R. 9 App. Cas. 187, 203; Angus v. Clifford, supra, 470); that, if his statement was untrue and he knew it, or he made it without belief in its truth, or with a conscious indifference, not caring whether it was true or false, the wickedness of his mind is manifest and the fraudulent character of his act established. Applying these principles to this case, it would seem to follow that when the defendant, with a view to effecting the sale, stated to the plaintiff that the horse was safe and just what he wanted, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) he thereby affirmed his belief in the truthfulness of his statement, and, it being found that the horse was vicious, and that the defendant suspected that his statement was false, that his want of belief or conscious disregard for the truth or falsity of his statement was established; for a person who suspects that his statement is false does not entertain an honest belief that it is true, or is consciously and wickedly indifferent to its truth or falsity.

The conclusion here reached is in harmony with the decisions in this state and with the great weight of authority elsewhere. Mahurin v. Harding, 28 N. H. 128, 59 Am. Dec. 401; Hansom v. Edgerly, 29 N. H. 343; Pettigrew v. Chellis, 41 N. H. 95; Springfield v. Drake, 58 N. H. 19; Rowell v. Chase, 61 N. H. 135; Stewart v. Stearns, 63 N. H. 99, 56 Am. Rep. 496; Speed v. Harding, supra, the court approved a charge to the jury that "if the affirmation [of the defendants] was known, or believed, or suspected by them to be false, and the event proved that it was so, it should be deemed fraudulent;" and stated that the terms used to describe the scienter were "expressions of equivalent import." With this view we are content. The defendant's motions for a nonsuit and verdict were properly denied. The evidence was sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that the representations were fraudulent.

Exceptions overruled.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

JOHN H. RICKER
v.

CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY OF NEW JERSEY, Plff. in Err.

(— N. J. —, 64 Atl. 1068.)

Fellow servants—train despatcher and fireman.

A train despatcher of a railroad company, whose duty is to issue telegraphic orders for the movement of trains upon a single-track road, in the name of the superintendent, and to see that they are transmitted, is not a fellow servant of a fireman upon one of the locomotives of the company.

(Gummere, Ch. J., and Garrison, Hendrickson, Pitney, Reed, Gray, and Dill, JJ., dissent.)

(November 19, 1906.)

ERROR to the Supreme Court to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Headnotes by SWAYZE, J.

Case Note.—Train despatcher as fellow servant, at common law, of train employees:

While the decision in RICKER v. CENTRAL R. Co. was rendered by a divided court, it is in harmony with the decisions of the Federal courts, and of the courts of the various states which have passed upon the question, with the exception of Maryland and Mississippi.

Jurisdiction holding train despatcher not a fellow servant.

Arkansas recognizes the train despatcher to be a vice principal where he has direction and control of the movement of trains, as, in so doing, he performs the master's duty, and represents the company, which is liable for his negligence, if any, in so doing. Little Rock & M. R. Co. v. Barry, 58 Ark. 198, 25 L.R.A. 386, 23 S. W. 1097.

A train despatcher is not a fellow servant of an engineer. Darrigan v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 52 Conn. 285, 52 Am. Rep. 590. Upon the division where the accident involved in this case occurred three train despatchers were employed, one of whom was known as the chief train despatcher, but his duties and powers were not different from those of the train despatcher whose negligence caused the accident. The train despatcher, to use the language of the court, "in respect to the matter of moving these trains, was supreme. The whole power of the corporation whose duty it was to move them safely was delegated to him. He was the agent through whom the corporation attempted to perform its duty."

In Palmer v. Utah & N. R. Co. 2 Idaho, 315, 13 Pac. 425, the court held that a station agent whose duties were admitted to be the same as those of a train despatcher, so far as they related to the case, was not a fellow servant of a railroad carpenter who was injured through the failure of the station agent to notify the conductor of the train on which the carpenter was riding of a broken rail, notice of which he had received 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Mr. William D. Edwards, with Mr. George Holmes, for plaintiff in error:

In those states where the doctrine of the responsibility of the company for the negligence of the train despatcher is upheld the doctrine of "superior-servant rule" as a limitation upon the master's exemption from liability to a servant for the negligence of a fellow servant also obtains.

Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Hoover, 79 Md. 253, 25 L.R.A. 710, 47 Am. St. Rep. 392, 29 Atl. 994.

This rule does not obtain in New Jersey.

Knutter v. New York & N. J. Teleph. Co. 67 N. J. L. 647, 58 L.R.A. 808, 52 Atl. 565; Smith v. Erie R. Co. 67 N. J. L. 636, 59 L.R.A. 302, 52 Atl. 634.

Mr. Louis H. Schenck, for defendant in error:

It is the recognized duty of the master

several hours before the accident. This decision was based upon the ground that the station agent, or train despatcher, was invested with the controlling or superior duty in the management of the business of the railroad. It will be noted that it does not appear that the station agent had general control over the movement of trains, and that it does appear that the accident was not the result of a collision.

A train despatcher or division superintendent of a railroad company under whose orders trains are run is not in the same line of employment as an engineer who runs a locomotive over such road with a train attached, under the order of such train despatcher or division superintendent; and such train despatcher represents the company. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Young, 26 Ill. App. 115.

Neither is he a fellow servant of a conductor injured in a collision caused by the negligence of such assistant superintendent or train despatcher. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. McLallen, 84 Ill. 109.

The supreme court of Indiana determined the question by holding the train despatcher to be a vice principal, in Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Heck, 151 Ind. 292, 50 N. E. 988, and in so doing it overruled Robertson v. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. 78 Ind. 77, 41 Am. Rep. 552, in which a contrary doctrine had been enunciated, and said that the remarks of the commissioner in that case were wholly obiter dicta and had no authority whatever. Findings in the Heck Case showed that all train orders were issued by the train despatcher, and that he absolutely controlled all their movements, and that he was charged with the duty of so ordering such movements as to avoid collisions. The court further stated that "a railroad company is legally bound to know, and, therefore, in law it does know, the whereabouts of all its trains. . . . This knowledge it can only have through its train despatcher."

The rule that a train despatcher is not a not only to furnish a safe place for its employees to work, but to keep that place safe.

The train despatcher is not a fellow servant with the members of the train crews to whom he issues orders for the movement of trains.

fellow servant with the trainmen was adhered to in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Elliott, 2 Ind. Terr. 407, 51 S. W. 1067, in which the court discusses at some length the authorities dealing with the fellow-servant doctrine.

And in Kentucky it has been held that a railroad company is liable for injuries resulting to an employee from the collision of trains due to the negligence of a train despatcher who had control of all the officers on both trains. Louisville, C. & L. R. Co. v. Cavens, 9 Bush, 559.

In McLeod v. Ginther, 80 Ky. 399, the liability of the defendant for the negligence of the train despatcher in causing a collision resulting in injury to the engineer on one of the trains was apparently assumed by the court in passing upon the case, as it limited its discussion to the question of whether or not the train despatcher had been negligent, which question it decided adversely to the railroad company.

In Maine the liability of a railroad company for the negligence of its train despatcher was sustained in Lasky v. Canadian Pacific R. Co. 83 Me. 461, 22 Atl. 367, where it was held that a train despatcher who habitually issues orders for trains in the name of the superintendent, in his absence, is a vice principal, and not a fellow servant of an engineer injured through a collision caused by his negligence.

The Missouri supreme court, after holding, in Blessing v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 77 Mo. 410, that, under their rule placing upon the plaintiff the burden of showing the nonexistence of the relation of fellow servants, plaintiff was properly nonsuited for not introducing testimony to show that the decedent and the train despatcher were not fellow servants, passed upon the question under discussion, in Smith v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 92 Mo. 359, 1 Am. St. Rep. 729, 4 S. W. 129, by holding the train despatcher who had control of the movement of the trains not a fellow servant with those engaged in operating and moving the train. An unsuccessful attempt was made to apply this decision in the subsequent case of Jackson v. Missouri P. R. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Co. 104 Mo. 448, 16 S. W. 413. The ground on which the court based its refusal was, first, that "it did not appear what the duties of this so-called train despatcher were," and, second, it was held that the negligence of the deceased caused the accident.

In Wallace v. Boston & M. R. Co. 72 N. H. 504, 57 Atl. 913, the court held a train despatcher to be a vice principal, and said: "They [railroad companies] . . . ought to know to what use each portion of the road is devoted at a given time. Their employees do not have this knowledge, except as informed by them. The running of a train over the road is their act, whether it is run by the direct order of their stockholders, or by the order of their directors, superintendent, or train despatcher. The arranging for the running of trains generally is essentially a master's function. It requires the exercise of the master's authority and discretion. It differs from the act of a conductor in taking his particular train over the road, as the act of the author of a business in instituting and directing it differs from the act of a servant in executing its details."

The question was settled in New York by determining that a train despatcher is not a fellow servant, in Hankins v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 142 N. Y. 416, 25 L.R.A. 396, 40 Am. St. Rep. 616, 37 N. E. 466. There the railroad company had established and promulgated what the court of appeals considered an appropriate and sufficient rule and regulation for the government and operation of the various trains upon its road; but it was held that the defendant's duty did not stop there; that it owed the duty of taking due and reasonable care to give correct orders to its trains; and that the failure of the train despatcher to perform this duty is the failure of the master; and that, when the train despatcher originates and promulgates train orders, he is acting as the master.

In Sutherland v. Troy & B. R. Co. 125 N. Y. 737, 35 N. Y. S. R. 853, 26 N. E. 609, the court of appeals held that the defendant was negligent if the collision was Co. 40 W. Va. 436, 52 Am. St. Rep. 896, 21 S. E. 1028; 4 Thomp. Neg. last ed. § 5020; Thomas, Neg. 2d ed. p. 1656.

Swayze, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, a fireman on train 30, south bound, on a branch of the defendant railroad, was injured in a collision with train due to the omission of the train despatcher to exercise proper care to avoid the collision; but the decision did not turn entirely upon this point, as the court reversed the judgment on the ground that the plaintiff had been guilty of contributory negligence.

And in McChesney v. Panama R. Co. 74 Hun, 150, 26 N. Y. Supp. 245, it was held that a train despatcher was not a fellow servant of an engineer, and that the question was no longer an open one. This decision was affirmed in the court of appeals without opinion. 148 N. Y. 729, 42 N. E. 724.

The Pennsylvania courts hold that a train despatcher is not a fellow servant with an engineer injured in a collision caused by the negligence of the train despatcher. Lewis v. Seifert, 116 Pa. 628, 2 Am. St. Rep. 631, 11 Atl. 514. The train despatcher in this case had complete control of the movement of the trains.

This case was subsequently cited in Reiser v. Pennsylvania Co. 152 Pa. 38, 34 Am. St. Rep. 620, 25 Atl. 175, in support of the doctrine that, the train despatcher being a vice principal, the railroad company was bound by his knowledge of the incompetency of the telegraph operator. But, while the court ruled against this contention on the ground that, the train despatcher having no power to discharge the operator, notice to him was not notice to the company, there is nothing in the decision militating against the earlier decision in the Seifert Case, as the court said: "To the extent that he was the representative of the company in the performance of a positive duty it owed to its servants, it is responsible to them for his negligence; but beyond that it is not. The contention of the appellant that the knowledge of Perdue respecting the qualifications of Crossman was the knowledge of the company finds no support in Lewis v. Seifert."

The doctrine of the Seifert Case was reaffirmed in Goodman v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 167 Pa. 332, 31 Atl. 670, and in Brommer v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 205 Pa. 432, 54 Atl. 1092. In the latter case the court passed upon the question with the mere 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

No. 31, north bound, 1 mile south of Hoffman's station. The trial judge allowed the case to go to the jury only upon the question of negligence on the part of the train despatcher at High Bridge, the junction point of the branch road with the main line. Two questions are therefore presented on this writ of error: (1) Was the negligence of the train despatcher the negligence of the company, so as to preclude the application of the rule that denies recovery for injuries caused by the negligence of a fellow servant? (2) If so, was there evidence of negligence sufficient to justify the submission of the case to the jury?

The general principle, well established in the cases, is that the master is bound to take reasonable care that the place where statement that "it is conceded that, under the decisions the train despatcher, within the limits of his employment, was a vice principal."

In Tennessee, where the fellow-servant doctrine has met with much disfavor on the part of the courts, and has been given a very narrow scope, it has accordingly been held that the superintendent of a road, whose negligence in starting a train caused the collision involved, represented the road and was a vice principal. Washburn v. Nashville & C. R. Co. 3 Head, 638, 75 Am. Dec. 784. See also Haynes v. East Tennessee & G. R. Co. 3 Coldw. 222, where the court refused to recognize the superintendent of the road as a fellow servant of a track repairer, who was run over and injured through the negligence of the former in sending out a train out of schedule time.

In Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Hogan, 88 Tex. 679, 32 S. W. 1035, it was held that a train despatcher is not a fellow servant of an employee injured in a collision caused by the train despatcher's negligence.

A railroad company is liable for the negligence of its division superintendent, who, having charge of all trains, issued an order which resulted in a collision and the death of the plaintiff's intestate. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Arispe, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 611, 23 S. W. 928, 24 S. W. 33.

And in Phillips v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 64 Wis. 475, 25 N. W. 544, the train despatcher was held not to be a fellow servant with the brakeman on a freight train, who was killed in a collision.

The rule in the Federal courts.

In determining who are fellow servants, the Federal courts are not, in the absence of a state statute determining such question, concluded by the decisions of the state court of the state in which the action arose, as the question is one of general law to be determined by reference to all the authorities, and a consideration of the principles underlying the relations of master and servant. The independence of the Federal courts in dealing with this question was settled in the workmen are engaged shall be kept safe (Belleville Stone Co. v. Mooney, 61 N. J. L. 253, 39 L.R.A. 834, 39 Atl. 764), and, if the master selects an agent to perform this duty for him, and the agent fails to exercise reasonable care and skill in its performance, the master is responsible for the fault. Nord Deutscher Lloyd S. S. Co. v. Ingebrechtsen, 57 N. J. L. 400, 51 Am. St. Rep. 604, 31 Atl. 619. The master is held liable in a proper case because the negligence is regarded by the law as his negligence. Where the negligence consists merely in the failure of the agent to perform a duty properly intrusted to him by the master, the master cannot be held liable by virtue of the rule respondeat superior, where the application of that rule is prevented by the well-established exception which exempts the master from liability to a servant for injuries resulting from the negligence of a fellow servant. In applying the general principles to the fact of a particular case, it often becomes difficult to determine whether the negligence in question is to be regarded as the negligence of the master or of the servant alone; and various tests to determine this question have been suggested. In this state we have rejected the theory which holds the master liable merely because the negligent servant is in charge of a separate department, or is superior in rank to the one injured. Knutter v. New York & N. J. Teleph. Co. 67 N. J. L. 646, 58 L.R.A. 808, 52 Atl. 565. In Baltimore & O. R. Co. v.

The Federal Supreme Court passed upon the question in Santa Fé Pacific R. Co. v. Holmes, 202 U. S. 438, 50 L. ed. 1094, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 676, Affirming 68 C. C. A. 634, 136 Fed. 66, and held that a train despatcher is not a fellow servant of the train employees. Prior to this decision the question had been disposed of by several decisions in the Federal courts, all of which reached the same result.

In Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Camp, 13 C. C. A. 233, 31 U. S. App. 213, 65 Fed. 952, the question was passed upon by the circuit court of appeals in the sixth circuit and the train despatcher held not to be a fellow servant. Judge Taft, writing the opinion, said the evidence showed that the train despatcher whose negligence caused the collision had complete control for eight hours of the movement of all trains. He sent his despatches in the name of, and in the stead of, the superintendent, who was absent from the office, and he was "therefore at the head of the division for the operation of trains." While this case involved the Ohio statute declaring that every person in the employ of a railroad company "actually having power or authority to direct or control any other employee of such company, is not the fellow servant, but superior, of such other employee; also that every person in the employ of such company, having charge or control of employees in any separate branch or department, shall be held to be the superior, and not fellow servant, of employees in any other branch or department,"—the court stated: "We do not doubt that a train despatcher is a representative of the company, within the rule of the common law, as expounded by the Supreme Court of the United States. . . . He represents the company for two reasons: First, because he is pro tempore in supreme control of a distinct department of the railroad, namely, the running department of the company for his division; and, second, (because the work which he is called upon to do is in the discharge of a positive duty owed by the company to its employees." L.R.A. (N.S.)

After its decision in the Camp Case, the circuit court of appeals for the sixth circuit again passed upon the question in Felton v. Harbeson, 44 C. C. A. 188, 104 Fed. 737, and reached the same conclusion. In this case no statutory question was involved, and the decision was squarely on the common law, and the court contented itself with the mere statement of its holding, and cited its prior decision as an authority.

The question was next passed upon by District Judge Newman, in the northern district of Georgia, in Clyde v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 69 Fed. 673, who reached the same conclusion as that arrived at in the Camp Case, which he cited. Here the train despatcher was in complete control of the trains, and knew their location.

In the eighth circuit the court of appeals held, in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Elliott, 42 C. C. A. 188, 102 Fed. 96, that the train despatcher is not a fellow servant of the trainmen, saying that this rule is now as firmly settled as any rule of law can be by judicial decisions. A railroad track is of no use to its owner or the public unless cars are run upon it. The railroad is built for that purpose. It is the movement of the trains upon the track that constitutes it a railroad. That is the consummation of the whole business. Trains will not move of their own volition. They have to be set in motion and kept moving by orders from some source. The conductors and engineers on the different trains have no authority over each other. They are required to obey orders for the movement of their trains, but can give none. The company itself can alone tell when and how its trains shall be run. That is its business, and, in the last analysis, its only business. . . . The alter ego of the company in directing the movement of its trains by telegraph is the train despatcher, and his orders are the orders of the company, and must be obeyed by all to whom they are addressed." In this case, Sanborn, Ch. J., dissented on the ground that "the train despatcher in this case, whose duty it was to direct the movement of trains on one of several divisions of this railroad, was, in my opinion, a fellow

Baugh, 149 U. S. 368, 37 L. ed. 772, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 914, it was said that the question turns rather on the character of the act than on the relation of the employees to each other. This test had already been adopted in our supreme court (Smith v. Oxford Iron Co. 42 N. J. L. 467, 474, 36 Am. Rep. 535), where Justice Van Syckel said that the neglect to perform those duties which devolve upon the company should be regarded as the neglect of the company itself; and was adopted by this court in Smith v. Erie R. Co. 67 N. J. L. 636, 59 L.R.A. 302, 52 Atl. 634. In Nord Deutscher Lloyd S. S. Co. v. Ingebregsten, Justice Dixon said, with reference to the inspection and repair of apparatus, that a rational distinction would seem to be that when the employee's duty to inspect and repair is incidental to his duty to use the apparatus in the common employment, then he is not intrusted with the master's duty to his fellow servant, and the master is not responsible to his fellow servant for his fault; but that, if the master has cast a duty of inspection or repair upon an employee who is not engaged in using the apparatus in a common employment with his fellow servant, then that employee in that duty represents the master, and the master is chargeable with his default. Both of these tests—the character of the act, and its incidental feature—are useful tests; but there is nothing in the cases cited to indicate that there may not be other tests also. The question to be determined is whether, under servant of all his coworkers in the operating department of the plaintiff in error below its superintendent or general manager; and for that reason the railroad company was not liable for his negligence."

And in the ninth circuit it has been held by the circuit court of appeals that a train despatcher issuing orders for the movement of trains in the name of the superintendent is not a fellow servant. Northern P. R. Co. v. Mix, 57 C. C. A. 592, 121 Fed. 476.

Jurisdictions, holding train despatcher to be a fellow servant.

In Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Hoover, 79 Md. 253, 25 L.R.A. 710, 47 Am. St. Rep. 392, 29 Atl. 994, a train despatcher was held to be a fellow servant of an engine man injured in a collision. That this decision is due to the peculiar condition of the Maryland decisions in extending the fellow-servant rule is shown by the fact that the court, after reviewing the Maryland decisions, in one of which it was held that the chief manager of the works, who hired and discharged the hands, kept their time, etc., was a fellow servant of a laborer (Yates v. McCullough Iron Co. 69 Md. 370, 16 Atl. 280), stated: "In the face of these decisions, it is impossible to treat Shull as anything more than a fellow servant. The management of the division upon which he was train despatcher was not committed to him. He was a subordinate appointed by the superintendent, and, though he had charge of the trainmen and of the movement of trains on his division, and could employ and discharge flagmen and brakemen, it is far from being shown that the master had relinquished all supervision of the work on that division, and intrusted its direction, as well as the procuring of materials and machinery and other instrumentalities necessary for the service, to his judgment and discretion. . . . They were both engaged in the same common work, employed by the same agent of the common master, and were performing duties pertaining to the same general business; and unless the whole current of the Maryland decisions is to be reversed, they were fellow servants of the railroad company, upon the evidence now before us."

In Millsaps v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. 69 Miss. 423, 13 So. 696, the court held, without discussing the question, that the train despatcher is the fellow servant of the fireman killed by a collision through the train despatcher's negligence. The train despatcher was charged with the duty of directing the movement of trains. The court passed upon the point with the mere statement that "the train despatcher was the fellow servant of the intestate," and cited Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. v. Petty, 67 Miss. 255, 19 Am. St. Rep. 304, 7 So. 351, Lagrone v. Mobile & O. R. Co. 67 Miss. 592, 7 So. 432, and New Orleans, J. & G. N. R. Co. v. Hughes, 49 Miss. 258. None of the cases involved the negligence of the train despatcher. In the Hughes Case the plaintiff was injured by the rotten condition of the cross-ties which threw his locomotive from the track, and it was the duty of the section boss and road master to keep the track in reasonable repair. In the Petty Case, a brakeman was injured by the sudden jerking of the engine while going down grade, due to the fact that the sand box had not been supplied with sand by the hostler. Here the court showed its intention to give a broad scope to the fellow-servant doctrine by the use of the following language: "The rule on this subject . . . has remained undisturbed by judicial or legislative enactment, and must be regarded as the accepted doctrine in this state; and we must not be expected to follow the devious ways of those courts which, in bending the rule which all acknowledge, to effect their ideas of justice, in particular cases, have well-nigh destroyed the rule itself. This rule, as held in this state, and in several other states of the United States, and in England, is a simple one, just in its principle, politic in its application, because conservative of life and property, and easily understood and applied, while all efforts to vary and qualify it have involved courts undertaking it in endless contradictions and difficulties." In the Lagrone Case a section master was held to be a fellow servant of all the circumstances of the particular case, the servant is to be regarded as the alter ego of the master. It may be that the master has intrusted him with such control over the general conduct of the business that he must be regarded as standing in the master's shoes. This is especially likely to be the case with a corporation, which can act only through agents, as was suggested in Smith v. Oxford Iron Co. supra, and in O'Brien v. American Dredging Co. 53 N. J. L. 291, 21 Atl. 324. In such cases the liability of the master depends upon whether he has intrusted the servant with such control as is properly the business of the master.

We think the facts in the present case necessitate an inference that the train despatcher was the alter ego of the defendant. It will hardly be denied that the duty of a railroad company to take care that the place in which its employees are to work shall be reasonably safe required the company to prepare a schedule or time-table for the running of its trains. Such a schedule is absolutely essential in order that the system adopted by the company for the conduct of its business may be reasonably safe. When that schedule breaks down, it may be under such circumstances that a new schedule to meet the emergency can be made by the train hands themselves; as, for instance, when a train is delayed and the engineer makes up time by running faster than his ordinary schedule. But when the railroad is a single track, and it becomes a track repairer, and the court used language which plainly showed its intention not to qualify or limit the fellow-servant rule, as has been done in most states. In speaking along this line, the court said: That the question under discussion is "in apparent incertitude, owing to conflicting opinions entertained by many courts of last resort in the United States, is certainly and lamentably true. But we think it may be confidently affirmed that this incertitude arises not from any disagreement as to the reason and right of the general rule, . . . but from a vacillating spirit which has striven to bend the rule to its application to the exigencies of particular cases."

Application of superior-servant doctrine.

The value of the decision in the RICKER CASE is increased by the fact that, in addition to determining the concrete question involved, the court discusses and passes upon its underlying principles. Counsel for the defense contended that in those states where the doctrine of responsibility of railroad companies for the negligence of their train dispatchers is upheld, the "superior-servant rule" obtains, and that, inasmuch as such rule does not obtain in New Jersey, railroad companies there could not be held liable for the negligence of their train dispatchers. This compelled the court to determine whether the recognition of the superior servant rule" is essential to the establishment of the liability of the railroad company; and, upon this subject, the court held that it is the nature of the peculiar duties of the train dispatcher that fixes his status, and not the superiority of his rank, and that, consequently, he represents the company, and is a vice principal, without regard to the existence or nonexistence of the "superior-servant rule."

This position of the court is strengthened by an examination of the above presentation of the authorities, which shows that not only has a train dispatcher been held to be a vice principal in many jurisdictions where the superior-servant doctrine does not prevail, but that, where the courts have discussed the grounds of their decisions, they have, as in the RICKER CASE, quite uniformly based their holding upon the nature of the train dispatcher's duties, and ignored the superior-servant doctrine. Aside from the cases which have ignored the superior-servant doctrine, in holding the train dispatcher to be a vice principal, the RICKER CASE finds direct support in Wallace v. Boston & M. R. Co. 72 N. H. 504, 57 Atl. 913, where the court said: "These decisions [upholding the vice-principalship doctrine] are generally put on the ground that the duty which the train dispatcher performs is the master's duty, not on the ground of the superiority of the dispatcher's rank or grade of service, or other doctrine peculiar to the jurisdiction and not recognized in this state."

However, it must be noted that some of the decisions are either silent as to the basis on which they rest, or are based upon the narrow ground of the superior-servant doctrine. See Palmer v. Utah & N. R. Co. 2 Idaho, 315, 13 Pac. 425, where the decision was based upon the ground that the train dispatcher, or station agent as he was called, was invested with a controlling or superior duty in the management of the railroad; and it is questionable whether the duties which he performed were such as would bring him within the rule as recognized in those jurisdictions where the nature of the train dispatcher's duties is the controlling element. This suggests the importance of determining the ground on which the decisions of a particular jurisdiction rest, as it affects the limits of the rule. As appears in the next subhead, the jurisdictions in which the superior-servant doctrine does not obtain hold the train dispatcher to be a vice principal only when he is performing acts relating to the peculiar duties of his position.

Liability dependent upon nature of negligent act of so-called train dispatcher.

The case of McHugh v. Manhattan R. Co. 179 N. Y. 378, 72 N. E. 312, was tried on the theory that the duties of the train dispatcher, involved in that case, were not necessary for the company to require information to be given to a central authority, who is empowered to direct the movements of all trains, his orders for that purpose amount to a new emergency schedule. We agree with the court of appeals in New York that the preparation of that schedule is a positive duty of the master. Hankins v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 142 N. Y. 416, 25 L.R.A. 396, 40 Am. St. Rep. 616, 37 N. E. 466. The work is not merely incidental, as was the duty of the brakeman to signal the oncoming train in Miller v. Central R. Co. 69 N. J. L. 413, 55 Atl. 245. What chiefly distinguishes the train despatcher's work in the present case is that by the company's rule it was made his duty to issue telegraphic orders for the movements of trains in the name of the superintendent, and to see that they were transmitted and recorded in the manner prescribed. This duty in the present case required him to issue orders to three different trains miles apart, and might sometimes require orders to many trains scattered along the company's whole line. Such work as that pertains to the master, the natural directing head. The train despatcher is not merely a superior servant, like the foreman of a gang of workmen. It is to be conceded, as we think it must be, that the duty to prepare a time-table is the company's duty. The duty is not discharged by preparing a time-table once for all, accompanied by rules regulating variations therefrom. The duty to exercise reasonable care is continusuch as would bring the case within the New York rule making a train despatcher a vice principal; and the opinion of the court of appeals contains language to the same effect. The action was brought under the employer's liability act on the theory that the train despatcher was "acting as superintendent," within the meaning of that act; and it was nowhere contended that he was a vice principal. In fact, the court, in its opinion, said: "It may be conceded that, apart from the provisions of the employer's liability act the defendant would not have been liable to its employees for the negligence" of Coleman, the train despatcher. The facts of this case show that the defendant was a New York city elevated railroad company, and that the train despatcher had charge of the Rector-street yard, and that the injury complained of was due to his negligence in starting the train before the decedent, who was engaged in coupling a car to the train, had reached a place of safety. It does not appear that he had anything to do with making up the train schedules, or had any control over the trains other than to signal them when it was time for them to leave the Rector-street station. While there is nothing in this case to militate against the general rule adhered to in New York, it is of value as showing the limits of the rule, and that it is dependent upon the nature of the acts of the employee, rather than upon his title of train despatcher.

That the rule will not be applied where the negligent servant, while called a train despatcher, was not at the time performing the essential duties of that office, is suggested by the decision in Jackson v. Missouri P. R. Co. 104 Mo. 448, 16 S. W. 413, where one of the grounds upon which the court defeated the plaintiff was, to use its own language: "It does not appear what the duties of this so-called train despatcher were. So far as we can see, he was nothing more than a station agent." In this case the injuries complained of were not due to a collision, but were suffered by the decedent while attempting to couple cars loaded with timber and iron rails which projected over the ends of the cars.

In Goodman v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 167 Pa. 332, 31 Atl. 670, the court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff, and held, against the defendant's objection, to the following instruction relating to the defendant's liability for the acts of the train master: "The evidence, as I remember it in this case, leaves it as a question of fact for you whether he was. If he was merely directing the movements of a train which was upon schedule time, he might be acting in the capacity of a conductor; and therefore, in that case, would be a coemployee, and the company would not be responsible for his act in that position, or his acts done in that capacity. But if, in putting the train upon the track in that place, he was assuming the duties of his office of train master of putting a train, an irregular train, upon the track, not upon schedule time, . . . then he was exercising the duties of his office as train master, and his acts were the acts of the company."

In Palmer v. Utah & N. R. Co. supra, where the decision was based upon the superior-servant doctrine, the court allowed a recovery where the negligent employee was a station agent exercising duties which were admitted to be the same as those of a train despatcher; but the negligence complained of consisted of failure to notify the conductor of the train on which the decedent was riding of the existence of a broken rail.

While the Missouri rule makes the train despatcher a vice principal (Smith v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 92 Mo. 359, 1 Am. St. Rep. 729, 4 S. W. 129), the court refused to apply the rule in Jackson v. Missouri P. R. Co. supra, on the ground that "it does not appear what the duties of this so-called train despatcher were."

Train despatcher acting in name of superintendent.

The fact that the train despatcher acted for and issued his orders in the name of

ous, and the need of a time-table to direct the movement of trains is constant. Upon the question whether this duty is a positive one resting on the master, we can see no distinction between this case and the case of Smith v. Erie R. Co. 67 N. J. L. 636, 59 L.R.A. 302, 52 Atl. 634. It is quite as much the master's duty to keep the time-table up to date as to keep the roadbed in repair. Both are equally essential to the servant's safety. The courts of fourteen of our sister states, and the Federal courts, including courts which rest the liability of the master upon the same ground as our own cases, have reached the same result. The cases have been recently diligently collected by Mr. Justice Chase, of New Hampshire, in Wallace v. Boston & M. R. Co. 72 N. H. 504, 57 Atl. 913. It would serve no useful purpose to repeat the citations. To them may be added the recent case of Santa Fé Pacific R. Co. v. Holmes, 202 U. S. 438, 50 L. ed. 1094, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 676. The courts of Maryland and Mississippi seem to stand alone in the other view, and their reasoning does not command itself to us. We do not rest our view upon the fact that the train despatcher is superior in rank to the fireman of a locomotive. We can conceive of cases where the company would not be responsible for his negligence. Perhaps Reiser v. Pennsylvania Co. 152 Pa. 38, 34 Am. St. Rep. 620, 25 Atl. 175, may be regarded as such a case. There it was held that the knowledge of the train despatcher that a station agent and telegraph operator, whose negligence caused the accident, was incompetent, did not make the company liable. We rest the defendant's liability in this case upon the character of the work of the train despatcher in regulating the movement of trains.

In order to determine whether there was sufficient evidence to justify a submission of the case to the jury, a rather full statement of the facts proved is necessary. Three trains are involved. No. 30 and No. 52 were south-bound trains, and by the rules of the company had the right of way. No. 31 was a north-bound train. According to the time-table, No. 52 should have reached the terminus at High Bridge at 9:40 A. M., ten minutes before the departure of No. 31, and No. 30 and No. 31 should have met at Hoffman's, 3.9 miles north of High Bridge. On the morning of the collision No. 52 was detained and considerably behind time. At 9:43 A. M., three minutes after No. 52 was due at High Bridge, the train despatcher issued an order directing 52 and 31 to meet at Hoffman's. This order reached the telegraph operator at Califon, 1½ miles north of Hoffman's, and he put out a signal to stop the south-bound train. In the meantime, No. 30 had passed No. 52, which was on a switch at Vernoy a little more than a mile north of Califon. By the rules of the company a train overtaking another train of the same or superior class, disabled so that it cannot move, will run around it, assuming the rights and taking the orders of the disabled train to the next telegraph office which is open, where it will report to the superintendent. The next telegraph office after No. 30 had passed No. 52 was Califon. At that point train No. 30 offered to stop, but the station agent and telegraph operator signaled to go ahead, and gave the train conductor a clearance card, which reads as follows: "I have no orders for your train. Signal is out for 52." It was then about 10:20 A. M. No. 30 was due at Califon at 10:01, and, being a south-bound train, had the right of way. At 9:43 the conductor of No. 31, then waiting at High Bridge, received the order directing him to meet No. 52 at Hoffman's. At that time, according to the time-table No. 30 should have been fifteen minutes north of Vernoy. The conductor of No. 31 asked the train despatcher if No. 30 was ahead of No. 52 and was assured that it was not. When No. 31 was ready to leave High Bridge, the conductor saw the order board red, which meant there were orders for him, and he started to the office to see what the trouble the superintendent does not affect his relation as a vice principal.

Thus, in Lasky v. Canadian Pacific R. Co. 83 Me. 461, 22 Atl. 367, the train despatcher used the name of the superintendent in issuing orders during the latter's absence, and the court, in holding the train despatcher to be a vice principal in so doing, said: "It appears that it was customary for the train despatcher thus to use the superintendent's name, and that the practice was acquiesced in by the superintendent and other officials connected with the road. An act done for the superintendent by his authority, either general or special, is his act."

And in Wallace v. Boston & M. R. Co. 72 L.R.A. (N.S.)

N. H. 504, 57 Atl. 913, the train despatcher, in giving the orders involved, acted by the authority and in the name of the superintendent.

And in Northern P. R. Co. v. Mix, 57 C. C. A. 592, 121 Fed. 476; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Camp, 13 C. C. A. 233, 31 U. S. App. 213, 65 Fed. 952; and Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Heck, 151 Ind. 292, 50 N. E. 988,—the train despatcher issued his orders in the name of the superintendent.

The assistant superintendent, to whose orders the trains are all subject, is a representative of the corporation; and this rule applies to all orders issued by his assistants in his name. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Mc-Lallen, 84 Ill. 109.

was, but as he got in sight of the office the yard master and the train despatcher both gave him the regular hand signal, the regular day signal, to go ahead, and he started with his train at 10:15 or 10:16. The road was a single track, and the result was a head-on collision 1 mile south of Califon at 10:28. The train despatcher had been inquiring about No. 52 of the telegraph operator at Califon for half or three quarters of an hour prior to the arrival of No. 30 at Califon, but is not shown to have made any inquiry as to No. 30. Under these circumstances, we think it was a question for the jury whether the train despatcher was negligent in allowing the time from 9:43 to 10:15 to elapse without any further orders, although he must be presumed to know from the time-table that No. 30 was due at Hoffman's at 10:10, five minutes before he ordered No. 31 out of High Bridge, and might have passed No. 52, which was then at least fifty minutes behind time, for it was due at Califon at 9:25. It is true the witnesses testified that No. 30 had no right to pass No. 52 at Vernoy, but they also said it frequently did pass. No. 30 was due at Califon at 10:01. We think it was a question for the jury whether the care necessary in directing the movements of trains upon a single-track road did not require new orders. The order of 9:43 A. M. was adapted to the conditions existing at the time, but not to the condition thirty-two minutes later. At the time No. 31 was ordered out of High Bridge it did not have full schedule time to make the meeting point at Hoffman's, and could not leave without special orders. The fact that a special order was necessary would naturally suggest to the train despatcher that the operator at Califon be notified that such order had been given to No. 31. To make a special order accomplish its purpose, it seems reasonable that it should be communicated to all trains likely to be affected, and not to one alone. Such was the course adopted with the order of 9:43 A. M. If the same course had been adopted with the order given No. 31 at 10:15 the accident might have been averted, for four or five minutes elapsed before No. 30 left Califon, a time long enough to enable notice to be sent to the operator at Califon. We think it was also a fair question whether the train despatcher was not negligent in ordering No. 31 to leave High Bridge at a time when No. 30, by the time-table, ought to have passed Hoffman's without making inquiry as to the whereabouts of No. 30, especially as No. 30 had the right of way. It may be said that the operator at Califon ought to have known that the order as to No. 52 was applicable to No. 30, since the 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

latter had passed No. 52, and ought to have reported No. 30's arrival before giving the clearance card. We incline to think he ought to have done so. It may also be said that the conductor of No. 30, before acting upon the clearance card, should have waited for the operator at Califon to report his arrival and receive further orders, although it is to be said in his defense that he may well have thought that such a report had been made, for his train could be seen for 300 or 400 yards before it reached Califon, and was running so slowly that the operator had time to make the clearance card after he saw the train coming. But, even if the operator at Califon and the conductor of No. 30 were negligent, the question would still remain whether, under all the circumstances of the case, the train despatcher exercised reasonable care in depending upon their accepting an order issued for No. 52, thirty-two minutes before, as an order still obligatory on No. 30. Ought it not to have occurred to him that they might possibly think, as they probably did think, that the order to No. 52 did not apply to No. 30, and that No. 31 would be held at High Bridge until No. 30 reached that point, especially as the train despatcher up to 10:15 is not shown to have made any inquiry as to No. 30, although her regular time for leaving Califon had passed? If the accident was caused by the negligence of the operator at Califon and of the conductor of train No. 30 co-operating with the negligence of the train despatcher, the defendant is nevertheless liable. Cole v. Warren Mfg. Co. 63 N. J. L. 626, 44 Atl. 647; Flanigan v. Guggenheim Smelting Co. 63 N. J. L. 647, 44 Atl. 762; Campbell v. T. A. Gillespie Co. 69 N. J. L. 279, 55 Atl. 276.

v.

WILLIAM E. DORON, Plff. in Err.

(215 Pa. 393, 64 Atl. 595.)

Curtesy—alien.

Same—title by purchase.

2. If an estate by the curtesy is an estate by purchase, it is covered by a provision of a statute permitting aliens to purchase and hold real estate.

(May 24, 1906.)

ERROR to the Court of Common Pleas for Bucks County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in a proceeding to establish an interest in certain real estate as tenant by the curtesy. Affirmed.

Elwood Doron died seised of certain real estate, leaving two children, William E. Doron and Catherine H. Doron, as tenants in common in fee. Catherine H. married Joseph C. Cooke, a nonresident alien. Upon the death of his wife he asserted an interest by the curtesy in her share of the estate of Elwood Doron, which was denied by her brother, and he brought this action to enforce his claim.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Howard I. James and Alexander Simpson, Jr., for appellant:

At common law an alien could not become tenant by the curtesy.

Rubeck v. Gardner, 7 Watts, 455; Reese v. Waters, 4 Watts & S. 145; Jackson v. Burns, 3 Binn. 75; Orr v. Hodgson, 4 Wheat. 453, 4 L. ed. 613; Phillips v. Moore, 100 U. S. 208, 25 L. ed. 603; 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 70; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 189; 1 Kerr, Real Prop. ¶¶ 813, 834.

A tenancy by the curtesy is neither by descent, devise, nor purchase, but by operation of law.

Whichcote v. Lyle, 28 Pa. 74; Reese v. Waters, supra; Shippen v. Izard, 1 Serg. & R. 222; Ro Bards v. Murphy, 64 Mo. App. 90; Crow v. Kightlinger, 25 Pa. 343; Lanerty by act or operation of law, as by descent, by curtesy, etc.; for the law, since it will be deemed to do nothing in vain, will not cast the descent upon one who cannot by law hold an estate. But the common-law doctrine as to the property rights of aliens has been greatly modified by statute, and in many of the states and territories resident aliens are placed practically upon the same footing as natural-born citizens, with reference to their rights to acquire, hold, and transmit real and personal property.

The only case, except COOKE v. DORON and the case of Reese v. Waters, 4 Watts & S. 145, referred to therein, which a search has discovered, dealing with the right of an alien to take an estate by curtesy under statutes removing his common-law disabilities, is Lumb v. Jenkins, 100 Mass. 527, in which the court held that a Massachusetts 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Hicks, 1 Binn. 1; Fallon, Conveyancing in Pennsylvania, p. 555; Summer v. Partridge, 2 Atk. 47.

Elkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question raised by this appeal is whether an alien husband is entitled as tenant by the curtesy to the real estate, or the interest therein, of which his wife died seised. At common law an alien cannot be tenant by the curtesy in this state. This rule is not questioned, and cannot be under the authority of our cases. Jackson v. Burns, 3 Binn. 75; Orr v. Hodgson, 4 Wheat. 453, 4 L. ed. 613; Rubeck v. Gardner, 7 Watts, 455; Reese v. Waters, 4 Watts & S. 145. The burden is therefore on an alien husband to point to the act or acts of assembly giving him the right to take such an estate in order to support his claim thereto. There are a number of statutes relating to the rights of aliens, but the act of February 23, 1791 (3 Smith's Laws, p. 4), is mainly relied on by the court below, and by the appellee here. It provides "that alien citizens shall be capable of acquiring or taking by devise or descent lands and other real property within this commonwealth in the same manner as citizens of this state may or can do."

The language of this act would seem to be broad enough to include a tenancy by the curtesy, but it is contended with much force that it has not been so construed, and that a different construction must have been placed upon it in Reese v. Waters, supra. It is true it was decided in that case that an alien husband acquired no title in his wife's real estate of inheritance as tenant by the curtesy initiate. It was there contended that the act of 1818, which allowed aliens to purchase real property subject to a limitation as to quantity, gave an alien husband the right to take as tenant by the curtesy. In the decision of that case it was held that the act of 1818 did not include such an estate because it was doubted whether the verb "to purchase" as used in the act could be considered equivalent to or synonymous with the words "to take by purchase." That case seems to have been ruled on this ground alone. The act of 1791 was not mentioned, and, so far as the record shows, was not considered. Whether it was deemed obsolete, not applicable, or immaterial, under the facts of that case, we have no means of ascertaining. It could scarcely have been regarded as obsolete because in Rubeck v. Gardner, 7 Watts, 455, decided in 1838, four years before Reese v. Waters, it was recognized as in force, but held inapplicable to the facts of that case on the ground that the heir or devisee of an alien could not take and enjoy a greater and more entire estate than the alien ancestor himself had. It is therefore a fair inference that the act of 1791 was either overlooked or considered inapplicable under the particular facts upon which the case of Reese v. Waters was decided. The fact is, however, that in no reported case has the word "descent," found in the act of 1791, been construed by this court as applied to a tenant by the curtesy. This act has not been repealed in express terms, nor by necessary implication, and does not contain any limitation as to time. It must therefore be considered in force and effect.

Counsel for appellant concedes this position, but contends that the word "descent" as used therein does not technically include a tenancy by the curtesy. In answer to this position, it may be said that all modes of acquiring title to real property may be reducible to title by descent and title by purchase. The first includes title by act or operation of law, the second title by act or agreement of the parties. 4 Kent, Com. p. 446; Pingrey, Real Prop. pp. 116, 118; 1 Boone, Real Prop. § 262. It is no doubt true that some estates are difficult to classify under these general divisions of title. It may also be conceded that an estate by the curtesy is one of these. However, it is clear, on principle, that a tenancy by the curtesy is more in the nature of an estate by descent than by purchase. The great weight of authority is to this effect. Titles by curtesy and in dower, arising by operation of law upon the death of the wife or husband as the case may be, seem to fall properly under the head of title by descent. 4 Kent, Com. p. 374. It devolves upon him (the husband) as the estate of an ancestor does upon an heir. 1 Washb. Real Prop. p. 343. An estate by curtesy occurs by mere operation of law upon the death of the wife, and for that reason partakes more of the character of an estate acquired by descent than purchase. 1 Kerr, Real Prop. 627. He (the husband) takes it by operation of law as by descent. 1 Tiffany, Real Prop. p. 501. It is an estate by descent, and has therefore been held to be subject to all the equities in respect to it as against his wife. Fallon, Conveyancing in Pennsylvania, p. 555. An estate by the curtesy consummate partakes more of the character of an estate acquired by descent than of one acquired by purchase. 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed, p. 517. These text writers are supported by some of our adjudicated cases. Mr. Justice Yeates, in Pemberton v. Hicks, 1 Binn. 1, said: "It is, however, settled that tenants by the curtesy and in dower come in by descent merely by act of law." To the same effect are the cases of other jurisdictions. Watson v. Watson, 13 Conn. 83; Witham v. Perkins, 2 Me. 400.

We have examined with care the able argument of counsel for appellant relating to this question, but have not been convinced that the word "descent" in the act of 1791 does not include an estate by the curtesy. We can see no reason why an estate which devolves upon the husband by operation of law at the death of his wife should not be regarded as taken by descent. The trend of our legislation has been to treat alien friends in these respects as citizens. The decision in Reese v. Waters was followed by the act of April 16, 1844 (P. L. 274); and, while we are not prepared to accept as final and conclusive the view of the court below, not without merit, that this act should be construed to be retrospective as to lands acquired by purchase and prospective as to lands taken by descent, it, however, does show that our legislature was blazing the way to the open-door policy in dealing with the right of aliens to acquire and hold real property. Our attention has not been called to any case decided by this court, nor have we been able to find any that expressly holds an estate by the curtesy is not one taken by descent. In Com. ex rel. Dickinson v. Detwiller, 131 Pa. 614, 7 L.R.A. 357, 360, 18 Atl. 990, 992, Mr. Justice Williams, in discussing the enabling statutes so far as they relate to aliens, said: "Even as to real estate, the distinction between a resident alien friend and a citizen has disappeared in Pennsylvania, and nearly every other state in the Union." The learned justice referred to the act of 1807, wherein it is provided generally that alien friends resident within our state may purchase lands, tenements, and hereditaments, and have and hold the same in fee simple or any lesser estate, as fully to all intents and purposes as the natural-born citizen may do. Counsel for appellant recognizes the force of the doctrine announced in that case, but insists that the general discussion relating to the right of aliens is obiter dicta. This may be conceded, but it is a judicial suggestion at least that courts will not be astute in the application of refined distinctions in support of a public policy, once considered wise, but now disavowed and almost forgotten in the broader humanity manifested in the reciprocal relations of states and nations governed by the Anglo-Saxon race. Cessante ratione, cessat ipsa lex. The tendency of our legislation has been to enable aliens to take, hold, and purchase real estate and other property in the same manner as other citizens. This is clearly indicated by the act of May 1, 1861 (P. L. 433), which provides that "aliens may hereafter purchase and hold real estate in this state, not exceeding in quantity 5,000 acres, nor in net annual income $20,000." The evident intention of this act was to enable aliens to purchase property within the limitations as to quantity and value named, and to hold property within the same limitations. The legislative meaning may be in doubt. It may be that the word "hold," as used in this act, only applies to property actually purchased. It is not necessary, however, to give it this restricted meaning, and we see no reason why it may not apply to any estate which an alien takes or holds from any source; that is to say, an estate by descent, by purchase, or in any other way, if, as contended, there is some other way to acquire title. The primary significance of the word "hold," as it relates to real property, is to enjoy and possess; and certainly an estate by the curtesy can be enjoyed and possessed by the tenant. If the word "descent," in the act of 1791, or the words "purchase" or "hold," in the act of 1861, include in either act an estate by the curtesy, the judgment of the court below must be affirmed. If it is an estate by descent, it is included in the act of 1791. If it is an estate by purchase, it is covered by the act of 1861. Then, again, if the word "hold," as used in the latter act, relates to any kind of title, as by descent, or purchase, or otherwise, the contention of appellant cannot prevail. In either view, the appellee is entitled as tenant by the curtesy to the enjoyment of the real estate of which his wife died seised. It requires a nicety of refinement, not convincing to the court, to hold that an estate by the curtesy does not come within the meaning of any of these provisions of our statutes. The common-law rule is harsh and unjust, without justification under existing governmental conditions, and manifestly at variance with the spirit of our institutions and the conscience of our people. Fortunately our statutes do not require its enforcement.

Judgment affirmed.

Case Note.—Implied exemption of state or municipal bonds: —There are few authorities upon the question whether or not state and municipal bonds are impliedly exempt from taxation. No decision can be found that, in hac verba, holds with STATE NATIONAL BANK v. MEMPHIS, that there is no implied exemption of such bonds, though the court, in Champaign County Bank v. Smith, 7 Ohio St. 42, fully set forth in the opinion above, makes use of language that would seem to preclude any other inference. In that case the court expressly held "that the power of the state to tax them equally with other property, having never been expressly surrendered, exists in full force," under a constitutional provision that laws shall be passed taxing "all moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stock," etc.

There is, however, considerable negative authority for this principle. Thus, in People v. Home Ins. Co. 29 Cal. 533, it was held that state bonds were not exempt from taxation under an act providing that "all property of every kind and nature whatever within the state shall be subject to taxation," with certain exceptions, in which such bonds were not included. This act classified personal property, for the purposes of taxation, in part as follows: "Chattels of every description;" "all money, at interest or loaned, whether secured by pledges, mortgage, or otherwise; all solvent debts exceeding what may be due from" the party taxed; "all capital stock of all corporations, companies, associations, firms, or individuals doing business or having an office in this state;" and "all other property, not real estate, which is not otherwise taxed." The court felt no doubt that the bonds in question were property which could be referred to some one or more of these classes.

Some further authority for this proposition may also be found in People ex rel. Manhattan F. Ins. Co. v. Tax & A. Comrs. 76 N. Y. 64, where certain bonds issued by the state of New York were held to be subject to taxation under a general description of property according to value, as provided by a law applicable to the whole state; but 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) it is to be noted that there was no contention in this case that the bonds were impliedly exempt. It is fair to infer, however, from the opinion of the court, that it would have considered such a contention of no moment.

So, too, in Com. v. Maury, 82 Va. 883, 1 S. E. 185, which upheld the constitutionality of a statute imposing a tax upon persons engaged in the business of selling coupons cut from state bonds, the court said, in reply to the contention that the state had no power to tax such coupons, that it made no difference that this power of taxation was not expressly reserved; "it need not be reserved; it exists always unless yielded up." This would seem to preclude the idea of implied exemptions.

And in State, Freese, Prosecutor, v. Woodruff, 37 N. J. L. 139, where it was held that bonds issued by a city under a special act to meet an unexpected contingency not provided for in the charter, without being exempted by the act, were not exempted by a clause in the charter providing that bonds authorized to be issued by the mayor and aldermen should be exempt from all taxes, the court said that clauses exempting from taxation were not favored in the law, and should always be strictly construed; and that the one in question was "entitled to no more force than the words plainly required."

On the other hand, the proposition enunciated by the Tennessee court in STATE NATIONAL BANK v. MEMPHIS does not seem to meet with the approval of the supreme court of Georgia, for in Augusta v. Dunbar, 50 Ga. 387, where the power of a city to tax state bonds was denied, the court thought the presumption very strong that the state had not, in the absence of express words so declaring, conferred on another taxing power the right to tax state securities, when to do so would be to confer a power upon a city, which the state should not be presumed to have reserved for itself, in the absence of a clear declaration of its intention.

So, in Miller v. Wilson, 60 Ga. 505, it was held that an act empowering and authorizing the governor and comptroller gen-serve cannot be raised upon a collateral attack upon the assessment.

Same—revision—appeal.

7. An appeal is not necessary to enable a board of equalization to revise a tax assessment under a statute providing that the board was created for the purpose of revising the assessment when returned by the tax assessor.

Mr. Charles T. Cates, Jr., Attorney General, for the State:

State bonds are not exempt from taxation.

eral to "assess and levy a tax upon the taxable property of the state" could not be construed to authorize a tax upon state bonds, in the absence of explicit language clearly expressing the will of the legislature to tax such bonds. The court was confirmed in this opinion by the fact that like words had been employed in former acts, and the executive department of the state had never construed them to embrace state bonds; nor was there any mention anywhere in the act of such bonds. The court said: "It is a grave question of public policy whether it should be done, conceding the power to do the thing to reside in the general assembly; and, when done, it should be done with much deliberation and in unmistakable language; and when the legislative mind, whose peculiar province it is to determine such a question of public interest, affecting, it may be, the public credit, shall have indicated it to be the policy of the state to tax her own securities, her pledges to pay so much principal at the expiration of a certain time to the holders of those securities with . . . interest."

And in Macon v. Jones, 67 Ga. 489, in which the last two cases were cited with approval, it was held that the grant of power in a city charter "to tax all property, real and personal, in the corporate limits of the city," would not be construed to include the taxing of its own bonds, in the absence of express authority for that purpose.

So, too, the Louisiana supreme court has explicitly affirmed that there is, of necessity, an implied exemption of state and municipal bonds from taxation, and has undoubtedly furnished the leading opinion upon that side of the question under consideration, in State ex rel. Da Ponte v. Board of Assessors, 35 La. Ann. 651, where the specific question decided was that the bonds

Exemptions from taxation are never allowed unless they are granted in clear and unmistakable words.

Neill, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the general revenue act of 1903, chap. 258, p. 632, of the acts of that year, the following section appears, viz.:

"Sec. 25. That the shares of stock of stockholders of any bank or banking association, savings bank, or loan company, or insurance company, or investment company, or cemetery company, or company or incorporation (other than such as are defined and assess-of the city of New Orleans were not subject to taxation by the state or by the city. The Constitutions of Louisiana for many years had provided that all property should be taxed, but gave the general assembly power to exempt certain specified kinds of property; and it had been repeatedly held by the supreme court of the state that this power of exemption was limited to the cases enumerated. Yet the court holds that such bonds were exempt from taxation. In this case great weight is placed upon the fact that this was the first time in the history of the state that an attempt had ever been made to subject municipal bonds to taxation; and that neither the legislative nor the executive department of the state had ever considered such bonds subjects of taxation, or had ever made any attempt to assess them for that purpose. The court thought that, if the assessors were permitted to list such bonds for taxation, it would be essentially a tax levied by the assessors, and not one levied by the legislative will or in pursuance of constitutional direction. To quote from the opinion: "Is it reasonable or possible to suppose that the framers of the Constitution of 1879, in directing 'all property' to be taxed, in terms exactly equivalent to those which had been used in two prior Constitutions, intended or expected that the language should have a broader meaning, or receive a different interpretation, from that which had been uniformly attached to like words in the latter? We think not. We are bound to assume that they knew that the legislative and executive departments of the state, under those precedent Constitutions, acting under their solemn oaths to obey them, had uniformly construed the mandate that 'all property shall be taxed' as not covering the public securities of the city and state; and able under §§ 22 and 23 of this act), doing business in this state, whether domestic or foreign, shall be assessed and taxed for state, county, and municipal purposes as the personal property of the stockholders, whether they reside within or without the state of Tennessee: Provided, however, the assessment of such shares of stock as the property of the stockholders shall be in lieu of any assessment or taxation of the capital stock or corporate property of such corporation, company, or association. Shares of stock assessable under this section shall be assessed at not less than the actual cash value of the same, less the assessed value of realty and tangible property, which said actual cash value of shares of stock shall be computed by looking to and considering the market value, the actual value of shares of stock, and from any other evidence of the value of the same. Real estate and tangible personalty of any corporation, company, or association, defined in this section, shall be assessed to the same, in the same mode and manner, and where situate, as other real estate and tangible personalty; but, in computing the assessable value of such shares of stock, the assessed value of the realty and tangible personalty and registered Tennessee state bonds owned for a period of not less than six months prior to the 10th day of January preceding, shall be deducted from the value of the shares of stock, and the remaining value constitute the value upon which the assessment shall be made. Assessments of shares of stock under this section shall be made at the place, ward, or district of the town or county in which the corporation, association, or company is located. . . ."

In obedience to the direction contained in the following language of the foregoing section, viz., "but, in computing the assessable value of such shares of stock, the assessed value of . . . registered Tennessee state bonds owned for a period of not less than six months prior to the 10th day of January preceding, shall be deducted from the value had always exempted them from taxation. Nor can we avoid the conclusion that, had they intended their own like command to subject such securities to taxation, they would have expressed such intention in special and unequivocal terms. It is obvious that no proposition could have been submitted to the convention which would have excited deeper agitation, or would have been more novel, momentous, and startling, than an open proposal to tax such securities. Yet we are asked to believe that, without in the slightest degree awakening public attention, and without a word of discussion, the convention has adopted such a measure under the equivocal guise of general provisions touching taxation, repeated substantially in the language of prior Constitutions under which they had never borne any such import. The demand is equally repugnant to common sense and to sound principles of interpretation." And Cooley on Taxation was quoted to the effect that "some things are always presumptively exempted from the operation of general tax laws because it is reasonable to suppose they were not within the intent of the legislature in adopting them. . . . It is always to be assumed that the general language of statutes is made use of with reference to taxable subjects. . . . The property of municipalities is not in any proper sense taxable. It is therefore, by clear implication, excluded. It is not, like government agencies, excluded from the power of tax laws, but it is beyond the grasp of their intent." The court further went on to say: "At all events, we do not hesitate to declare that our conviction that state and municipal bonds were not within the grasp of the legislative intent, in the general provisions of the laws relative to the taxation of property, is quite as fixed and certain as if they had been expressly excepted. . . . A bond of the city of New Orleans is negotiable, and imports consideration. It represents no intrinsic value except the consideration which passed to the city upon her promise to return a stipulated equivalent. When the value of that consideration passed from private ownership into that of the city, it ceased to be private and became public property; and, therefore, nontaxable. When the city shall return this value or its stipulated equivalent to private ownership, by payment of her bond, it will become again private and taxable property; but for the city to retain the value and at the same time to tax it through the holder of her bond is certainly shocking to justice and common sense. The same remark is equally applicable to the state, whose creature and agent the city is, and under whose authority and direction the bond was created and issued. . . . Taxation, thus doubtful in power, indefensible in morals, wanting in explicit legislative sanction, irrational in policy, and barren of results, because incapable of practical enforcement, needs a stronger title to judicial recognition than mere quibbling on the literal meaning of words which, by long use and interpretation, have acquired in their present connection a restricted import exclusive of that now sought to be attached to them by mere executive officers of the state."

And the principles of the foregoing case were approved and applied in State ex rel. Louisiana Improv. Co. v. Board of Assessors, 111 La. 982, 36 So. 91, where certificates issued to the relator by a city for contract work done for the city were held not to be subject to taxation by the city.

of the shares of stock, and the remaining value constitute the value upon which the assessment shall be made," the tax assessor for the city of Memphis deducted $250,000 as representing the value of such bonds, from the assessment of the shares of stock in the complainant bank; but the board of equalization corrected this action of the assessor by disregarding this deduction, and raising the assessment accordingly.

Thereupon, an agreement was entered into between the city and the bank whereby the latter was permitted to pay the taxes ($6,840.84) on the shares under protest. This agreement recites that a distress warrant was about to issue, and the taxes were paid in view of that fact; and the city agreed that it would not insist that such payment was voluntary.

The tax rate was fixed at $2.15 for the year covered by assessment in the ward in which complainant bank resides, and the present bill was filed to recover so much of the tax as was paid upon the state bonds.

Upon the allegations of the bill, the two principal questions raised by demurrer in the court below and debated here are the following:

On behalf of the complainant, it is insisted that state bonds are inherently exempt or nontaxable, on the theory that the state would not have the right to tax its own obligations in the hands of its creditors. But, aside from this contention, it is insisted by the complainant that the clause referred to does not create an exemption but only regulates the assessment of the property of banks.

On behalf of the defendant, it is insisted that the clause of the act directing a deduction of the amount of state bonds held for six months preceding the assessment was merely an attempt to create an exemption of this class of property, and was therefore unconstitutional and void.

Before considering either of these questions, it is deemed necessary to dispose of two preliminary questions. The first of these is that the money was paid voluntarily, and cannot therefore be recovered. We think this point is covered by the case of Bright v. Halloman, 7 Lea, 309, 312. In that case, it was held that the tax book was process equivalent to an execution in the hands of the officer, and payment under protest entitled the party to sue for so much as was deemed illegal; that this was true, although the taxes involved were county taxes, and no special provision was made for the payment of this class of taxes under protest under the act of 1873, carried into Shannon's Code as § 1059. Planters' Bank v. Memphis, 107 Tenn. 66, 68, 73, 74, 64 S. W. 13. It was also held in a prior case (Lea v. Memphis, 9 Baxt. 103) that, although taxes were voluntarily paid, yet, if they were illegal, the city might lawfully agree to refund them, and that her paper obligations therefor would be good. On the same principle, we are of opinion that the city, when about to distrain for taxes, may make an agreement with the party paying, that such payment is under protest; and it would do right to carry out the agreement in any subsequent litigation instituted concerning such payment. Agreements of this character save expensive and embarrassing injunction suits.

The next preliminary point is that the tax was the debt of the stockholders of the bank, and not of the bank itself; therefore that the suit could not be instituted by the bank, but only by the stockholders themselves. In respect to this point, we are of the opinion that, under a proper construction of § 25 of chapter 258 of page 652 of the acts of 1903, the bank itself might properly pay the taxes assessed against its stock in the hands of the stockholders. Indeed, it is probably its duty to do so; but we do not decide this point. We need not go into this matter at large. We refer to the last five paragraphs of the section. We are of opinion that, under the portions of the section last referred to, the bank would have the right, at least, to pay the taxes on the stock for its stockholders, and, if the payment was made under protest, it could sue for and recover such taxes if illegally collected. Of course its recovery would be for the benefit of its stockholders. Having disposed of these preliminary questions, we shall now direct our attention to the merits of the controversy.

We shall first consider whether there is an implied exemption of state bonds. Under the Constitution of 1834 it was held that there was an implied exemption of state property (Nashville v. Bank of Tennessee, 1 Swan, 269) on the principle that it could not be supposed that the state would do so idle a thing as to tax itself for its own benefit, or that it would take money out of its treasury to be returned immediately thereto, or that it would permit its subordinate political divisions to impose such a burden upon it. It was said that the presumption was against the existence of any such intention. This case was followed and applied under the Constitution of 1870, in respect to municipal property, in the case of Nashville v. Smith, 86 Tenn. 213, 6 S. W. 273, 88 Tenn. 464, 7 L.R.A. 469, 12 S. W. 924.

The same principle is recognized in other states. People v. Doe G. 1,034, 36 Cal. 220;

State v. Atkins, 35 Ga. 315, Fed. Cas. No. 5350; Rochester v. Rush, 15 Hun, 239; Cumru Twp. v. Directors of Poor; 1 Woodw. Dec. 175; Troutman v. May, 33 Pa. 455; McCaslin v. State, 99 Ind. 428; Camden v. Camden, 77 Me. 530, 1 Atl. 689; State, Newark, Prosecutor, v. Clinton Twp. 49 N. J. L. 370, 8 Atl. 296; Public School v. Trenton, 30 N. J. Eq. 667; Erie County v. Erie, 113 Pa. 360, 6 Atl. 136; Wayland v. Middlesex County, 4 Gray, 500; People ex rel. Wilson v. Salomon, 51 Ill. 52, 53; Schuykill County v. North Manheim Twp. 42 Pa. 21; Louisville v. Com. 4 Met. (Ky.) 63; Edwards & W. Constr. Co. v. Jasper County, 117 Iowa, 365, 372, 94 Am. St. Rep. 301, 90 N. W. 1006; and authorities cited in note to Board of Comrs. v. Ottawa (Kan.) 33 Am. St. Rep. 400-406.

In Miller v. Wilson, 60 Ga. 506, the principle was applied to state bonds to the extent of holding that it will not be presumed that the legislature intended to tax such bonds merely from a direction that "taxable property" should be assessed, and that the court would not consider the question of the taxability of state bonds as raised in the absence of a provision in a statute expressly directing their taxation. In Macon v. Jones, 67 Ga. 489, the same doctrine was applied to city bonds. To the same general effect, Augusta v. Dunbar, 50 Ga. 387.

In Louisiana (State ex rel. Da Ponte v. Board of Assessors), 35 La. Ann. 654 the same rule was applied to state and city bonds. That case also went further, and held that such bonds were absolutely exempt, on substantially the same grounds that support an implied exemption of public property.

We are also referred to State v. Stonewall Ins. Co. 89 Ala. 335, 7 So. 753, as sustaining the same view, but that case is hardly an authority for the proposition, since it appears therein that the legislature had power, under the Constitution of the state, to grant such an exemption,—that is, one of state bonds,—and it had done so.

On the other hand, there are numerous authorities which hold that state, county, and municipal bonds are taxable. Champaign County Bank v. Smith, 7 Ohio St. 42; People v. Home Ins. Co. 29 Cal. 533, 538; Com. v. Maury, 82 Va. 883, 1 S. E. 185; Hall v. Middlesex County, 92 Mass. 100; Com. v. Philadelphia, 27 Pa. 497; Wilkes-Barre Deposit & Sav. Bank v. Wilkes-Barre, 148 Pa. 601, 24 Atl. 111; State, Freese, Prosecutor, v. Woodruff, 37 N. J. L. 139; People ex rel. Niagara F. Ins. Co. v. Tax & A. Comrs. 76 N. Y. 64. And see State ex rel. O'Brian v. Keokuk & W. R. Co. 153 Mo. 157, 77 Am. St. Rep. 704, 54 S. W. 559. The leading case is Champaign County Bank v. Smith, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

supra. In that case the court said: "Admitting, as we do, that a state may, by the express terms of her contract, limit to some extent the future exercise of her sovereignty; and that she may, from consideration of policy, or interest, bind herself not to exercise the taxing power over a specified subject-matter, or to exercise this power only in a specified mode; and that the power so to bind herself results from and can only be exercised in virtue of her sovereignty,—yet it is very clear that the simple contract of borrowing money has no relation to her sovereign character or power, and leaves them wholly unimpaired. By such a contract, it is true, a state and an individual are equally bound. The state of Ohio cannot, by virtue of her sovereignty, cancel or modify a contract to which she is a party; not because it is her contract, but because it is a contract. The lawful contracts of her humblest citizens are equally sacred. She cannot constitutionally impair the obligations of either. One man invests capital in state stocks, as a source of income and profit to himself. From the same motives of interest, other capital is invested in the bonds of a private corporation, or the notes of individuals. These investments are equally taxed, as property; as sources of profit and income. The consequence is that the profit is diminished in both cases. This is an effect, but not the object of the law imposing the taxation. It contemplates no such purpose. As between the parties, the contract is left in full force; but the property invested or acquired by the contract is taxed, not by way of interference with the rights of the parties as borrower or lender, but for the support of government and the consequent protection and welfare of the whole community. . . . The principle that, in the absence of any stipulation to the contrary, a sovereign state possesses the power of taxing all property held under it and within its jurisdiction is fundamental and essential to the very being of government. Property can only be acquired and held subject to this condition; and this infirmity of tenure, if it be one, furnishes the only adequate means for its protection. We readily concede that the state cannot affect the obligations of a contract to which she is a party, further or otherwise than in the case of a contract between other parties. But the claim here is that the state shall confer a bonus on her bondholders; for an exemption of moneys invested in her bonds from the burden of taxation, common to all other property within the state, would be a substantial and valuable bonus. In the absence of any such express stipulation in the contract, I do not perceive an equitable foundation upon which to rest a claim to an exclusive privilege, so directly interfering with the sovereign power of the state."

The argument that a decision holding the bonds taxable will decrease their value we do not think entitled to much weight, since the same is true of all property. It is, without doubt, true that the states of the Union would be able to realize much higher prices for the land they have to sell, or grant away, if any exemption from taxation accompanied such grants; yet it has never been supposed that this was a good reason for implying such exemption. On the contrary, it is held that such lands become taxable immediately upon their passing into the hands of the vendees or grantees of the state. Robertson v. State Land Office, 44 Mich. 274, 6 N. W. 659; State ex rel. Johnson v. Purcel, 31 Ohio St. 352; Townsen v. Wilson, 9 Pa. 270; Oswalt v. Hallowell, 15 Kan. 154. And the same is true, even when public lands are leased; the leaseholders are taxable. State ex rel. Sioux County v. Tucker, 38 Neb. 56, 56 N. W. 718; State, Morris Canal & Bkg. Co. Prosecutor, v. Haight, 36 N. J. L. 471. And so of a mining privilege obtained from a state. State v. Moore, 12 Cal. 56.

We shall next dispose of defendant's contention that the clause of the act in question directing a deduction of Tennessee state bonds is but an attempt to create an express exemption of this class of property, and is therefore unconstitutional and void. Such, we think, was the purpose of the clause, and on this ground it must be held void. It violates the clause of the Constitution that "all property . . . shall be taxed," and the clause that "taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the state." Const. art. 2, § 28. The section referred to contains a provision that the legislature may exempt certain kinds of property, and shall exempt certain other kinds. Under the first division, we find "such [property] as may be held by the state, by counties, cities, or towns, and used exclusively for public or corporation purposes, and such as may be held and used for purposes purely religious, charitable; scientific, literary, or educational;" and, under the second, "$1,000 worth of personal property in the hands of each taxpayer, and the direct product of the soil in the hands of the producer and his immediate vendee." This section expresses the whole mind of the people of the state in convention assembled, in respect to the properties subject to taxation, and the extent of the power of the legislature to create exemptions therefrom. Its force cannot be dissipated by construction. Similar provisions in other state Constitutions have been given a strict construction in support of the taxing power.

In Arkansas it has been held that a constitutional provision that all real property shall be subject to taxation, saving certain excepted kinds therein enumerated, amounts to an inhibition on the legislature's exemption of other real property. Fletcher v. Oliver, 25 Ark. 289. The Constitution of North Carolina (art. 5, § 3) provides that "all property shall be uniformly taxed." Section 5 provides that the legislature may exempt property held for certain purposes. The supreme court of that state, construing these provisions, held that the legislature could exempt only the property specified in § 5. Charlotte Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Mecklenburg County, 115 N. C. 410, 20 S. E. 526. And in People v. Eddy, 43 Cal. 331, 13 Am. Rep. 143, it was held that, while it was within the power of the legislature, and it was its duty, to prescribe the mode in which all property should be assessed, it could not, under the guise of regulating the duty of assessors, exempt property from taxation which the Constitution required to be taxed. And, prior to the case in 35 La. Ann. (State ex rel. Da Ponte v. Board of Assessors, p. 651), such was the rule laid down in Louisiana. Morrison v. Larkin, 26 La. Ann. 699; Lefranc v. New Orleans, 27 La. Ann. 188; New Orleans v. Bank of Lafayette, 27 La. Ann. 376; New Orleans v. People's Ins. Co. 27 La. Ann. 519; New Orleans v. New Orleans Waterworks Co. 36 La. Ann. 432. And that jurisdiction seems to have returned to the former doctrine in First Nat. Bank v. Board of Reviewers, 41 La. Ann. 188, 5 So. 408, wherein it is said: "Reduced to its last analysis, the contention is that a large part of the value of the shares belonging to the individual shareholders is exempt from taxation. . . . We read in the Constitution the unequivocal mandates: (1) That 'all property shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as directed by law;' (2) that 'the following property shall be exempt, and no other.' Bank shares are property. They are subject to taxation, and in this statute the legislature has affirmatively exercised the power of taxing them."

The case of Murray v. Charleston, 96 U. S. 432, 24 L. ed. 760, has been referred to as an authority against the power of taxation of securities by a state or political division thereof which had issued such securities. In that case it appeared the city of Charleston had issued securities bearing 6 per cent interest, and directed the officer of the city whose duty it was to pay the interest to deduct the amount of the tax from the interest, and pay over to the holder of the debt only the difference. It was held that this could not be done without a violation of the contract: that a contract to pay 6 per cent could not be complied with by the payment of 4 per cent, or any sum less than the sum fixed by the contract. It was not denied that the money so paid would be liable to taxation after it had reached the hands of the holder of the security, if he were a resident of the state; or that the obligations of a state might be taxed by a state. Our conclusion is that state bonds are not exempt from taxation.

But it is said there is no provision in the act of 1903 which would justify an assessment of the shares of stock in any other way than by making a deduction of state bonds. This is a mistaken view. After striking out the unconstitutional clause, the residue of § 25 contains ample provisions for assessing shares of stock in banks and other associations and corporations therein mentioned.

It is next insisted that chap. 366, § 3, p. 100, Acts 1903, is void because it purports to amend chapter 11, p. 15, Acts 1879, upon the subject of assessment for taxes; whereas there is nothing in the latter act upon the matter of assessment at all. We do not think there is any merit in this point. Section 9 of the act not only contains some provisions upon the subject, but that section is amended by chapter 84, p. 98, Acts 1879, upon the subject of assessments; and, by virtue of the amendment, the latter act became incorporated into the former; therefore it was not improper that the act of 1903 should purport to amend chapter 11, p. 15, without making special reference to chapter 84.

It is insisted that the action of the board of equalization was void, because one of their number was a nonfreeholder; whereas the act requires that the board shall be composed of freeholders. Such a question cannot be made in a collateral attack, as the present is, upon the action of the board.

Finally, it is insisted that the action of the board was void, because that body did not act upon any appeal prosecuted by complainants to it; that complainants were content with the action of the assessor in excluding the Tennessee bonds, but the board assumed, itself, to raise the assessment by disregarding such exclusion, and taking into consideration the Tennessee bonds in estimating the value of the shares of stock. We do not think there is any force in this position. The board was created according to the terms of the act, "for the purpose of revising the assessment when returned by such tax assessor." Their duty, as the name indicates, is to equalize the assessments, and in so doing they may make either additions or reductions. While they may entertain appeals of taxpayers, as indicated by the act, from the assessment made by the tax assessor, their jurisdiction is not dependent on these appeals. It is necessary to the proper performance of their duties that they should have a general view of all the assessments, and be able to act upon all as their judgment and conscience may dictate, to the end that all may be equalized, as far as possible.

Our conclusion is that the chancellor acted correctly in sustaining the demurrer to the bill, and his decree must be affirmed, with costs.

Case Note.—Power of legislature to provide for indictment in county or district other than where crime alleged to have been committed:—That, in the absence of any limitation by constitutional provision, the power of a state legislature to fix the venue of criminal prosecutions in a county or district other than that in which the crime was committed is unrestricted, seems to be generally recognized. See State v. Sweetsir, 53 Me. 438, in which a statute providing that an indictment for polygamy may be found and tried in the county where the offender resides, or where he is apprehended, was held valid, the court saying that such statute was not to be taken as in derogation of the common-law right of indictment and trial in the county where the offense is committed, but rather as an enlargement of the jurisdiction of the court; Steerman v. State, 10 Mo. 503, in which a statute authorizing an indictment for any offense committed within the state, on board of any vessel in the course of any voyage or trip in any county through which, or any part of which, such a vessel should be navigated in the course of the same voyage or trip, or where such voyage or trip should terminate, was sustained, the court saying that it was competent for the legislature to change, modify, or alter the common-law principle that the venue must be proved as laid; Dodge v. People, 4 Neb. 220, in which a munity from criminal prosecution except by indictment does not prevent the legislature from permitting the grand jury of one county to indict for crimes committed in an adjoining county, since, although indictment requires a grand jury, venue is not an essential element of it.

4. An indictment for conspiracy to break a jail for the purpose of lynching a prisoner is not defective for alleging conspiracy with others without naming them, or stating that they are to the jurors unknown, unless the statute requires such facts to be stated.

statute authorizing the judge of any judicial district court to designate the county in his district wherein a felony committed within any unorganized county or territory attached to the district for judicial or other purposes may be inquired into by the grand jury, and, in case an indictment is found, the person or persons so indicted tried, subject to the right of the person indicted to apply for change of venue, was held valid, the court recognizing the fact that the common-law rule that offenses could be inquired into, as well as tried, only in the county where they were committed, was not absolute, but subject to such exceptions as the legislature might establish; Ham v. State, 4 Tex. App. 645, in which a statute providing that an indictment against the forger of a land title might be found either by the grand jury of a certain county or any county in which the offense was committed, or in the county where the land lies about which the offense was committed, was held valid, the court holding that, where not restricted by the Constitution, questions of venue and jurisdiction are subjects of legislative control.

It is well settled that the provisions of the Federal Constitution (art. 3, § 2, and 6th Amend.), requiring criminal trials to take place in the state and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, apply only to prosecutions in Federal courts. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Alabama, 128 U. S. 96, 32 L. ed. 352, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 28; Ex parte Pritchard, 43 Fed. 915; State v. Caldwell, 115 N. C. 794, 20 S. E. 523; Cox v. State, 8 Tex. App. 254, 34 Am. The question, then, resolves itself, as in the case in hand, into one of construction of the various constitutional provisions relating more or less directly to the venue of criminal prosecutions; and the grouping of

Statement by Clark, Ch. J.:

The defendant was indicted in the following bill:

North Carolina—Union County.

Superior Court, July Special Term, 1906.

The jurors for the state upon their oath present: That Zeke Lewis and others, late of the county of Anson, on the 28th day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and six, with force and arms, at and in the county aforesaid, unlawfully, wickedly, wilfully, and feloniously did conspire together to break and enter the common jail of Anson county, the place of confinement of prisoners charged with crime, for the purpose of lynching, injuring, and killing one John V. Johnson, a prisoner confined in said jail, charged with the crime of murder, against the form of the statute the following cases, therefore, is primarily with reference to the form of constitutional provision, rather than the character of the statute involved.

A conclusion different from that of the court in STATE v. LEWIS, as to the effect of a constitutional provision "that no person shall, for a felony, be proceeded against criminally, otherwise than by indictment," was reached in Ex parte Slater, 72 Mo. 102, in which the court held that the word "indictment," as used in the constitutional provision above quoted, must be accepted and understood as having been inserted in the Constitution with the meaning attached to it at common law; that at common law an indictment signified an accusation by the oaths of grand jurors of the same county wherein the offense was committed, and that, therefore, the foregoing provision guarantees to every person the right to be exempt from criminal prosecution for a felony, except upon an accusation or indictment preferred by a grand jury of the county where the offense was committed; and it was accordingly held that a statute providing that, where a judge of a circuit court is satisfied, where the grand jury of a county has failed to find an indictment, that an impartial grand jury cannot be had in the county where the offense was committed, he shall order examination of the offense to be had in some adjacent county, was unconstitutional.

The correctness of the foregoing decision was reaffirmed in State v. McGraw, 87 Mo. 161, which holds a statute authorizing an indictment for burglary in another county than that where the burglary took place to be unconstitutional; State v. Hatch, 91 Mo. 568, 4 S. W. 502, in which a statute providing for an indictment for embezzlement in a county other than where the offense was committed was held invalid; State v. Smiley, 98 Mo. 605, 12 S. W. 247, which holds a statute providing that an indict-in such case made, and against the peace and dignity of the state. And the jurors for the state, upon their oaths aforesaid, do further present: That the said Zeke Lewis afterwards, to wit, on the day and year aforesaid, with force and arms, at and in the county aforesaid, unlawfully, wilfully, and feloniously did engage in breaking and entering the common jail of Anson county, the place of confinement of prisoners charged with crime, with intent to injure, lynch, and kill one John V. Johnson, a prisoner confined in said jail, charged with the crime of murder, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state. And the jurors for the state, upon their oaths aforesaid, do further present: That the said Zeke Lewis afterwards, to wit, on the day and year aforesaid, with force and arms, at and in the county aforesaid, unlawfully, wilfully, wickedly, and feloniously did injure, lynch, and kill one John V. Johnson, a prisoner confined in the common jail of Anson county, charged with the crime of murder, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state.

Robinson, Solicitor.

The defendant moved to quash the bill "for the reason that it appears upon the face of the bill that the offenses charged were committed, if at all, in Anson county, and there is no warrant or authority of law for finding the indictment or trying him in Union county;" and also to quash the first count in the bill because it charges that "the defendant conspired with others," without naming or charging, "and others to the jurors unknown." Both motions were ment for bigamy may be found in the county where the second or subsequent marriage or cohabitation shall have taken place, or in the county in which the offender may be apprehended, is invalid; and Re McDonald, 19 Mo. App. 370, in which a statute authorizing the finding of an indictment in either of two counties, for offenses committed on the boundary, or within 500 yards thereof, was held invalid.

It was also followed in State v. Anderson, 191 Mo. 134, 90 S. W. 95, in which a statute providing that an indictment for any offense committed on board of any vessel, or in any railroad car, may be found in any county through which, or a part of which, such vessel or railroad car shall be navigated or run in the course of the same voyage or trip, or in the county where such voyage or trip shall terminate, was held to contravene a constitutional provision that "no person shall be prosecuted criminally for felony or misdemeanor, otherwise than by indictment or information, which shall be concurrent remedies;" and that, therefore, a proceeding by information under such statute, in a county other than that where the offense was committed, was illegal.

On the other hand, in Mischer v. State, 41 Tex. Crim. Rep. 212, 96 Am. St. Rep. 780, 53 S. W. 627, a statute providing that prosecutions for rape may be commenced and carried on in the county in which the offense is committed, or in any county of the judicial district in which the offense is committed, or in any county of the judicial district the judge of which resides nearest the county seat of the county in which the offense is committed, was held not to contravene a constitutional guaranty that "no person shall be held to answer for a criminal offense unless on indictment of a grand jury." The court said: "If it could be shown, under § 10, that an indictment by a grand jury meant only a grand jury of the county where the offense was committed, then to deprive a defendant of that right (that is, to authorize him to be indicted by the grand jury in some other county) would not be due course of law. But we seek in vain in the Constitution or elsewhere for such a limitation. In England, where the grand jury system had its birth, a grand jury was drawn from the vicinage where the offense was committed. Indeed, as originally constituted, the jury that tried an offender was composed of the witnesses against him. But, if it be conceded that such was the rule at common law, we have the common law in force here only by adoption; and in the absence of statutory enactment, if we have no constitutional inhibition, our statutes must control in this matter as in every other; and, there being no constitutional inhibition, as we have seen, the legislative declaration on this subject is the supreme law."

A constitutional guaranty that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the county in which the crime shall have been committed was held in Walls v. State, 32 Ark. 565, to render a statute providing for indictment and prosecution for the crime of bigamy in any county in which the person accused might be apprehended, as if the offense had been committed therein, invalid; in Dempsey v. State, 94 Ga. 766, 22 S. E. 57, to invalidate a statute conferring jurisdiction on the courts of a county where the offender resides, to try cases arising under it, so far as it is applicable to cases in which it affirmatively appears that the offense was committed in some county other than that of the residence of the accused; and in Craig v. State, 3 Heisk. 227, to render invalid a statute conferring jurisdiction as to offenses committed within the state, or within 5 miles of the line thereof, on board a boat or vessel engaged in navigating the waters of the state, upon the courts of any allowed, and the state excepted and appealed.

Messrs. Walter Clark, Jr., and R. B. Redwine, with Mr. Robert D. Gilmer, Attorney General, for appellant.

Messrs. J. A. Lockhart, H. H. McLendon, and W. J. Coxe for appellee.

Clark, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The first statute passed in this state in regard to lynching was chapter 461, p. 441, Laws 1893. Each provision in that act county through which the boat or vessel is navigated in the course of such voyage, or where such voyage shall terminate.

A statute conferring on either county jurisdiction over offenses committed within a specified distance of the boundary was held, in Dougan v. State, 30 Ark. 41, and State v. Lowe, 21 W. Va. 782, 45 Am. Rep. 570, to contravene the constitutional provision that trials of crimes and misdemeanors shall be in the county in which the alleged offense was committed; the word "county" being taken in its narrower meaning, and as not equivalent in this respect to vicinage.

And in State v. Montgomery, 115 La. 155, 38 So. 949, a statute authorizing the trial of an offense in the court of a parish on whose boundary line, or within 100 yards of whose boundary line, it was committed, was held to be in conflict with a constitutional provision that all trials shall take place in the parish where the offense was committed.

But in Welty v. Ward, 164 Ind. 457, 73 N. E. 889, such a constitutional provision was held not to confer upon a person charged with a felony any constitutional right to be tried only upon an indictment returned by a grand jury of the county in which the offense was committed.

But, where the Constitution guarantees a trial by a jury of the county or district wherein the offense shall have been committed, it is generally regarded as not so closely restricting the legislative power to regulate the venue of criminal prosecutions. Thus, in State v. McDonald, 109 Wis. 506, 85 N. W. 502, it was held that a statute providing that counties on the shores of a certain bay shall have jurisdiction in common of all offenses committed on that part of such bay which lies within the limits of the state was not unconstitutional; the word "district" being taken as having a different meaning from the word "county."

And in Re Holcomb, 21 Kan. 628, a statute providing for the prosecution of offenses committed in unorganized territory, in the organized county to which such territory might be attached, was held not to contravene the constitutional provision above stated, in view of another constitutional provision authorizing the attaching of new or unorganized counties to a judicial district.

has been brought forward and incorporated, with very slight verbal changes under appropriate heads in Revisal 1905. Section 1 of said act, defining lynching and imposing the penalty, is now Revisal 1905, § 3698, and is in the chapter on "Crimes," under the subhead "Public Justice," and is as follows:

"3698. Lynching. If any person shall conspire to break or enter any jail or other place of confinement of prisoners charged with crime or under sentence, for the purpose of killing or otherwise injuring any prisoner confined therein; or if any person

315 (Affirmed in 9 Wall. 35, 19 L. ed. 573), such a constitutional provision was held not to be contravened by a statute authorizing the changing of the place of holding court to another county within the same judicial district.

As to the effect the employment of the phrase "or district," in the constitutional provision for trial in the county or district where the crime shall have been committed, may have upon the validity of a statute authorizing the prosecution of crimes committed beyond, but within a certain distance of, the boundary of the county, there is some difference of opinion.

In Grogan v. State, 44 Ala. 9, where the constitutional guaranty was relative to prosecutions by indictment, an objection to the constitutionality of such a statute was not sustained, the case not being one of a prosecution by indictment, although the offense was committed in another county than the one in which the defendant was prosecuted.

The effect of this decision seems to have been mistaken in Jackson v. State, 90 Ala. 590, 8 So. 862, in which the statute in question was sustained upon the authority thereof, in a case where an indictment was found for murder committed outside of, but near, the boundary of the county in which the indictment was found; the court declining to pass upon the soundness of the alleged decision in Grogan v. State as an original proposition.

In State v. Robinson, 14 Minn. 447, Gil. 333, such a statute was held not to be in violation of the constitutional provision above stated; the court saying that, the jury being taken from the body of the county within its territorial limits, the right guaranteed by the Constitution was substantially secured.

In State ex rel. Brown v. Stewart, 60 Wis. 587, 50 Am. Rep. 388, 19 N. W. 429, the validity of such a statute was upheld on the ground that the words "or district," as used in the Constitution, were intended and understood to mean something different from the word "county" as therein used, and might be taken as referring to a criminal district extending beyond the territorial limits of the county to the extent provided by such statute.

On the other hand, in Buckrice v. People, shall engage in breaking or entering any such jail or other place of confinement of such prisoners with intent to kill or injure any prisoners,—he shall be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction, or upon a plea of guilty, shall be fined not less than $500, and imprisoned in the state's prison or the county jail not less than two, nor more than fifteen, years." Laws 1893, chap. 461, § 1, p. 440.

Section 2 is now Revisal 1905, § 3200, and provides that the solicitor shall prosecute and have the prisoners bound over to the superior court of an adjoining county. Sec-

110 Ill. 29, the use of the term "county" seems to have been regarded as overriding any broader meaning which might be attached to the term "district," and the statute in question was held unconstitutional,—at least as to offenses committed more than an inappreciable distance from the county line, the court arguing that, if the jurisdiction of a county over offenses outside its boundary may be extended at all, it may be extended for any distance, and the defendant thus be deprived of his constitutional rights.

In Armstrong v. State, 1 Coldw. 338, it was held that the validity of the statute could not be predicated upon the use of the word "district" in the Constitution, the word having been carried into the existing Constitution from the preceding one, in which it had reference to a state of affairs which existed under a former judicial system when there was only one court for several counties.

Where, instead of guaranteeing the right of trial in the county or district in which the offense was committed, the Constitution provides for such trial in the county or district in which the offense is alleged to have been committed, the question is somewhat varied. In Watt v. People, 126 Ill. 9, 1 L.R.A. 403, 18 N. E. 340, it was held that a statute which provided that, where an offense was committed on a railroad car rapidly moving through different counties, so that it is difficult or impossible to determine with any degree of certainty in which county it was committed, an indictment may charge the offense in any county passed through near the time of the commission of the offense, did not conflict with such a constitutional provision, since such constitutional right is with respect to the place alleged as the locus of the crime, and not the place in which the crime was actually committed.

That constitutional provisions of the kind hereinbefore discussed are available only to free citizens, and not to convicts, is held in Ruffin v. Com. 21 Gratt. 790, in which a statute conferring upon the court of a certain place jurisdiction to try offenses committed by convicts in the state penitentiary, irrespective of whether such offenses are committed within the territorial limits tion 3 is as to witnesses testifying, and is Revisal 1905, § 3699. Section 4 of the said act of 1893 is Revisal 1905, § 3233, in the chapter on "Criminal Proceedings," subhead "Venue" and reads:

"XI. Venue. 3233. Lynching. The superior court of any county which adjoins the county in which the crime of lynching shall be committed shall have full and complete jurisdiction over the crime and the offender, to the same extent as if the crime had been committed in the bounds of such adjoining county; and, whenever the solicitor of the district has information of the commission of the jurisdiction of such court, was held not to conflict with a constitutional right to trial by a jury of the vicinage.

In passing, it may be stated that statutes providing that, where a crime commenced in the state is consummated outside of the state, the jurisdiction is in the county in which the offense was commenced (Green v. State, 66 Ala. 40, 41 Am. Rep. 744); or authorizing criminal prosecutions in either of two counties in which an offense is partly committed (Archer v. State, 106 Ind. 426, 7 N. E. 225); or providing that a prosecution for homicide may be instituted either in the county where the wound is inflicted, or where the person dies (Smith v. State, 42 Fla. 605, 28 So. 758; Com. v. Jones, 118 Ky. 889, 82 S. W. 643; Hargis v. Parker, 27 Ky. L. Rep. 441, 69 L.R.A. 270, 85 S. W. 704; State v. Pauley, 12 Wis. 538); or authorizing prosecution in the jurisdiction where the blow was struck which caused the death (Stout v. State, 76 Md. 317, 25 Atl. 299); or providing for indictment in the county where the death occurs (Com. v. Parker, 2 Pick. 550; Com. v. Macloon, 101 Mass. 1, 100 Am. Dec. 89; Tyler v. People, 8 Mich. 320; Ex parte McNeely, 36 W. Va. 84, 15 L.R.A. 226, 32 Am. St. Rep. 831, 14 S. E. 436); or authorizing the prosecution of a thief in any county into which he may carry the stolen property (State v. Johnson, 38 Ark. 568; State v. Price, 55 Kan. 606, 40 Pac. 1000); or authorizing prosecution for pollution of a river in any county whose inhabitants are aggrieved thereby (American Strawboard Co. v. State, 70 Ohio St. 140, 71 N. E. 284).—are generally regarded as not in conflict with the various constitutional provisions hereinbefore noted, upon the theory that an offense may be considered as having been committed in any jurisdiction in which an element of such offense occurs.

The question of the constitutionality of statutes providing for a change of venue after indictment found, to counties or districts other than where the offense was committed, while involving the interpretation of the constitutional provisions hereinbefore discussed, does not fall within the scope of this note, and is reserved for future annotation.

of such a crime, it shall be his duty to furnish such information to the grand juries of all adjoining counties to the one in which the crime was committed from time to time until the offenders are brought to justice." Laws 1893, chap. 461, § 4, p. 440.

Section 5, as to witnesses answering questions, is made Revisal 1905, §§ 1638, 3201. Sections 6 and 7 are the same as Revisal 1905, §§ 1288, 2825. The whole of chapter 461, p. 440, Laws 1893, is thus in the Revisal, and its force and effect is not impaired by the fact that it has been split up, and its different sections placed under appropriate heads. It seems to us that the above provisions fully define the offense intended to be repressed, and designate the punishment and procedure. There are many offenses in this chapter on "Crimes" which, though not common-law offenses, are not defined save by using the term of common knowledge, as "abandonment," "lynching," etc. It is not necessary to prescribe that an act is a misdemeanor or felony; the punishment affixed determines that. Revisal 1905, § 3291; State v. Fesperman, 108 N. C. 772, 13 S. E. 14.

It was error to quash the bill on the ground that the offense was not committed in Union county, which is an adjoining county to Anson. Owing to the prejudice or sympathy which in cases of lynching usually and naturally pervades the county where that offense is committed, the general assembly, upon grounds of public policy, deemed it wise to transfer the investigation of the charge to the grand jury of an adjoining county. Without some such provision, an indictment could rarely be found in such cases. We cannot concur with the argument that such provision (Revisal 1905, § 3233) is beyond the scope of the law-making power, and unconstitutional. The legislature of North Carolina has full legislative power, which the people of this state can exercise as completely and freely as the Parliament of England or any other legislative body of a free people, save only as there are restrictions imposed upon the legislature by the state and Federal Constitutions. In the very nature of things, there is no other power that can impose restrictions. When the Constitution uses the words "jury" and "grand jury," they are interpreted as being the same bodies which were known and well recognized when the Constitution was adopted. But this is a rule of ascertaining the meaning of the words, and not a restriction upon the power of the legislature to make provisions as to venue, and the like incidental matters, which in no wise affect the nature and composition of a jury and grand jury. Hence, the qualification of jurors, the number of challenges, venue, and other similar provisions as to procedure, are in the discretion of the legislature. The legislative power can be restrained only by constitutional provisions. It cannot be restricted and tied down by reference to the common law or statutory law of England. There is nothing in the common law or statute law of England which is not subject to repeal by our legislature, unless it has been re-enacted in some constitutional provision. That the Federal government is one of granted powers solely, and the state government is one of granted powers as to the executive and judicial departments, but of full legislative powers, except where it is restricted by the state or Federal Constitution, is elementary law. This is nowhere more clearly stated than by Black, Const. Law, §§ 100, 101, as follows:

"Sec. 100. Under the system of government in the United States, the people of each of the states possess the inherent power to make any and all laws for their own governance. But a portion of this plenary legislative power has been surrendered by each of the states to the United States. The remainder is confided by the people of the state, by their Constitution, to their representatives constituting the state legislature. At the same time, they impose, by that instrument, certain restrictions and limitations upon the legislative power thus delegated. But state Constitutions are not to be construed as grants of power (except in the most general sense) but rather as limitations upon the power of the state legislature.

"Sec. 101. Consequently, the legislature of a state may lawfully enact any law, of any character, on any subject, unless it is prohibited, in the particular instance, either expressly or by necessary implication, by the Constitution of the United States or by that of the state, or unless it improperly invades the separate province of one of the other departments of the government, and provided that the statute in question is designed to operate upon subjects within the territorial jurisdiction of the state."

That eminent authority, Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. p. 126, says: "In creating a legislative department and conferring upon it the legislative power, the people must be understood to have conferred the full and complete power as it rests in, and may be exercised by, the sovereign power of any country, subject only to such restrictions as they may have seen fit to impose, and to the limitations which are contained in the Constitution of the United States. The legislative department is not made a special agency for the exercise of specifically defined legislative powers, but is intrusted with the general authority to make laws at discretion." On the next page he further says that "the American legislatures may exercise the legislative powers which the Parliament of Great Britain wields, except as restrictions are imposed" by some inhibition in the state or Federal Constitution; but the legislature cannot exercise the judicial and executive functions of the British Parliament, which is supreme. This is a clear cut and very exact statement.

In State v. Matthews, 48 N. C. (3 Jones, L.) 458, Judge Pearson said: "With the exception of the powers surrendered to the United States, each state is absolutely sovereign. With the exception of the restraints imposed by the Constitution of the state and the Bills of Rights, all legislative power is vested in the general assembly." This is quoted by Bynum, J., with approval, in State v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 73 N. C. 537, 21 Am. Rep. 473. Our legislature has the same legislative power as the British Parliament, except where some legislative power is expressly denied it by the Constitution of the state or Union, but, unlike Parliament, it cannot exercise judicial or executive functions, and that only because the Constitution has bestowed those functions upon the other two departments. If the state had adopted no Constitution, as was the case in Rhode Island till 1846, the legislature would have been supreme, as in England, subject only to the Federal Constitution; and there is now, and necessarily can be, no limitations upon the legislature, save those expressly imposed by the state and Federal Constitutions, as Judge Cooley well says. Under the North Carolina Constitution of 1776, the legislature elected all the executive officers of the state, and created and modified at will the judicial department, and chose its officers. The subsequent changes in the state Constitution have put the other two departments upon a more independent footing, but have not added any other limitations upon the legislative power of the general assembly.

It has long been the statute that in the interest of justice the court can remove any cause, civil or criminal, to some adjacent county for trial. Revisal 1905, §§ 426-428. If the trial before the petit jury can, by legislative authority, be transferred to another county, the far less important matter of the venue of the inquiry and finding by the grand jury can also be transferred. In fact, it has often been provided that the grand jury may find a true bill in certain cases where the offense was committed beyond the limits of the county, as will be seen by reference to other sections of the subhead in which Revisal 1905, § 3233, is found, i. e.: "3234. When crime committed on waters dividing counties. . . . " "3235. When assault in one county, death in another. . . . " "3236. Assault in this state, death in another." "3238. Death in this state, mortal wound given elsewhere." "3237. Person in this state injuring one in another." Also §§ 3403 and 3404 as to embezzlement and conspiracy by railroad officers confer jurisdiction upon any county through which the railroad passes, and there are still other statutes giving the grand jury jurisdiction to inquire as to offenses committed out of their own county. The legislature is not likely to increase needlessly the instances in which a grand jury can inquire into offenses committed out of its own county, but of the necessity of such statutes the general assembly is sole judge. Up to 1730, indictments for offenses occurring anywhere in North Carolina were cognizable by a grand jury sitting in Chowan county, at Edenton. In that year the venue was changed to New Berne. From 1746 to 1806 (for sixty years) indictments were found in district courts, though the grand jury did not sit in the county where the offense was committed, unless that happened to be the county in which the court was held; and this is the case still with all indictments in the Federal courts.

If it were possible to hold that the legislature cannot shape the criminal procedure of this state to provide remedies required by the exigencies of the present time, unless the same remedies had been found to be necessary in England, and had occurred to and been adopted by those administering its laws in years long gone by, we find that in fact this same necessity of providing for the investigation by the grand jury of another county had been there provided for as to many offenses. In 4 Bl. Com. 303, we find that, while a grand jury could not usually inquire as to offenses committed out of their county, by legislative authority this could be done in very many instances, among others: "Offenses against the black act (9 Geo. I. chap. 22) may be inquired of and tried in any county in England, at the option of the prosecutor." "So felonies in destroying turnpikes . . . [etc.] may, by statutes, 8 Geo. II. chap. 20 and 13 Geo. III. chap. 84, be inquired of and tried in any adjacent county," and "murders, also, whether committed in England or foreign parts, may, by virtue of . . . 33 Henry VIII. chap. 23, be inquired of and tried" in any shire in England. "Any felonies committed in Wales may be indicted in any adjoining county in England (26 Henry VIII. chap. 6)." And there are very many similar statutes there mentioned which were enacted, like the above, long prior to the American Revolution; thus showing that the venue of offenses cognizable before any grand jury is a matter of legislative enactment.

In 1 Stephen, History Crim. Law in England, 277, it is pointed out that there are 18 exceptions by statute to the rule requiring an indictment to be found by a grand jury of the county (the first having been enacted as far back as 2 & 3 Edw. VI.), and says their very number proves "that the general principle which requires so many exceptions is wrong." And, on page 278, that distinguished judge and author adds: "A rule which requires eighteen statutory exceptions and such an evasion as the one last mentioned in the case of theft—the commonest of all offenses—is obviously indefensible. It is obvious that all courts otherwise competent to try an offense should be competent to try it irrespectively of the place where it was committed; the place of trial being determined by the convenience of the court, the witnesses, and the person accused. Of course, as a general rule, the county where the offense was committed would be the most convenient place for the purpose." England has about the same area as North Carolina,—40 counties,—and a far denser population, now more than 30,000,000; North Carolina has nearly two and one half times as many counties (97) and about 2,000,000 people. The population of the average English county is therefore forty times that of an average county in this state. If, nevertheless, the public interest requires that, even in England, the finding of an indictment shall not be restricted always to a grand jury in the county where an offense is committed, for a stronger reason the legislature here must have power, in its judgment, to change the venue in the interest of justice, with our smaller counties and sparse population. The venue of a grand jury "is a matter under the control of the legislature." State v. Woodard, 123 N. C. 710, 31 S. E. 219. State v. Patterson, 5 N. C. (1 Murph.) 443, is put on the express ground that the statute did not give the grand jury jurisdiction of an offense committed in an adjacent county, as had been the case under the previous district system. Besides, if there had been a defective venue, the remedy was by a plea in abatement, which is practically a motion to remove to the proper county, and not a motion to quash. Revisal 1905, § 3239; State v. Carter, 126 N. C. 1012, 35 S. E. 591; State v. Lytle, 117 N. C. 801, 23 S. E. 476.

It was also error to quash the first count. The indictment is against Lewis, and in charging that he "conspired with others" the bill fully complies with Revisal 1905, § 3698, which simply provides that, "if any person shall conspire to break," etc. It was not required to name the others, or to charge that they were unknown. The words "with others" are tautology and mere surplusage. The "con" in the word "conspire" embraces the idea that it is an act done "with" another or others. Even if the statute had used the words "with others," it would have been sufficient to recite in the bill "with others," without charging their names or that they were unknown. Revisal 1905, § 3250; State v. Hill, 79 N. C. 658; State v. Capps, 71 N. C. 96.

Reversed.

Connor, J., concurring:

I concur in the opinion of the court in this case with much hesitation. I do not concur in some of the reasons which are given to sustain it. The court held in a well-considered and able opinion by Mr. Justice Shepherd in State v. Barker, 107 N. C. 913, 10 L.R.A. 50, 12 S. E. 115, that, although the term "grand jury" is not found in our Constitution the section of the bill of rights guaranteeing immunity from criminal prosecutions except upon "presentment, indictment, or impeachment" must be construed to mean "indictment by a grand jury," as defined by the common law,—citing with approval the language of Judge Cooley in that connection. Const. Lim. 59. It was held in that case, because at common law "the concurrence of 12 jurors was absolutely necessary" to find a bill of indictment, it was equally so in North Carolina, and that the legislature had no power to dispense with such "absolute necessity." English v. State, 31 Fla. 340, 12 So. 689. If my investigation had led me to the conclusion that the venue entered into and was an essential element in the term "indictment" at common law at the time of the "separation from the mother country," I could not hesitate to declare that, in my opinion, it was not within the power of the legislature to abrogate the common law in that respect. I cannot concur in the suggestion that such power is vested in the legislature. The people, with whom alone is political sovereignty, have expressly declared that their governmental agencies must act and move within the orbit assigned to them by the Constitution. There is no place for arbitrary power in our governmental system of checks and balances. I do not sympathize with the suggestion that no part of the common law is imbedded in our Constitution. Speaking of the common law, after noting some of its defects, Judge Cooley wisely says: "But, on the whole, the system was the best foundation on which to erect an enduring structure of civil liberty which the world has ever known. It was the peculiar excellence of the common law of England that it recognized the worth, and sought especially to protect the rights and privileges, of the individual man. Its maxims were those of a sturdy and independent race, accustomed, in an unusual degree, to freedom of thought and action, and to a share in the administration of public affairs; and arbitrary power and uncontrolled authority were not recognized in its principles; . . . and, if the Criminal Code was harsh, it, at least, escaped the inquisitorial features which were apparent in the criminal procedure or other civilized countries, and which have ever been fruitful of injustice, oppression, and terror." [Const. Lim. 7th ed. p. 50.] That those who came to this colony, and "buidled" our institutions, well knew and jealously guarded these great principles, every page of our early history illustrates. The language of Judge Cooley applies with special force to them. "From the first, the colonists in America claimed the benefit and protection of the common law. In some particulars, however, the common law, as then existing in England, was not suited to their condition and circumstances in the new country, and those particulars they omitted as it was put in practice by them. . . . Did Parliament order offenders against the laws in America to be sent to England for trial, every American was roused to indignation, and protested against the trampling under foot of that time-honored principle that trials for crime must be by a jury of the vicinage." [Const. Lim. 7th ed. p. 51.] When the courts in this and other states have been called upon to approve departures from common-law principles and procedure in criminal trials, they have steadily refused to do so. In State v. Branch, 68 N. C. 186, 12 Am. Rep. 633, it was shown that a judge on the circuit had directed the witnesses to be examined by the grand jury in open court. Chief Justice Pearson, sustaining a motion to quash the bill for that reason, said: "This procedure is opposed to the principles of the common law," which means "common sense." He further says: "There is not the slightest reason to believe that the practice of examining witnesses before a grand jury in public was ever 'in force and in use in the colony of North Carolina;' very certainly such has not been the practice in the state of North Carolina, and it must be rejected as inconsistent with the genius of a republican government." In Lewis v. Wake County, 74 N. C. 194, Bynum, J., in a very strong opinion, denying the right of a solicitor to be present when the grand jury are discharging its duties, finds authority for the decision in the common law. After noticing the English practice, as described by Blackstone and others, he says: It "is more consonant to justice and the principles of personal liberty. The powers of the grand jury, therefore, should not be extended farther beyond these conservative and salutary principles than is clearly warranted by public necessity and the most approved precedents." In State v. Miller, 18 N. C. (1 Dev. & B. L.) 500, while the judges differed in respect to the law, both the chief justice and Judge Gaston concurred that in considering questions pertaining to the rights of the accused, in trial by jury, recourse must be had to the ancient common law. The same is true in every case where the question has come into debate, and the citizen has asserted his rights in respect to the manner in which he could be called to answer and put upon trial for a criminal offense. Ex parte Milligan, 4 Wall. 2, 18 L. ed. 281. In Byrd v. State, 1 How. (Miss.) 176, Sharkey, Ch. J., said: "The right of trial by jury, being of the highest importance to the citizen, and essential to liberty, was not left to the uncertain fate of legislation, but was secured by the Constitution of this and all the other states as sacred and inviolable. The question naturally arises, How was it adopted by the Constitution? That instrument is silent as to the number and qualifications of jurors. We must therefore call in to our aid the common law for the purpose of ascertaining what was meant by the term 'jury.' It is a rule that when a statute or the Constitution contains terms used in the common law without defining particularly what is meant, then the rules of the common law must be applied in the explanation." The Opinion of the Justices, 41 N. H. 550, strongly states the law in this respect. Brucker v. State, 16 Wis. 333; People v. Powell, 87 Cal. 348, 11 L.R.A. 75, 25 Pac. 481. I agree, of course, that there is much of the common law which is in force in this state by virtue of Revisal 1905, chap. 15, § 932, which is but the re-enactment of the acts of 1716 and 1778; and as to this the legislature may, as it has in many instances done, repeal or modify it. In respect to those elementary principles and provisions, upon which the security of life, liberty, and property depend, guaranteed by Magna Charta, which was ingrafted, either in express terms or by necessary implication, into our Bill of Rights, I do not concede that the power exists, in either department of the government, to abrogate or modify them. To do this is among "the reserved rights" to be exercised only by the people themselves in convention. This is one of "the powers not delegated" to the legislative department of the government. I cannot therefore assent to the proposition, sometimes found in judicial opinions, that the legislature has all of the powers of the British Parliament, except when expressly restricted. In the discussion of this very important and delicate question, Judge Cooley says: "But to guard against being misled by a comparison between the two, we must bear in mind the important distinction . . . that with the Parliament rests, practically, the sovereignty of the country, so that it may exercise all the powers of the government, if it wills so to do; while, on the other hand, the legislatures of the American states are not the sovereign authority, and, though vested with the exercise of one branch of the sovereignty, they are nevertheless, in wielding it, hedged in on all sides by important limitations, some of which are imposed in express terms, and others by implications which are equally imperative." Const. Lim. p. 105. He further says: "So long as the Parliament is recognized as rightfully exercising the sovereign authority of the country, it is evident that the resemblance between it and American legislatures, in regard to their ultimate powers, cannot be traced very far. The American legislatures only exercise a certain portion of the sovereign power. The sovereignty is in the people, and the legislatures which they have created are only to discharge a trust of which they have been made a depository, but which has been placed in their hands with well-defined restrictions." This, I think, the sound view. People ex rel. Nichols v. McKee, 68 N. C. 430. The difficulty which I have experienced in arriving at a conclusion in this case is to fix the line at which the legislature may change or abrogate the procedure, venue, etc., in regard to indictments as they were by the common law recognized and administered by the courts in England. That it may not lessen the number required to concur in finding a bill, or permit witnesses to be examined before the grand jury in public, or to permit the prosecuting officer to remain with the grand jury while in session, is settled upon the ground that such things were not permissible by the common law. The only decided case which was cited by counsel, or I have been able to find in this country, in point, is Swart v. Kimball, 43 Mich. 443, 5 N. W. 635. There the statute provided that for cutting timber on the public lands the person charged could be proceeded against in the county where the offense was committed, or such other county as the attorney general should direct. The defendant in error was prosecuted under the act in a county other than that in which the offense was committed. He was arrested upon a capias, and upon habeas corpus was discharged. He brought the action against plaintiff in error, who procured the information and arrest, and recovered judgment for false imprisonment. Several irregularities in the proceedings were alleged. In regard to the validity of the statute authorizing the change of venue, Cooley, J., said that the act was "manifestly in conflict with one of the plainest and most important provisions of the Constitution. Now, that in jury trial it is implied that the trial shall be by jury of the vicinage is familiar law. Blackstone says: 'The jurors must be of the viane, or neighborhood;' which is interpreted to be of the county. 4 Bl. Com. 350. This is an old rule of the common law; citing Hawk. P. C., bk. 2, chap. 40; 2 Hale, P. C. 264. He refers to certain statutory changes made by Parliament prior to the separation of the colonies, saying: 'But it is well known that the existence of such statutes, with the threat to enforce them, was one of the grievances which led to the separation of the American Colonies from the British Empire. If they were forbidden by the unwritten Constitution of England, they are certainly unauthorized by the written Constitutions of the American states, in which the utmost pains have been taken to preserve all the securities of individual liberty. . . . But no one doubts that the right to a trial by jury of the vicinage is as complete and certain now as it ever was, and that in America it is indefeasible.' After pointing out in strong language the injustice and oppression to which the citizen may be subjected if compelled to answer an indictment in a county otherwise than that in which the offense was alleged to have been committed, he concludes: 'We have not the slightest hesitation in declaring that the act of 1857, so far as it undertakes to authorize a trial in some other county than that of the alleged offense, is oppressive, unwarranted by the Constitution, and utterly void.' I find a number of cases cited by counsel denying the right of the state to remove a criminal trial from the county of the alleged offense for local prejudice. It is so held in a strong opinion by the supreme court of California (People v. Powell, supra). Judge Cooley says: 'But this may be pressing the principle too far.' It was so held in Kirk v. State, 1 Coldw. 344, and Osborn v. State, 24 Ark. 629. But in both these states the Constitution expressly guaranteed a alleged to have been committed. I have carefully examined the history of parliamentary legislation in England on the subject, for the purpose of learning how far the venue in criminal proceedings has been regarded in that country, as fixed by Magna Charta. Fitz James Stephen, in the "History of the Criminal Law," vol. 1, 274, gives an interesting account of the statutory changes made in the law in regard to venue. Some of them are pointed out in the opinion of the chief justice. See also 2 Mews v. Fisher, Com. Law Dig. 2263. In Brucker v. State, supra, Dixon, Ch. J., discussing the right of the legislature to provide that 17 persons might compose the grand jury, said: "The foundation of the objection is that this was the rule at common law [that the grand jury should consist of not more than 23 nor less than 12] recognized by the Constitution, against which the legislature has no power to provide. Upon examination of the authorities, we find no such fixed common-law principle. The only inflexible rule with respect to numbers seems to have been that there could not be less than 12 nor more than 23 jurors. The concurrence of 12 was necessary to find a bill, and there could not be more than 23 in order that 12 might form a majority. . . . We are of opinion, therefore, that it is competent for the legislature, within the limits prescribed by the common law, to increase or diminish the number of grand jurors to be drawn and returned, without infringing the rights of the accused, granted by the Constitution." In Byrd v. State, 1 How. (Miss.) 176, Sharkey, Ch. J., discussing the subject, says: "The legislature cannot abolish or change substantially the panel or jury, but it may, it is presumed, prescribe the qualifications of the individuals composing it." I have noted these cases to show that it is held by courts adhering to the principle that the guaranty of immunity from criminal prosecutions, otherwise than by indictment, that the legislature may change the law in particulars nonessential, such as qualification of jurors, etc., but in regard to essentials, such as number, etc., the constitutional provisions must be read and construed in the light of the common law, and are not subject to legislative change.

In the absence of express legislative enactment, there can be no question that the venue is the county in which the offense is alleged to have been committed. I incline to the opinion, at least to the extent of surrendering my doubts to the judgment of the majority of the court, that the act is not violative of the right of the defendant. In doing so, I am also influenced by the wise and salutary principle, so frequently announced by the greatest judges who have sat upon the state and Federal benches, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that every presumption should be made to support the constitutionality of a statute. While I am by no means certain that the beneficial results anticipated by the legislature will be realized, I sympathize so strongly with the desire and purpose to provide all possible means for detecting, and, after trial and conviction, punishing, those engaged in the crime of lynching, hoping to suppress it, that I am the more willing to surrender my doubts to its best judgment. It is the first time in our history that the question has been presented, because it was not until the act of 1893 that the grand jury of any other county than that of the offense was given power to find a bill of indictment. It would seem that in England it has been deemed necessary to change the venue, and permit indictments to be found in counties other than those in which the offense was committed. For many years the statute permitting the court, upon motion of the solicitor, supported by affidavits, to remove a criminal case for trial to an adjoining county on account of local feeling, has been invoked without question. While the right to remove, after a judicial determination that a fair trial could not be had in the county of the offense, might be distinguished from the right to indict and try in the county of the solicitor's selection, I concede that the recognition of the validity of the removal statutes weighs in my mind in favor of the act of 1893. I have felt impelled to say this much because of the importance of the subject, and a desire to proceed with the utmost caution in experimental legislation of this kind. While it is not for the judiciary to trench upon the domain of the legislature, I trust that I may, without impropriety, express the hope that the occasion and condition which in its judgment called for this act may soon pass away, and that we may return to the common-law way of securing to every man immunity from being called to answer for violation of the law otherwise than by indictment preferred by a grand jury summoned from the county where the crime is supposed to have been committed. Cooley, 392; Story, Const. § 1769. In addition to the humane policy which protected a man in his hour of trial from being carried away from his home, deprived of the opportunity to have his witnesses, and the benefit of such reputation and character as he had made among his neighbors, this ancient way placed upon the people of each county or neighborhood the responsibility for securing a fair, firm, and just administration of the law, detection and punishment of the guilty, and protection of the innocent. How far removing from the people of each county this stimulus, and by carrying their citizens into adjoining counties for trial, will promote the end desired, is not clear to my mind. These are questions, however, committed to the wisdom of the legislature. I disclaim any right to question the constitutionality of an act of the legislature because it does not accord with my judgment. This would be to move out of the orbit assigned to the judge. Judges must not be wiser than the law, but be content to construe and declare it in the light of principle, precedent, and constitutional limitations.

Walker, J., concurring:

I concur in the result reached in this case and in the opinion of the Chief Justice, except in so far as it is therein impliedly stated that the powers reserved in the Constitution by the people may be exercised by their representatives in the general assembly. My opinion is that the legislature has only the powers delegated to it by the people, and all powers not so given are reserved to the people themselves, just as by the 9th and 10th articles of Amendment to the Constitution of the general government it is provided that the enumeration of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people; but the powers not delegated to the United States by that instrument, or prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively, or to the people. The Constitution is a grant of specific powers, and not a restriction upon powers granted, which, but for that restriction, would be general and plenary in their nature. The powers granted are to be exercised only as prescribed, and those of a legislative character by the general assembly; but all not specially granted remain with the people, to be afterwards granted or withheld by them as they may deem best for the public welfare. In this respect the language of the Constitution of this state is substantially like that of the Constitution of the United States, so far as they both confer power upon the three departments of government, and for this reason they should receive practically the same construction. The legislative power under neither is unlimited, except as it may be said that it is not to be restricted so long as the legislature moves within its legitimate orbit. The words of article 1, § 37, it seems to me, could have no force under any other construction. As we must ultimately construe that instrument and say what it means, we should be exceedingly careful to see that no power is taken from the people that they have not given in their Constitution, but confine each of the departments and every agency of government to the particular sphere of action assigned to it. I do not care to enter upon a discussion of the question whether the legislature had the power to pass the act under which the indictment was found in this case, and thereby to authorize the laying of the venue in Union county. Such power existed, in my opinion; and I am content to rest my assent to the conclusion of the court upon the reasoning and the authorities as contained in the opinions of the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Connor. This power should be confined within reasonable limits and the court should see that it is not exercised to the oppression of the citizen, or in such a manner as to seriously imperil his natural rights. There is no such case presented here. My only purpose in giving expression to my views at all is that I may refer to a matter which is not discussed in the opinion of the court.

It is suggested that the act of 1893, p. 440, chap. 461, as brought forward in Revisal 1905, §§ 3233, 3698, does not cover this case as § 3698 does not define the crime of lynching, and no statute can be found that creates such an offense. It is therefore argued from that premise, and I think erroneously, that, as § 3233 confers jurisdiction upon the court of any county adjoining that in which the crime is committed only in those cases where the offense charged is "lynching," it follows that the section is nugatory,—a dead letter on the statute book. It will be strange indeed if the legislature had made so great a mistake; but I do not think it has. The first count of the indictment charges that the defendant conspired with others to break and enter the jail of Anson county for the purpose of lynching, injuring, and killing John V. Johnson, a prisoner confined therein and charged with the crime of murder; the second that he actually did break and enter the jail for the same purpose; and the third that, after so entering, he did lynch, injure, and kill the said prisoner, and all the counts in the bill conclude against the statute and also at common law. When we examine the Revisal, we find several sections relating to the crimes charged in the bill, namely, §§ 1288, 2825, 3200, 3201, 3233, and 3698. The first (§ 1288) relates to the costs incurred in the prosecution of persons conspiring to break and enter, or for breaking and entering, a jail for the purpose of killing or injuring a prisoner therein confined. The second (§ 2825), to the duty of the sheriff to guard the jail, and protect prisoners against persons who may threaten to break and enter it for the purpose aforesaid, and prescribes how he shall proceed. The third (§ 3200), to the duty of the solicitor; and provides that he shall cause immediate investigation to be made before a judge or other proper officer, who shall bind the person found to be probably guilty to the ensuing term of the superior court of some adjoining county, or commit him to the jail of said county. The fourth (§ 3201), to the testimony of witnesses, requiring all persons to give evidence in such cases, but pardoning those who participated in the crime. The fifth (§ 3233) confers full and complete jurisdiction upon the court of any adjoining county to indict and try offenders against the statute. The sixth (§ 3698) makes it a felony to conspire to break or enter a jail or other place of confinement of prisoners charged with crime or under sentence, for the purpose of killing or injuring any prisoner so confined, or to engage in breaking or entering any jail or like place with intent to kill or injure any prisoner therein confined, and fixes the punishment. These sections were all taken from the Acts of 1893, chap. 461, p. 440, but they are not arranged consecutively in the Revisal nor in the order in which they appear in said acts, but the sections are severally assigned to their appropriate titles or chapters in the Revisal. All of the sections except those numbered 2825 and 3698 have special reference to the crime of lynching, but there is no offense created by law, and known or designated by that name; and when, therefore, §§ 3200 and 3233 require that persons guilty of that crime shall be bound to the superior court of an adjoining county, and indicted and tried in that county, we are unable to know what the legislature means, unless we refer to the original act, which makes everything plain. We are at liberty to make this reference because the statute will otherwise be incapable of any intelligent construction. It is not only obscurely worded and of doubtful import, but it can have no meaning at all, whereas it plainly appears that it was intended to have some meaning, and to secure the detection and prosecution of a very dangerous class of offenders. Shall we close our eyes to the only source from which we can secure light, and by which the meaning and intent will be made manifest, and thus defeat the legislative will, or shall we turn the light on that we may see and know what was meant? The law in such a case, I think, permits, and, indeed, enjoins, that the latter course should be taken. United States v. Lacher, 134 U. S. 624, 33 L. ed. 1080, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625; The Conqueror, 166 U. S., at page 122, 41 L. ed. at page 943, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 510. It is a general rule in the construction of statutes that, when a provision of a Revision or a Code is plain and unambiguous, the court cannot refer to the original statute for the purpose of ascertaining its meaning; 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

but, if it is of doubtful import, or without such reference the provision is meaningless, it is proper to resort to the prior act, which has been codified or revised, for the purpose of solving the ambiguity; and especially should this be the rule where the provision is so worded as to be incapable of a fair construction without considering the original statute. Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, §§ 50, 51; Black, Interpretation of Laws, § 136, pp. 365-367; Lewis's Sutherland, Stat. Constr. 2d ed. §§ 450-453 and 271. "But if it were conceded that the statute be somewhat ambiguous, we are authorized to refer to the original statutes, from which the section was taken, and to ascertain from their language and context to what class of cases the provision was intended to apply." The Conqueror and United States v. Lacher, supra.

If the headings or marginal notes of the different sections of the Revisal cannot be used to explain their meaning, then the introduction of the words "the crime of lynching" into § 3233 renders it not only ambiguous, but insensible, as there is then no such crime created by the law, and there was no crime known by that name at the common law; and in that event we are clearly permitted by all the authorities to look at the original statute, although it may have been repealed by the Revisal, in order to ascertain what particular crime the legislature intended to describe when it used those words. When the original statute (Acts 1893, chap. 461, p. 440) is examined, we find that § 4 of that act which corresponds with § 3233 of the Revisal of 1905, refers to § 1, which is § 3698 of the Revisal of 1905; so it appears from this comparison that the words "the crime of lynching" were used by the revisers as a convenient form of expression, in view of the fact that they had placed headings, titles, or marginal references to each section, indicating what was meant by the term "lynching," under express authority given to them by the act of 1903 (chap. 314, page 512), which provided for a compilation and revision of the statutes of the state, and by which commissioners were appointed for that purpose. This being so, § 3233 should be held to refer to § 3698; and this is also true of § 3200 and the other sections above enumerated, as they all were taken from the same act, and by the same rule of construction are to be taken as referring to each other. When these several sections of the Revisal are thus considered, we find that the superior court of the county of Union had jurisdiction to indict through a grand jury in that court, and the power to hear, try, and determine the indictment when found,—at least so far as the two offenses mentioned in § 3698 are concerned; and these are the two offenses described in the first two counts of the bill. The same result may be reached by applying to the Revisal another rule of construction. It is generally held that the title of an act is a part of the same, but not in the sense that it can be used to construe it, unless the meaning of the act is ambiguous; in which case we may consider it for the purpose of ascertaining the true meaning. State v. Patterson, 134 N. C. 612, 47 S. E. 808. But this rule does not apply to revisions of statutes where the revisers have been authorized to insert marginal references to the original statutes, and to distribute the statutes under appropriate titles, divisions, and subjects, as was done by the act of 1903 (chap. 314, § 1, page 512; Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, §§ 51, 69; Bishop, Written Laws, § 46); for as the eminent writer last mentioned says, such headings, and the like, in revisions and Codes, are deemed to be of somewhat greater effect than the ordinary titles to legislative acts, and to indicate at least the nature of the enactment. If this rule is applied, we find that the intent that § 3233 should refer to the jurisdiction of offenses described in § 3698 is made perfectly clear and manifest. As to the right to construe the several sections with reference to each other, see Fortune v. Buncombe County, 140 N. C. 322, 52 S. E. 950.

My conclusion is that the indictment sufficiently charges the commission of an offense made criminal by § 3698, and that §§ 3200 and 3233 refer to the crimes described in that section when they authorize the indictment to be found and the trial to be had in an adjoining county. This makes it unnecessary to inquire whether the indictment is otherwise sufficient to show jurisdiction in the court, under §§ 3200 and 3233, or, to speak more generally, whether the jurisdiction of the court can be sustained on other grounds. As there is at least one offense, if not more than one, charged in the bill of which the court has jurisdiction, the motion to quash should be denied, and the defendant required to plead to the indictment.

Brown, J., dissenting:

I concur in so much of the opinion of the court as upholds the power of the general assembly generally to provide for the removal of criminal actions to an adjoining county either before bill found or after. I know of no clause of our Constitution, Federal or state, which prohibits it. Assuming that the jurors must be summoned from the "vicinage," as at common law, I think an adjoining county might well be held to be within the neighborhood," for that is what the term signifies, although in England, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

where the counties are very large, it is held to be a jury from the county. I would hesitate to hold that the legislature has the power to enact that one who commits a crime in Cherokee may be indicted and tried in Currituck. My convictions, however, compel me to dissent upon other grounds from the judgment of my brethren that the grand jurors of Union county had jurisdiction over the offense charged in the bill of indictment. The act of 1893 (chap. 461, page 440), together with its title, was as effectually effaced and blotted out from the statute law of the state by the Revisal of 1905 as if it had never been enacted. Revisal 1905, § 5453. Therefore, at the time of the commission of the alleged offense and the finding of the bill, the only statute law which it is contended gives jurisdiction to the grand jurors of Union county is § 3233 of the Revisal of 1905. The bill alleges that the offenses therein charged were committed in Anson county. A plea in abatement is not therefore necessary. This court can see on the face of the bill that the superior court of Union had no jurisdiction unless the statute confers it. It is familiar learning that a motion to quash may be made at any time, where it is apparent upon the face of the record that the court was without jurisdiction.

The bill of indictment is drawn under § 3698 of the Revisal of 1905, which is copied in the opinion of the court. The first count charges a conspiracy to break into the common jail of Anson county, entered into within said county, and the second charges the actual breaking into said jail. The third count charges no offense either against common law or statute.

In order to give the superior court of Union county jurisdiction under the terms of § 3233, it must plainly appear that § 3698 creates an offense and defines it as "lynching," for § 3233 confines the exercise of jurisdiction by the superior court of the adjoining county to the "crime of lynching," and to that alone. Now, does § 3698 create and define in terms a crime known as lynching? That is the crux of this case. Being a criminal statute, it must be construed strictly, as the sacred right of the liberty of the citizen forbids a liberal construction and a reading into the statute of words that are not there. The word "lynching" is nowhere used in the body of the statute, and no such distinct offense is named and created by it. Had the statute (§ 3698) declared in express terms that the acts therein denounced shall constitute the "crime of lynching," or that any person committing such acts "shall be guilty of lynching," I should say the superior court of Union county had jurisdiction, under § 3233. But the body of the statute fails to so declare. It is attempted, however, to "piece out" the statute by bringing in a so-called title. It must be admitted that the title to the act of 1893 cannot be looked to, for that is as dead as the body of the act, as I have shown. The only title that can be looked to is the one word "lynching," which is printed in large letters between the number and the body of § 3698. If that can be called a title, then, according to the authorities, it does not help the contention of the state. It has been established in England since Lord Coke's time, by an unbroken line of judicial decisions, that the title of a statute is not a part of it, and is therefore excluded from consideration in construing it. Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, 73; Powtler's Case, 11 Coke, 33b. In this country, while the title of a statute, in the absence of a constitutional provision, is not regarded as a part of the statute, it is legitimate to resort to it as an aid in ascertaining the meaning of the statute, but only when the language and provisions in the body of the act are ambiguous and of doubtful meaning. Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, p. 74, and cases cited. Such is the ruling of this court. Hines v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 95 N. C. 434, 59 Am. Rep. 250. In State v. Patterson, 134 N. C. 612, 47 S. E. 808, Clark, Ch. J., says: "The caption of an act was not at all considered, to any extent whatever, in construing it, for reasons given in State v. Woolard, 119 N. C. 779, 25 S. E. 719; but the modern doctrine is that, when the language of the statute is ambiguous, the courts can resort to the title as aid in giving such act its true meaning; but that this cannot be done when the language used is clear and unambiguous." The statute construed in that case was, like the one under consideration, free from ambiguity, but in conflict with its title. The title was disregarded, and the body of the statute followed. The title of a statute cannot control or vary the meaning of the enacting part, if the latter is plain and unambiguous, as the statute in the present case is, nor can the title be used for the purpose of adding to the statute or extending or restraining any of its provisions. Black, Interpretation of Laws, p. 173. "Cases which are clearly not within the contemplation of the enacting clause cannot be brought within it merely because the title appears to include them." Id. p. 173. "Lynching" is a word of much more general and extended meaning and significance than any words contained in the body of § 3698, and, being a penal statute, especially, the term ought not to be read into it. Black, Interpretation of Laws, p. 173; United States v. Briggs, 9 How. 351, 13 L. ed. 170. There is no such crime as lynching known to our law, and, if the body of this statute does not create it, then it does not exist. The word in its well-known significance and generally accepted meaning embraces many illegal acts which do not come within the purview of this statute, and does not embrace those mentioned in it. The acts made illegal by it constituted indictable offenses before its enactment, and, were it repealed, would still be indictable in the counties where committed. While no statute of this state defines what is lynching, the lexicographers and historians have given it a well-defined and perfectly understood meaning, which excludes any of the crimes denounced in the act. The great Scotch novelist refers to a species of lynching when he refers to what was called "Jedwood" justice, "hang in haste and try at leisure." Again, the same versatile author, in his introduction to the Border Minstrelsy, speaks of a sort of lynching called "Lydford Law," quoted by Mr. Justice Connor in Daniels v. Homer, 139 N. C. 239, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 997, 51 S. E. 992. A most interesting writer in the American Law Register (Mr. John Marshall Gest) says that "the lynch law of our country has a very ancient and respectable pedigree." He refers to the Vehmic tribunals, originating in Westphalia, which executed thieves and murderers caught in the act without trial or delay, and speaks of them as "Judge Lynch's cousin German." The word "lynching" has been defined by legal as well as other lexicographers, and according to such definitions, and as the term is generally understood, the illegal acts commonly termed "lynching" cannot be committed by a single individual; yet one person alone could be guilty of the crime of breaking and entering a jail with intent to kill under this statute. "Lynching" is defined by Rapalje & Lawrence as "mob vengeance upon a person suspected of crime." Law Dictionary, 778. It is "a term descriptive of the action of unofficial persons, organized bands, or mobs, who seize persons charged with or suspected of crimes, or take them out of the custody of the law, and inflict summary punishment upon them, without legal trial, and without the warrant or authority of law." Black, Law Dict. p. 737. "A common phrase used to express the vengeance of a mob inflicting an injury and committing an outrage upon a person suspected of some offense." 2 Bouvier, Law Dict. 287. See also State v. Aler, 39 W. Va. 558, 20 S. E. 585. Worcester and Web- ster define the word as the infliction of punishment without legal trial by a mob, or by unauthorized persons. The word derives its origin, according to Worcester, from a Virginia farmer named Lynch, who, having caught a thief, instead of delivering him to the officers of the law, tied him to a tree and flogged him with his own hands. Lynching has no technical legal meaning. It is merely a descriptive phrase, used to signify the lawless acts of persons who violate established law at the time they commit the acts, and is universally understood to signify the illegal infliction of punishment by a combination of persons for an alleged crime. As I have said before, the offense of lynching was not known to the common law, and is unknown to the laws of North Carolina, because we have no statute creating and defining the offense. We are, therefore, in the anomalous situation of having a statute fixing the venue for the trial of persons charged with lynching, and yet there is no such crime known to our law or created by the act. The statute not only fails to declare that the acts therein set out shall constitute the crime of lynching, but those acts do not come within any known definition of the term, as I think I have plainly shown. A conspiracy to break or enter a jail for the purpose of killing a prisoner has never yet been called "lynching." Neither has the breaking into jail with the intent to kill or injure a prisoner been so denominated. Such acts were recognized indictable offenses before the passage of the act, and are now indictable independent of it. But nowhere have they ever been termed "lynching." This phrase, by common usage, is applied only when the unlawful act is consummated and the illegal punishment actually inflicted. It is plain to me that the so-called title not only is no aid to a proper construction of the act, but the title, tested by every known definition of it, bears no relation to, and does not embrace, the crimes set out in the act. There is nothing in the statute open to construction. Its words are as simple and unambiguous as any that could have been used, and their meaning free from doubt. It is not "construing" that the statute needs, but amendment. That is what, with all deference, in my opinion this court has done to it.

For the reasons given, I do not think that § 3233 of the Revisal of 1905 can reasonably be held to give to the superior court of Union county jurisdiction over persons charged with offenses committed in Anson county and indicted in Union, under § 3698. I am of opinion that his Honor, Judge Shaw, was correct in quashing the bill.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

LOUISE B. SMITH

v.

SUSAN E. MOORE et al., Appts.

Evidence—transactions with deceased persons.

1. In an action to set aside a deed for fraud, evidence is not admissible as to statements made in the presence of the grantee by his attorney at the time of the execution of the deed, where the grantee is dead, under the statute forbidding the admission of evidence of transactions with a person since deceased,—especially where the attorney is dead also.

Same—declarations of deceased person.

2. Evidence of declarations by one in possession of real estate, that he has conveyed the property to another by deed based upon a meritorious consideration, is admissible, in a suit after his death, to set aside a purported deed on the ground of fraud in that the signature was procured under the representation that it was a will.

Same—effect on third persons.

3. In an action by a remainder-man to set aside a deed signed by himself and the life tenant, on the ground that it was procured under the representation that it was a will, declarations by the life tenant, since deceased, are admissible, to the effect that the estate had been conveyed, as tending to show that the alleged representations were not made.

Deed to agent—presumption—fraud.

4. A conveyance by one to his general agent having control and management of all his affairs, and who is his confidential adviser and friend, is presumed in law to be fraudulent; and the grantee has the burden of overcoming the presumption.

Same—withholding from record.

5. Upon the question of fraud in procuring the signature of a deed under a mis-

Case Note.—Effect of statute relating to the competency of a party to testify in regard to transactions or communications with a deceased person on the admissibility of his testimony as to transactions with the attorney or agent of such person:—

Owing to the various forms of statutes governing the competency of parties as witnesses in actions by or against the personal representatives of, or parties claiming through or under, deceased persons; some of which broadly declare the survivor an incompetent witness as to matters occurring before the other party's death, while others expressly make testimony of the kind under discussion admissible by creating an exception where the contract in issue was made with a person still living and competent to testify, or where the person deceased was represented in the transaction by an agent still living and capable of testifying,— representation as to its character, the jury may be permitted to consider the fact that it was kept off the record for a period of ten months.

Same—equitable estate—statute of uses.

The conveyance of his property by the remainder-man, in case property is devised in trust to hold it for the life of one person and convey the remainder to another, will, whether he has acquired the legal title or not, vest the remainder in the grantee; so that, upon the falling in of the life estate and termination of the trust, the statute will vest the use in the grantee, and perfect his title to the whole estate.

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for New Hanover County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to set aside a deed which was alleged to have been secured by fraud. Reversed.

Statement by Walker, J.:

The object of the action is to set aside a the scope of this note is limited to decisions as to the competency of a party to testify as to transactions with an agent of the deceased person, which involve statutes substantially like that construed in SMITH v. MOORE, restricting the incompetency of the party to personal transactions or communications with the deceased.

The essential inquiry, then, is whether the agent is so identified with his principal that a transaction with, or communication to, him is equivalent to a personal transaction or communication with his principal, within the meaning of the statute; and the general rule, which is subject, however, to an exception within which the case of SMITH v. MOORE falls, is that he is not.

In Bowie v. Hume, 13 App. D. C. 286, it was held that a statute providing that, "in actions by or against executors, administrators, or guardians, in which judgment may be rendered for or against them, neither party shall be allowed to testify against the other as to any transaction with, or statement by, the testator, intestate, or ward, unless called to testify thereto by the opposite party, or required to testify thereto by the court," did not render defendant incompetent to testify as to a transaction with an agent of plaintiff's testator, who was not present thereat. The court said: "The great and leading principle of this and similar statutory provisions is to preserve entire mutuality as between the parties, that each shall be competent, and required if necessary, to state his version of the transaction under investigation. It is important, therefore, to look to the parties in fact and who are actively engaged in the transaction, in order to get the real facts as they transpired, and as they may be remembered by all parties concerned. If the transaction involved has been conducted by an agent, and that agent be a competent witness to support his version of what occurred, there can be no good reason for excluding the other party to the transaction; and there does not appear to be anything in the terms of the statute to require such construction. We think the statute should receive a liberal construction in order to maintain the principle of mutuality, and that seems to be the construction adopted by other courts where similar statutes prevail."

deed for a lot in the city of Wilmington at the northeast corner of Second and Red Cross streets which was executed to Mr. Moore, the husband of the defendant Susan E. Moore, and the father of her codefendants, by Mrs. Mary E. Smith, and her daughter, the plaintiff, and which it is alleged was obtained by fraud. The lot was devised in 1862 by Samuel Frink, the father of Mrs. Mary E. Smith and grandfather of the plaintiff, to his son Lorenzo Frink and Henry Nutt and the survivor of them, in trust for the sole and separate use of his daughter, Mary E. Smith, for and during her life, and at her death to such of her children as should then be living and the issue of such as might be dead, the issue to take per stirpes. Mr. Nutt died in 1881, and on February 27, 1885, Lorenzo Frink conveyed the said lot "to Mary E. Smith for life with remainder to Louise B. Smith in fee, reciting in the deed that the lot had been devised to Mary E. Smith for her sole and separate use, so that it would not become liable for the debts of her then husband, that the latter had since died, leaving his cerned. If the transaction involved has been conducted by an agent, and that agent be a competent witness to support his version of what occurred, there can be no good reason for excluding the other party to the transaction; and there does not appear to be anything in the terms of the statute to require such construction. We think the statute should receive a liberal construction in order to maintain the principle of mutuality, and that seems to be the construction adopted by other courts where similar statutes prevail."

And in Andrews v. Hunt, 7 Mackey, 311, it was also held that such statute does not extend to transactions with the agents of the deceased.

In Ward v. Ward, 37 Mich. 253, and Smith v. Smith, 91 Mich. 7, 51 N. W. 694, it was held that a statute declaring the incompetency of the party to testify as to matters equally within the knowledge of the decedent is inapplicable to transactions with an agent of the decedent, where the decedent was not present.

In Pratt v. Elkins, 80 N. Y. 198, and Waterhouse v. Gilman, 6 N. Y. S. R. 283, it was held that testimony as to transactions with the agents of a deceased party is not within either the letter or the spirit of the statutory prohibition of testimony concerning personal transactions or communications between a party and the decedent.

A like conclusion was reached in Dodd v. Skelton, 2 Neb. (Unof.) 475, 89 N. W. 297.

In Hutchinson v. Cleary, 3 N. D. 270, 55 N. W. 729, it was said, obiter, that a conversation with an agent alone would not fall within a statute providing that, in actions against executors, administrators, heirs at law, or next of kin, neither party shall be allowed widow, Mary E. Smith, who was well advanced in years, and an only child, Louise B. Smith, his other children being dead without issue surviving them. He had three children, Rebecca Smith (who was the first wife of Mr. Moore and died in 1869 leaving one child who died in 1884), the plaintiff, and another who died without having married. Mrs. Mary E. Smith died intestate in April, 1895, and Mr. Moore died in 1900. The plaintiff attacked the deed from her mother and herself to Mr. Moore upon the ground that, at the time it was executed, his attorney stated to her in the presence of her mother and Mr. Moore that it was a will; that she was ill at the time and confined to her bed, and that she signed the deed thinking that it was a will, and she did not know it was a deed until after Mr. Moore's death. There was evidence in corroboration of the plaintiff's testimony, consisting of statements to the same effect made afterwards by her to other persons. It was admitted that Mr. Moore was "the agent, confidential friend, and adviser of the plaintiff and her mother." It was also in evidence that the plaintiff and her mother remained in possession of the premises conveyed by the deed until the mother's death, and that after her death the plaintiff has continued in possession to the present time. The deed to Mr. Moore was executed March 3, 1885, and registered January 23, 1886. The defendants introduced in evidence a paper writing in the form of a lease from Mr. Moore to Mary E. Smith and the plaintiff, dated March 15, 1885, by which he covenanted and agreed that they should occupy and possess the said lot "for and during the term of their joint lives, and after the death of either of them, then for the term of the natural life of the survivor of them, yielding and paying therefor annually on the 15th day of March in each and every year during the said terms one cent as rent." The plaintiff put in evidence a letter from Mrs. Smith to Mr. Moore's attorney, dated March 2, 1885, in which she expressed the greatest affection and esteem for her son-in-law, Mr. Moore, and referred in strong terms to his many kindnesses and to his sympathy for her; and further, to the fact that he had paid her taxes and insurance for twenty years, repaired her house, and in other ways assisted her in time of need. She states it to be her first to testify against the other as to any transaction whatever with, or statement by, the testator or intestate, unless called to testify thereto by the opposite party.

In Guillaume v. Flannery (S. D.) 108 N. W. 255, it was held that a statutory provision like the foregoing will not render a party incompetent to testify concerning any communications he may have had with persons representing the decedent.

On the other hand, in Cottrell v. Woodson, 11 Heisk. 681, it was held that such a statute was applicable to a contract made with the agent of plaintiff's intestate.

That the general rule as above stated is unaffected by the fact that the agent also may be dead, is held in Morgan v. Bunting, 86 N. C. 66, in which the statute under construction excluded testimony in regard to any transaction or communication between the witness and a person at the time of such examination deceased, insane, or lunatic, as a witness against the party then prosecuting or defendant, as executor, administrator, etc.; and in Voss v. King, 33 W. Va. 236, 10 S. E. 402, in which the statute provided that no party to any action should be examined as a witness in his own behalf in regard to any personal transaction or communication between such witness and a person then deceased, or against the executor, administrator, heir at law, etc., of such deceased person. In the latter case the court held that, where there has been a transaction or communication had personally by a party with an agent of the deceased person, such party is a competent witness under the statute to testify on his own behalf in reference thereto, against the executors, heirs, etc., of such deceased person; and that it can make no difference in principle whether the agent is dead or alive at the time the testimony is offered; saying: "The deceased person referred to in the statute is the principal in the transaction, and not the agent. According to what we may suppose to be the spirit of the statute, transactions or communications had personally with a deceased agent ought to be excluded; but, as the legislature did not see proper to so enact the law, we are not at liberty to disregard the plain and express terms of the statute upon any supposition or fanciful idea of its spirit, or what it ought, or the legislature might have intended it, to be."

The exception to the general rule, above referred to, occurs where the transaction with the agent takes place in the presence of the principal, in which case there are clearly grounds for regarding it as a personal transaction with the principal himself; and is supported by the case in hand and the decision in McRae v. Malloy, 90 N. C. 521, stated at length in the opinion therein.

In connection with this subject, reference may also be made to the closely related case of Dolan v. Leary, 69 App. Div. 459, 74 N. Y. Supp. 981, Affirmed without opinion in 174 N. Y. 540, 66 N. E. 1107, which holds a husband incompetent to testify as to the execution of deeds by his wife to an intermediary, and by the intermediary to the husband and wife jointly, on the ground that the transaction was in effect a personal transaction with the wife, who was then deceased.

and greatest wish, if she should outlive her child (the plaintiff), that the house and lot should "descend" to him and his children; and she evinced the greatest anxiety that he should own the lot free from any claims against her. Then she states that she gives to him all of her household furniture, books, pictures, and silver to dispose of as he thinks best. The plaintiff stated that this letter was introduced to show that the attorney was not authorized to draw a deed but a will. The defendants put in evidence the deposition of Mrs. Boudinot, and proposed to prove by her that Mrs. Smith, who was her sister, had stated to her that she had executed the deed to Mr. Moore, and gave substantially the same reasons for so doing as those set forth in the letter to the attorney. The testimony was excluded by the court, and the defendants excepted. On cross-examination she testified that Mrs. Smith had told her the deed had been executed, giving in detail what was said by her about the deed. She also stated that the plaintiff had told her "that she had signed a deed, and that she and her mother had fixed it all up." The defendants objected to the testimony of the plaintiff as to what was said to her by his attorney in the presence of Mr. Moore at the house, and also as to what was done at that time. The objection was overruled, and the defendants again excepted. It was shown that the attorney had died before this action was commenced. The court charged the jury that, if Mr. Moore was the agent of the plaintiff and her mother, and attended to their business, and they were in the habit of relying on him for advice, this would constitute such a confidential relation between them that from it the law raised a presumption of fraud, which would be evidence of fraud to be considered by the jury, and the burden would then rest on the defendants to show that the transaction was fair and honest, and, if they had failed to do so, the jury should answer the issue "Yes;" that this presumption was rebuttable, and if, upon all the evidence, the jury found that the transaction was fair and honest, they should answer the issue "No;" that the letter of March 2, 1885, did not authorize the attorney to draw a deed in fee simple, and that the listing of the property for taxes by Mr. Moore in the name of Mrs. Smith and after her death in the name of her heirs, the failure to register the deed from March 3, 1885, to January 23, 1886, and the continued possession of the lot by the plaintiff, were each circumstances to be considered by the jury. The defendants objected to that part of the charge as to the nonregistration of the deed. The court further charged that, if the jury should find the facts to be those related by the plaintiff in her testimony as to what occurred at the time the deed was executed, the transaction would be fraudulent and they should answer the issue "Yes;" but, if they did not find by the greater weight of the evidence that the execution of the deed was procured by fraud, they should answer the issue "No." The jury for their verdict found that the deed was procured by fraud, and, judgment having been entered thereon, the defendant appealed, and specially assigned as errors the several rulings and the instructions of the court to which exceptions had been taken.

Messrs. John D. Bellamy & Son and E. K. Bryan for appellee.

Walker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The testimony of the plaintiff as to what was said and done when Mr. Moore and his attorney were at her home for the purpose of having the deed executed was incompetent, because the witness, under the admitted circumstances of this case, was disqualified by the statute to speak of that matter, and not because the facts related were not pertinent to the inquiry. It is a principle of the common law, and one of its favorite maxims, as well as an indispensable requirement of justice, that they who are to decide shall hear both sides, giving the one an equal opportunity with the other of knowing what is urged against him and of making good his claim or defense, if he has any. This rule, so essential to the fair administration of the law, was embodied in the maxim, "No man should be condemned unheard" (audi alteram partem). At common law, no party to an action, or person having an interest in the event of the same, was permitted to testify in his own behalf, with certain well-defined exceptions. The legislature, deeming this exclusion to be founded upon an insufficient reason and to be unjust in itself, changed the law in this respect, and admitted interested parties as witnesses, subject to the wise provision that no such party should be allowed to testify in his own behalf against the other party representing a deceased person as to a transaction or communication between him and such deceased person. Code, §§ 589, 590; Revisal 1905, §§ 1629, 1631. So we see that the ancient principle of the law, to which we have referred, has been preserved in this enactment, and one of the parties to the transaction will not be heard if the other is dead and cannot, therefore, be called in reply. "The proviso rests on the ground, not merely that the dead man cannot have a fair showing, but upon the broader and more practical ground, that the other party to the action has no chance, even by the oath of a relevant witness, to reply to the oath of the party to the action, if he be allowed to testify. The principle is, unless both parties to a transaction can be heard on oath, a party to an action is not a competent witness in regard to the transaction." McCanless v. Reynolds, 74 N. C. 301. This construction was approved in Pepper v. Broughton, 80 N. C. 251, and the defendant forbidden, as a witness, to testify that he had not refused to speak to Lougee, his father-in-law, who was then deceased, although the plaintiff introduced testimony showing the mere declaration of Lougee that he had, and although both parties claimed under the deceased person. The idea was that the opposing testimony should be of the same kind, whereas, in fact, Pepper had only an unsworn declaration to stand against and overcome the proposed sworn testimony of Broughton. In McRae v. Malloy, 90 N. C. 521, the defendant proposed to show a conversation between himself and the attorneys of the plaintiff's intestate (who were then living, and who were present at the time of the communication) touching a matter relevant to the controversy. The testimony was excluded, and this court held the ruling to be correct, although the attorneys were still living at the time of the trial, and could have testified and thus arrayed two witnesses in behalf of the plaintiff against only one for the defendant, and he the defendant himself and therefore vitally interested. This seemed to present a strong reason for making an exception to the rule of exclusion, but the court adhered to the principle that the dead man could not be heard, and therefore the living one must not be. The attorneys were present and speaking and acting for their client, and with his constant and direct sanction in all that was said and done, and it was the same as if he had acted personally. Qui facit per alium facit per se. It will be observed that there the attorneys were living and here the attorney is dead. The case is directly in point and decisive of this one, though this is much stronger, if anything, than that one, by reason of the fact that the attorney is dead. The law is explicit that the one party shall not testify if the other cannot, and this without reference to the presence of third parties at the time of the transaction, unless the representative is himself examined in his own behalf, or the testimony of the deceased person is introduced, as to the same transaction. If we reverse the position of the parties on the record, Halyburton v. Dobson, 65 N. C. 88, is a case exactly like ours. There the plaintiff's testator, Harshaw, went with the defendant to the office of the testator's attorney, Pearson, who advised him to take certain money from the defendant, and the latter proposed to show this by his own testimony, it being material to the controversy. He was held to be incompetent, though he took no part in the conversation, which was confined to Pearson and Harshaw. Judge Reade, for the court, said: "The reason for the exception is apparent. There could never be a recovery against an unscrupulous party if he were permitted to testify where it would be impossible to contradict him. The statute ought to be construed in view of this mischief." The result is that, where an attorney acts or speaks for his client, or an agent for his principal, in their presence, the one is by the law thoroughly identified with his client and the other with his principal, as much so as if the attorney or agent had not been present at all and the client or principal had acted for himself, or the existence of the former had been merged into the latter. We thus preserve the saving principle of the law that the litigants must both be heard, each being given an equal chance, and equality of opportunity means that the one shall be silenced unless the other also is living and can speak. The court erred in admitting the testimony to which the defendants objected. This case is not like either Peacock v. Stott, 90 N. C. 518, or Johnson v. Townsend, 117 N. C. 338, 23 S. E. 271. There the deceased had been jointly interested with another person, who was present at the time of the transaction and who survived. Re Peterson, 136 N. C. 13, 48 S. E. 561. This is sufficient to dispose of the appeal did we not think other questions are raised which should be considered, as, in all probability, they will again be presented; and it is well to express our views in regard to them for the guidance of the judge who will preside at the next trial.

The second assignment of error, embracing the next six exceptions, relates to the exclusion of a part of Mrs. Boudinot's testimony which was taken by deposition.

She deposed, among other things, that Mrs. Smith, who was her sister, had told her that she had made a deed to Mr. Moore for the lot, and, in the conversation with her, used language substantially similar to that which is contained in her letter to Mr. Moore's attorney, dated March 2, 1885. It seems that the defendants, by questions 16 and 17, and her answers thereto, on the cross-examination, had received the full benefit of her testimony as to the fact that both the plaintiff and her mother, Mrs. Smith, had admitted the execution of the deed, or of the paper in question as a deed. But if the testimony of Mrs. Boudinot, which was excluded, is competent, it was error to reject it, and besides, all of what was said by Mrs. Smith to her sister, Mrs. Boudinot, is not included in the answers of the latter to questions asked on her cross-examination. We will therefore consider the competency of all that was said. The testimony was evidently ruled out by the court because it was regarded as nothing more than hearsay; but we think it comes within one of the well-known exceptions to the rule excluding such testimony. Declarations of a person, whether verbal or written, as to facts relevant to the matter of inquiry, are admissible in evidence, even as between third parties, where it appears: (1) That the declarant is dead; (2) that the declaration was against his pecuniary or proprietary interest; (3) that he had competent knowledge of the fact declared; (4) that he had no probable motive to falsify the fact declared. 1 Elliott, Ev. §§ 439-454, where the subject is fully discussed. The declaration is admissible as an entirety, including statements therein which were not in themselves against interest, but which are integral or substantial parts of the declaration, the reason why this is so being that the portion which is trustworthy, because against interest, imparts credit to the whole declaration. It will be well to consider the origin and development of these two principles separately. The earliest case on the subject of such declarations is Searle v. Barrington, 2 Strange, 826 (on appeal) 3 Bro. P. C. 593, 8 Mod. 278. In that case, decided in 1730, an indorsement of a payment of interest on a note was admitted to repel the statute of limitations. The case was ably argued and remarkably well considered. It originated in the court of King's bench, and was tried at Guildhall before Lord Raymond, then chief justice, who admitted the proof of payment, and afterwards it was heard in the exchequer chamber and the House of Lords respectively, where the ruling was sustained. It is regarded as the first and leading case, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) and is reviewed, in connection with the subsequent cases on the same question to the year 1833, in Gleadow v. Atkin (Exch.) 3 Tyrw. 289. It was there held, following the lead of the earlier case, that, as the declaration was against interest and as there was no motive to misrepresent, it was admissible, not only against privies in blood or estate, but against all the world. The rule as thus established is said to be founded on a knowledge of human nature. Self-interest induces men to be cautious in saying anything against themselves, but free to speak in their own favor. We can safely trust a man when he speaks against himself, and the law, in this instance, substitutes for the sanction of a judicial oath the more powerful one arising out of the sacrifice of a man's own interests. This natural disposition to speak in favor of, rather than against, interest, is so strong, that when one has declared anything to his own prejudice, his statement is so stamped with the image and superscription of truth that it is accepted by the law as proof of the correctness and accuracy of what was said, and the fact that it was against interest is taken as a full guaranty of its truthfulness in place, not only of an oath, but of cross-examination as well, they being the usual tests of credibility. A discussion of this rule of evidence, which shows how thoroughly it has been adopted by the courts, whether the declarations are in the form of mere words or of written entries, will be found in 1 Greenl. Ev. 16th ed. §§ 147-154; 2 Wigmore, Ev. §§ 1455-1471; McKelvey, Ev. pp. 254-261. The case of Higham v. Ridgway, 10 East, 109, 3 Smith, Lead. Cas. 9th Am. ed. 1607, recognized the principle to its fullest extent, and held that it embraced, not only the particular statement which was against interest, but others contained in it, Lord Ellenborough saying that it is idle to admit a part without the context. "All parts of the speech or entry may be admitted which appear to have been made while the declarant was in the trustworthy condition of mind which permitted him to state what was against his interest." 2 Wigmore, Ev. § 1465. Especially should the part of the declaration that is not dis-serving be admitted if it is not in itself self-serving and tending, therefore, to promote the interest of the declarant. In Queen v. Birmingham, 1 Best & S. 763, the rule was held to apply to oral declarations as well as to written entries or averments, the difference between the two affecting rather the weight than the competency of the testimony.

The three leading cases we have cited have been approved in the later decisions, and are regarded by the law writers as having firmly settled the principle to which they severally relate. 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 8-13; 16 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 1217-1222; Davies v. Humphreys (Exch.) 6 Mees. & W. 153; Warren ex dem. Webb v. Greenville, 2 Strange, 1129; Doe ex dem. Reece v. Robson, 15 East, 32; Doe ex dem. Baggalley v. Jones, 1 Campb. 367; Marks v. Lahee, 3 Bing. N. C. 408; Percival v. Nanson (Exch.) 7 Welsby, H. & G. 1; Queen v. Birmingham, 1 Best & S. 703; Doe ex dem. Smith v. Cartwright, 1 Car. & P. 216; Roe ex dem. Brune v. Rawlings, 7 East, 279; Middleton v. Melton, 10 Barn. & C. 319; Taylor v. Witham, L. R. 3 Ch. Div. 605. In the case last cited Sir George Jessel said: "It is no doubt an established rule in the courts of this country that an entry against the interest of the man who made it is receivable in evidence after his death for all purposes," and that the argument against its competency, based upon the nature of the particular evidence offered, as affecting its weight, has nothing to do with it. "The question of admissibility is not a question of value." The cases decided in this country are quite as emphatic and as much to the point. Elsworth v. Muldoon, 15 Abb. Pr. N. S. 440. That case also decides that it makes no difference whether the deceased and the party against whom the declaration is offered were in privity or not. Cases which are very instructive, and which review the English decisions at length, are Mahaska County v. Ingalls, 16 Iowa, 81; Livingston v. Arnoux, 56 N. Y. 519, Humes v. O'Bryan, 74 Ala. 78, and Halvorsen v. Moon & K. Lumber Co. 87 Minn. 18, 94 Am. St. Rep. 669, 91 N. W. 28. See also McDonald v. Wesendonck, 30 Misc. 601, 62 N. Y. Supp. 764; Heidenheimer v. Johnson, 76 Tex. 200, 13 S. W. 46; Quinby v. Ayers, 1 Neb. (Unof.) 70, 95 N. W. 464; Hinkley v. Davis, 6 N. H. 210, 25 Am. Dec. 457; Taylor v. Gould, 57 Pa. 152; Bartlett v. Patton, 33 W. Va. 71, 5 L.R.A. 523, 10 S. E. 21; Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Fitzgerald, 108 Ga. 507, 49 L.R.A. 175, 34 S. E. 316. They all support the doctrine of the leading cases we have cited. This species of evidence was at one time said to be anomalous and to stand on the ultima thule of competent testimony; but an unbroken line of decisions in England, and one almost so in this country, have established beyond question that verbal declarations are receivable under the conditions we have mentioned, even in controversies between third parties. The law is thus strongly stated in Hinkley v. Davis, supra; "In many cases where a man has the means of knowing a fact, and it is against his interest to admit it, his admission is evidence even against another person. The evidence results, in such a case, from the improbability of a man's admitting as true what he knows to be false, against his interest. In some cases such an admission is as strong against another person as it is against the person who makes it." Lord Ellenborough thus tersely presented somewhat the same view of the matter when, in Doe ex dem. Reece v. Robson, supra, he said: "The ground upon which this evidence has been received is that there is a total absence of interest in the persons making the entries [or declaration] to pervert the fact, and at the same time a competency in them to know it."

There is nothing that so strongly attests the truth of what a person declares, not even his oath and the searching light of a cross-examination, as when he has asserted the existence of a fact and it appears that his interest at the time lay the other way. Doe ex dem. Baggalley v. Jones, supra. The words of sacred writ, "He that sweareth to his own hurt and changeth not," were uttered long before the era of our jurisprudence, and set before us not only one of the most exalted attributes possessed by the exemplar of true virtue and probity, but embodied at the same time the highest standard by which we can safely gauge our trust and confidence in human testimony. It is not at all a matter for surprise, therefore, that the common-law jurists should have regarded it as a perfectly safe test for discerning the truth in judicial investigation. This rule of evidence has been fully adopted by this court, as its decisions will show. The principal case is Peck v. Gilmer, 20 N. C. 391 (4 Dev. & B. L. 249). Recognizing the authority of the cases at common law, to which we have referred, Judge Gaston, for the court, thus states the principle: "It is a well-established rule that where a person who has peculiar means of knowing a fact makes a declaration or a written entry of that fact which is against his interest at the time, such declaration or entry is, after his death, evidence of the fact as between third persons." This case was followed, and the rule as therein stated applied, in Peace v. Jenkins, 32 N. C. (10 Ired. L.) 355; Patton v. Dyke, 33 N. C. (11 Ired. L.) 237; Williams v. Alexander, 50 N. C. (5 Jones, L.) 162; Carr v. Stanley, 52 N. C. (7 Jones, L.) 131; Jones v. Henry, 84 N. C. 324, 37 Am. Rep. 624; McCanless v. Reynolds, 67 N. C. 268; Braswell v. Gay, 75 N. C. 515. We must not confuse these declarations with entries made in a due course of business or in the discharge of a public duty, nor with a declaration which accompanies and explains an act, and deemed, therefore, to be a part of the res gestæ (Yates v. Yates, 76 N. C. 142), because, while they are all admitted as evidence, they are not so admitted for the same reason.

We must now consider whether the declaration of Mrs. Smith to Mrs. Boudinot comes within the rule stated. Was it a declaration against her interest at the time she made it? We think it was. She was then in possession of the lot and ostensibly the owner thereof; and when she declared that she had parted with her title, and did not own the estate of which she was apparently seised, it could not be anything other than such a declaration. In Ivat v. Finch, 1 Taunt. 141, Lord Mansfield, speaking of the declaration of a party that she had assigned or transferred certain property, said: "The evidence ought to have been received, though undoubtedly such declarations would be entitled to a greater or less degree of attention according to the circumstances by which they were accompanied. The admission, supposed to have been made by Mrs. Watson, was against her own interest." The evidence was received. To the same effect are First Nat. Bank v. Holland, 99 Va. 501, 55 L.R.A. 155, 86 Am. St. Rep. 898, 39 S. E. 126; Queen v. Birmingham, supra; Chadwick v. Fonner, 69 N. Y. 404; Turner v. Tyson, 49 Ga. 165; Bowen v. Chase, 98 U. S. 254, 25 L. ed. 47. Cases which appear to be directly in point are Lyon v. Ricker, 141 N. Y. 225, 36 N. E. 189; Tuggle v. Hughes (Tex. Civ. App.) 28 S. W. 61, and Howell v. Howell, 47 Ga. 492. We have seen that any other statement associated in the declaration with the one against interest is just as competent as the latter, and especially is that true in a case like the one at bar where the collateral statement bears directly on the other, and tends to confirm and strengthen it. The deed to Mr. Moore is attacked for fraud, because what was in fact a deed was represented to be a will, and the declaration by Mrs. Smith to Mrs. Boudinot was, not only that she had made a deed, and therefore, knew the character and contents of the paper writing, but that she executed it upon a meritorious consideration, and substantially that she acted freely and voluntarily when she did so. What could be more against her interest than such a statement, and what could carry with it more conclusive evidence of its truth and accuracy? It was in disparagement of her apparent title and made at a time which was recent with respect to the date of the main transaction, when it must be supposed she had a clear recollection of what had occurred, and also long prior to the beginning of this controversy,—ante litem motam. Her interest was all on the side of herself and her daughter who lived with her, or at least it must now be supposed to have been that way, nothing else appearing. Her motive was a most commendable one,—gratitude for what Mr. Moore had done for her,—and she spoke with feeling and emphasis; but this does not have the effect in law, as the cases show, to rebut the presumption that she was declaring against her own interest. But it may be suggested that she was not in privity with her daughter, the plaintiff, as she had but a life estate and her daughter a contingent remainder, which, since the death of her mother, has become a vested one in interest and possession. This is true, but it does not prevent the application of the rule, for, the declaration being against interest, it is admitted because of the likelihood of its being true and of its general freedom from any reasonable probability of fraud or imposition, and is for that reason held to be competent as to third parties. It is not, therefore, within the principle of exclusion as being res inter alios acta. Lyon v. Ricker and Higham v. Ridgway, supra.

It may be further objected that, even if the declaration is otherwise competent, the fact that Mrs. Smith supposed she had executed a deed is not evidence that the plaintiff had the same opinion as to the nature of the instrument. There is every reason, we think, why, under the peculiar facts of the case, we should hold this objection to be untenable and the reason for it to be unsound. The allegation is that the deed was executed at the home of Mrs. Smith and her daughter, in the presence of Mr. Moore, the attorney, and some other persons who are now dead, the plaintiff being the sole survivor of those then present. The deed was executed by the mother and daughter then and there, and the alleged representation of the attorney was to both of them at that time. It was all one and the same transaction, without a single break in its continuity from beginning to end. Under such circumstances, can it be denied that the impression received by Mrs. Smith of what was said and done, the execution of the deed being a joint act, is at least some evidence as to what the true nature of the transaction was; and, as she heard what the attorney said, should it not be received as some evidence of what his words were and what they really meant; and finally, may it not safely be admitted to show that possibly the plaintiff is mistaken as to what was said and as to what did occur? Where two persons have equal opportunity of knowing a fact, one is as competent to give a correct version of it as the other, or at least should be. We frequently receive the evidence of two persons, one against the other, as to whether a certain thing was done or not, one testifying that he saw it done and the other that he did not. The declaration of Mrs. Smith was equivalent to her saying that she did not hear any such representation made as that which is imputed to the attorney, or that it was not in fact made, according as her testimony is construed. We are constrained to think that the evidence is both competent and relevant, and should be heard by the jury in its entirety.

Before taking leave of this part of the case, we will refer to three cases which seem to be very much in point just here. The first is that of Lamar v. Pearre, 90 Ga. 377, 17 S. E. 92, which bears a striking resemblance to our case in several of its features. There it was held, when it was attempted to establish a trust in certain property, that a declaration of a life tenant as to the subject under investigation was competent against the remainder-man, as it disparaged her own estate in the property, and was, therefore, against her interest; and that the additional statements relevant to the principal fact and embraced with it in the declaration against interest were also competent. In that case, as here, the life tenant and remainder-man acquired their interests under a settlement in trust for their benefit. The two cases are practically parallel. The second is Howell v. Howell, supra, in which the deed in question was attacked as having been procured by undue influence and fraud. The declarations of the donor were held competent to show that he knew the nature and contents of the paper, and to repel the imputation of fraud. The third is Bowen v. Chase, supra, which, while not precisely like the other two cited cases, nor like our case, in the object for which the suit was brought, is, in its main features, and so far as the general question now being discussed is concerned, enough like them to be an important authority in support of the principle we have already stated and applied. The cases in our own reports which approach more nearly than any others to a decision of the very question here presented, are Peace v. Jenkins and Patton v. Dyke, supra.

The fact that the plaintiff relies on the continued possession of the lot by herself and her mother, after making the deed, as evidence of the false representation, imparts still greater significance to the mother's declaration; as, from her declaration the jury might have found that she did not so regard the retention of possession by her and her daughter, and that the latter shared in that view, the fraud being alleged to have been practised upon both of them at the same instant of time, and it being, therefore, at least probable that it produced the same impression upon both. Speaking with reference to a case somewhat similar, Judge Nash said: "The declarations were made by a man, upon the subject in controversy, against his interest, and when he could have no conceivable interest to declare that which was not true." Peace v. Jenkins, supra. And so we say here concerning the declaration in question. The text-books and the cases do not justify the statement that this species of evidence is anomalous in character and approaches the verge of admissible testimony, for even a cursory examination of the authorities will show that it is well-nigh universally conceded to be an established exception to the rule excluding hearsay, and an unshakable principle in the law of evidence. As Lord Ellenborough said in the opening passage of his opinion in Higham v. Ridgway, 10 East, 109: "I should be extremely sorry if anything fell from the court upon this occasion which would in any degree break in upon those sound rules of evidence which have been established for the security of life, liberty, and property; but, in declaring our opinion upon the admissibility of the evidence in question, we shall lay down no rule which can induce such ruinous consequences, nor go beyond the limits of those cases which have been often recognized, beginning with that of Warren ex dem. Webb v. Greenville," 2 Strange, 1129.

Having disposed of this exception, we now proceed to consider the remaining questions in their order.

We cannot sustain the exception to the instruction of the court that, from the relation of the parties, Mr. Moore being the "agent, confidential friend, and adviser of the plaintiff and her mother," the law raised a presumption of fraud as to any transaction between them, which is evidence of fraud to be considered by the jury, and imposes upon the defendants the burden of showing that the transaction was fair and honest, and that, if the defendants had failed so to do, the jury should answer the issue as to fraud, "Yes." With reference to fiduciary relations from which presumptions of fraud or undue influence are raised, that of principal and agent is thus classified:

(1) When one is the general agent of another, and has entire management of his affairs, so as in effect to be as much his guardian as the regularly appointed guardian of an infant, a presumption of fraud, as matter of law, arises from a transaction between the agent and his principal for the latter's benefit, and it will be decisive of the issue in favor of the principal unless it is rebutted. (2) When the only relation is that of friendly intercourse and habitual reliance for advice and assistance and occasional employment in matters of business as agent, a presumption of fact only is raised from such a transaction which may be strong or slight according to circumstances. The latter is for the jury to consider and act upon. Lee v. Pearce, 68 N. C. 76; Timmons v. Westmoreland, 72 N. C. 587; 1 Bigelow, Fr. (1890) p. 295. "When a party, complaining of a particular transaction, such as a gift, sale, or contract, has shown to the court the existence of a fiduciary or a confidential relation between himself and the defendant, and that the defendant occupied the position of trust or confidence therein, the law raises a suspicion, or, it is often said, a presumption, of fraud; a suspicion or presumption, arising as matter of law, that the transaction brought to the notice of the court was effected through fraud or, what comes to much the same thing, undue influence by reason of his occupying a position affording him peculiar opportunities for taking advantage of the complaining party. Having special facilities for committing fraud upon the party whose interests have been intrusted to him, the law, looking to the frailty of human nature, requires the party in the superior situation to show that his action has been honest and honorable." 1 Bigelow, Fr. pp. 261 et seq. This presumption is raised where there have been dealings between the parties, because of the advantage which the situation of the parties respectively gives to one over the other. The doctrine rests on the idea, not that there actually was, but that there may have been, fraud; and an artificial effect is given to the fiduciary relation beyond its natural tendency to produce belief of the fact that fraud really existed. Lee v. Pearce, supra. It does not appear clearly from the evidence or the admission whether or not Mr. Moore was the general agent of the plaintiff and her mother at the time the deed was executed, and had the management of their entire business; nor does it appear what was the nature and scope of his agency. It is merely said that he was their agent. We take it that this was intended to mean a general agency investing him with control and management of all of their affairs, and so considered, in connection with the other part of the admission, that he was also their confidential friend and adviser, we think the charge of the court was correct. In Lee v. Pearce, the chief justice, referring to the facts of that case (68 N. C. at page 87), says: "Our case would seem, from what appears by the statement sent, to come under the last instance [second class mentioned above], for there is no evidence that Pearce was the general agent of Mrs. Lindsay, intrusted with the management of all of her affairs or business, although he was looked up to by her, and relied on for advice and assistance, and frequently acted as her agent in buying wood and leasing her property; all of which evidence should be passed upon by a jury, as raising a presumption of fraud or undue influence, and as being a link in a chain of circumstantial evidence." It may be that the proof at the next trial will disclose just such a relation as there described, and change the nature of the presumption or weaken its force. Be this as it may, we do not think his Honor, upon the facts as presented at the trial, and, as we now construe them, misapplied the rule, as stated in Lee v. Pearce. The presumption of fraud is, of course, a rebuttable one.

The last assignment of error questions the correctness of the charge so far as it relates to Mr. Moore's failure to register the deed from the day of its date, March 3, 1885, to January 3, 1886, it being ten months. In the trial of questions of fraud the evidence necessarily takes a wide range, and great latitude is allowed in adducing proof, to disclose the true nature of the transaction; and it has been said to be enough if the evidence falls within a broad interpretation of the rule of relevancy. Circumstances very slight and apparently trivial in themselves are permitted to be shown in connection with the other facts in order to sustain the allegation of fraud. 1 Bigelow, Fr. 146. The plaintiff does not contend that Mr. Moore was compelled to register the deed under the statute, it being good as between the parties without registration, which is required only to protect the grantee against creditors and subsequent purchasers. Nadal v. Britton, 112 N. C. 180, 16 S. E. 914. But she says that withholding this deed from record was some evidence of a purpose to conceal it, so that the public could not see it and thereby diminish the chance of the grantor's discovering that it was a deed instead of a will. While perhaps very slight evidence and inconsequential in itself, we yet think that it was a circumstance to be left to the jury with the other facts. But the court should be careful, in submitting it, to direct their attention also to the fact that the deed was registered on January 3, 1886, and has remained on the record to the bringing of this suit. This fact they should consider in connection with the other, in order to determine what weight they will give to the latter.

We have discussed all of the exceptions as they may be repeated if there is another appeal and we had not done so; but we order a new trial because of the error committed in permitting the plaintiff to testify as to what the attorney said in the presence and hearing of herself and her grantee, now deceased.

The plaintiff's counsel contended that the deed of Lorenzo Frink to her and her mother vested the legal title in them in trust to serve the uses declared in the will of Samuel Frink, and that Mr. Moore, under the deed to him, took the title in the same plight as they formerly held it. It is not necessary to discuss this proposition so far as the life estate of Mrs. Smith is concerned, as it terminated at her death, and is therefore out of the way. But see Cameron v. Hicks, 141 N. C. 21, 53 S. E. 728. If the plaintiff acquired the legal title by the deed of the trustee, Lorenzo Frink, it either merged with her equitable estate; or, if it was held by her separately from it, as contended, then when Mrs. Smith died, there being no longer any need for the separation of the two estates, the plaintiff's contingent remainder having become a vested one, the statute, if she had not conveyed to Mr. Moore, would have transferred the seisin or possession to the use. By her deed to Mr. Moore, she passed both the legal and equitable estate held by her,—that is, all the interest she then had,—and when Mrs. Smith died the statute executed the use in the same manner, if he who was then entitled to the use had not already, in another way, acquired the seisin and the operation of the statute was not, therefore, required to vest it in him. It is not necessary to inquire whether the deed of Lorenzo Frink had the effect to convey his legal title, as the same result would follow if it did not have that effect, for in that case it would have descended to his heirs charged with the trust, and their seisin would, at the death of Mrs. Smith, have been transferred to the use, as it was no longer required to remain in them to serve the purposes of the trust. Cameron v. Hicks, supra. If the plaintiff did not acquire the legal title by the deed of Lorenzo Frink, or if she did and it was held by her separate from the use, her deed, she having at the time a contingent remainder, was sufficient to pass the latter to Mr. Moore, by way of equitable assignment, and operated not merely as an executory contract to convey, but as an executed one by way of passing her interest. This was expressly decided in the recent case of Kornegay v. Miller, 137 N. C. 659, 107 Am. St. Rep. 505, 50 S. E. 315, where the subject is so fully and clearly discussed by Mr. Justice Connor as to make it unnecessary that we should pursue the inquiry any further. See also Cheek v. Walker, 138 N. C. 440, 50 S. E. 863; Gray v. Hawkins, 133 N. C. 1, 45 S. E. 363; Bodenhamer v. 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Welch, 89 N. C. 78; Watson v. Smith, 110 N. C. 6, 28 Am. St. Rep. 665, 14 S. E. 640. So that, quacunqve via data, Mr. Moore got the complete and perfect title, legal and equitable, by the transaction, and his widow and her heirs are entitled to keep and enjoy the same, unless the deed to him was obtained by the fraud charged in the complaint, or can in some other way be invalidated.

For the reason we have already stated, a new trial is awarded.

New trial.

FAYETTE NATIONAL BANK, Plff. in Err.,
v.

C. G. SUMMERS.

(105 Va. 689, 54 S. E. 862.)

Check—deposit—bank as owner.

1. Whether or not a bank receiving and crediting to a depositor a check on another bank is entitled to enforce it as owner depends upon its having been the intention of the parties that the deposit shall be treated as cash, which fact is to be determined by the jury.

Sale—false representations—repudiation—payment.

2. One who repudiates the purchase of a horse because of false representations on the part of the seller, and turns him into a pasture where he is injured so that he has to be killed, cannot defeat recovery on the purchase-money note so far as the animal had a value at the time the contract was repudiated.

(September 13, 1906.)

Case Note.—Title of bank to check drawn on another bank, which has been credited to depositor: —When checks or other commercial paper are deposited in a bank, indorsed, "For collection," or where there is a definite understanding that such is the purpose of the parties at the time of deposit,—there is no question that the title to the paper remains in the depositor. So, checks deposited as checks do not give rise to the relation of debtor and creditor, and the title to them remains in the depositor, the bank merely acting as an agent of the depositor for the purpose of collection. First Nat. Bank v. Greenville Nat. Bank, 84 Tex. 40, 19 S. W. 334; Rapp v. National Secur. Bank, 136 Pa. 426, 20 Atl. 508; Baillie v. Augusta Sav. Bank, 95 Ga. 277, 51 Am. St. Rep. 74, 21 S. E. 717.

If, on the other hand, there is a definite understanding at the time of the deposit that such paper is deposited as cash, it is ERROR to the Circuit Court for Pulaski County to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to enforce payment of a promissory note. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. T. L. Massie for plaintiff in error.

Mr. J. C. Wyssor for defendant in error.

Keith, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

Upon the trial of an action of assumpsit brought by the Fayette National Bank against C. G. Summers, there was a verdict and judgment for the defendant, and the case is before us upon a writ of error allowed by one of the judges of this court.

The plaintiff, to maintain the issues at the trial, introduced a check drawn on the Pulaski National Bank by C. G. Summers to the order of John T. Hughes for $500 dated October 26, 1903. This check was indorsed by Hughes to the Fayette National Bank, and, when presented for payment, was duly protested. It appears that this check was given to Hughes for the purchase price of a horse. Summers was engaged in the business of breeding saddle horses, and went to Kentucky to purchase a stallion. There he met with John T. Hughes, who lived at Lexington, and told him that he wished the horse for breeding purposes, and wanted a horse that carried a high, straight tail, as he wished to breed it for his own use and profit, and that a horse carrying a low, crooked tail was not good for breeding purposes, as that quality would be transmitted clear that the title passes to the bank. But, where a check is deposited without any definite understanding as to the way it is to be treated, but is credited to the bank by the depositor as cash, and is so entered upon the depositor's pass book, the question frequently arises whether the title to the check passes immediately to the bank, or remains in the depositor.

Prima facie, according to the weight of authority, the passing to the credit of the depositor, of a check bearing an indorsement, not indicating that it was deposited for collection merely, passes the title to the bank. Some cases, which cannot be reconciled with this view and must therefore be regarded as opposed to it, will be cited at the close of the note.

In the meantime, however, it is to be observed that, according to the weight of authority, the rule above stated is not an absolute rule, and is prima facie merely, and yields to the intention of the parties, expressed or implied from the circumstances.

Some of the cases which have applied the rule, and accordingly held that the title passed to the bank, have clearly recognized its prima facie character, and its subordination to the intention of the parties.

Thus, in Re State Bank, 56 Minn. 119, 45 Am. St. Rep. 454, 57 N. W. 336, it was held that the general rule is that, upon a deposit being made by a customer in a bank in the ordinary course of the business, of money, drafts, or other negotiable paper received and credited as money, the title to the money, drafts, or other paper immediately passes to the bank, which thereby becomes debtor to the depositor for the amount, and, if no facts appear except these, they will be held conclusively to show that such is the intention of the parties; but the question is wholly one of intention of the parties, and neither the fact that the indorsement of the paper by the customer is unrestricted, nor the fact that he is, before collection, credited with the amount on his account, with the privilege of drawing against it, will conclusively show that the title is in the bank, when the intention of the parties is to the contrary. This decision was followed in South Park Foundry & Mach. Co. v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. 75 Minn. 186, 77 N. W. 796.

And, in Bank of Gunterville v. Webb, 108 Ala. 132, 19 So. 14, a deposit by the payee of a sight draft with a bill of lading attached was held a sale and sufficient to pass title, although the drawer afterwards paid part of the draft to the payee, and the deposit slip was indorsed, "To be paid when collected," where the depositor could not read the deposit slip, and the bank paid a portion of the draft to him upon his check at the time of the deposit, and he claimed that the understanding with the bank at the time was that it was to be considered a sale.

The intention of the parties as the controlling factor may be shown in different ways, as, for instance, by the right accorded to the depositor to draw upon the funds.

Thus, in Fourth Nat. Bank v. Mayer, 89 Ga. 108, 14 S. E. 891, where a regular customer of a bank deposited with the bank his draft payable to his own order and indorsed, "For deposit to the credit of" the drawer, and the same was entered to his credit on the books of the bank, and the drawer, by course of dealing, had the right to draw against such deposit, and in fact did draw against it, and his checks were honored, it was held that the title to the draft passed to the first bank, and, when collected by the second, the proceeds were not subject to garnishment at the instance of a creditor of the drawer, such proceeds being the property not of the drawer, but of the first bank. This case distinguished Freeman v. Exchange Bank, 87 Ga. 45, 13 S. E. 160, where the facts were almost identical, except that in the latter case it did not appear that the depositor had the right to draw against the proceeds of the check before they were collected.

And in Williams v. Cox, 97 Tenn. 555, 37 S. W. 282, where a depositor sent a check with an unrestricted indorsement to the bank, with the direction that it be credited to his account, and the bank treated it as such, and immediately honored checks of to its offspring. Hughes showed Summers a horse four years of age, stated that it was a thoroughbred, but had not been registered; that it was sound and carried a high, straight tail. Summers drove and rode the horse, and had it ridden and driven for him, examined it carefully, and noticed a small scar under the horse's tail and called Hughes's attention to it. Hughes stated that he had not noticed it before, but that he knew it had not been cut for the purpose of straightening the tail, as he had raised the horse.

After bringing the horse home, Summers discovered that in driving him he would carry his tail well and straight for a time, but, upon becoming fatigued, he would hold it to one side. There was no other fault found with the horse than the one mentioned.

Having discovered this defect, Summers determined not to pay the check, and instructed the bank to protest it when presented for payment, and then wrote Hughes that the horse had been misrepresented to him, that he did not carry a high, straight tail, and that he did not want it, as it was valueless to him for breeding purposes. Having notified Hughes that the horse did not suit him, and that he would not pay the check, he turned it out in the pasture where the horse broke one of its legs and was killed. Upon examination of its tail after death, evidence was found that an operation had been performed upon its tail, leaving a the depositor, drawn upon the proceeds, it was held that these facts clearly indicated the intention of the parties to treat the deposit as cash, and the title to the check would pass, in the absence of any proof that it was intended for collection. And to the same effect are Friberg v. Cox, 97 Tenn. 550, 37 S. W. 283, and Showalter v. Cox, 97 Tenn. 547, 37 S. W. 286.

Some cases emphasize the form of the indorsement as a feature indicating what the intention of the parties is.

Thus, in Ditch v. Western Nat. Bank, 79 Md. 192, 23 L.R.A. 164, 47 Am. St. Rep. 375, 29 Atl. 72, 138, where, on an indorsement, "For deposit," a check was credited as cash by the bank which received it, and thereafter, by an indorsement in the same form, was transferred to another bank, which in good faith credited it as cash and paid the proceeds to the former bank, which afterwards made an assignment for creditors, it was held that the title to the check was in the bank which held it and had paid for it. In this case the court lays particular stress upon the form of indorsement, and the decision is in harmony with Tyson v. Western Nat. Bank, 77 Md. 412, 23 L.R.A. 161, 26 Atl. 520, which held that entering the amount of commercial paper deposited with a bank, "For collection," as cash in the pass book of the depositor, and to his credit on the books of the bank, would not pass to the bank the title to the paper if it was not intended to be an absolute credit, but was to be charged back if not collected.

And in Hoffman v. First Nat. Bank, 46 N. J. L. 604, it was held that a check indorsed generally and deposited in a bank, and passed to the credit of the depositor on the books of the bank, became the property of the bank, and the bank became liable to the depositor to pay any checks drawn against the deposit. The court said that, had the deposit of the check been intended for collection only, such intention should have been made clear by the addition of the words, "For collection," to the indorsement.

and credited partly as cash and partly as payment of overdrafts, it was held, in Titus v. Mechanics' Nat. Bank, 35 N. J. L. 588, that the bank became the owner of the checks as fully as if they had been legal-tender notes or bank bills; and, if there was any evidence to take the case out of the general rule, it should have been submitted to the jury to determine whether the bank took the checks as cash or otherwise.

Where a customer had a deposit account in a bank, to which checks deposited by him were credited by the bank, and against which he was accustomed to draw, it was held, in Security Bank v. Northwestern Fuel Co. 58 Minn. 141, 59 N. W. 987, that the title to a check payable to his own order, and indorsed, "For deposit," in the bank to the credit of the depositor, would pass to the bank, such indorsement being held not to be restrictive or qualified, in the absence of any positive and different understanding.

The general course of dealing between the bank and the depositor is frequently mentioned as an indication of the intention of the parties. In a number of cases this feature is especially emphasized.

Thus, in St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnston, 23 Blatchf. 489, 27 Fed. 243, where a draft was deposited in a bank, and the amount of the draft was credited by the bank on its books to the plaintiff as a cash item, it was held that the title passed to the bank, and the transaction was equivalent to a discount of the paper by the bank. In the course of its opinion, the court said: "When it appears that it has been the uniform practice between the parties in their past dealings to treat deposits of paper as deposits of cash, their intention to do so in the particular transaction should be inferred, in the absence of new and inconsistent circumstances. . . . If a bank does not wish to assume the relation of a debtor for the paper to the depositor, this intention may be manifested in a very explicit manner by crediting the paper as paper."

It was held in Midland Nat. Bank v. Roll, 60 Mo. App. 585, that while, ordinarily, an indorsement, "For collection," or an indorse-scar, to which Summers had called the attention of Hughes.

On the part of the bank, it was shown that Hughes indorsed the check to the Fayette National Bank, which placed the proceeds to his credit; that, upon receiving notice of the protest of the check, the bank, without the knowledge of Hughes, charged the check back to him. As soon as Hughes was made aware of this fact he protested against this being done, and insisted that there was no liability upon him with respect to the check, except as indorser upon it, and that the bank must proceed to make the money out of the drawer of the check. Thereupon the bank did as directed, credited Hughes with the amount of the check, and instituted this suit.

ment, "For collection and credit," does not carry the title to the paper, yet, when such an indorsement is made in pursuance of an understanding and dealings between the parties, whereby the check is taken, credited, and treated as a cash deposit subject to the check, the ordinary rule does not obtain, and the title passes; and the charging back to the account of the depositor of the amount of such check does not necessarily reinvest the title in the depositor, nor conclude the bank upon the question of title.

One of the leading cases upon the subject of title to checks deposited in a bank is Metropolitan Nat. Bank v. Loyd, 90 N. Y. 530, where certain checks were deposited in a bank for collection, and, at the same time, others were deposited and entered as cash on the depositor's pass book; and, as to the latter checks, it was held that the title passed to the bank, and that they were not again subject to the depositor's control. The court said: "It is true no express agreement was made transferring the check for so much money, but it was delivered to the bank and accepted by it, and the bank gave Murray credit for the amount, and he accepted it. That was enough. The property in the check passed from Murray and vested in the bank. He was entitled to draw the money so credited to him, for as to it the relation of debtor and creditor was formed, and the right of Murray to command payment at once was of the very nature and essence of the transaction. . . . If, as the appellant insists, the check had been deposited for a specific purpose,—for collection, the property would have remained in the depositor, but there is no evidence upon which such fact could be established, nor is it consistent with the dealings between the parties, or with any of the admitted circumstances. These show that it was the intention of both parties to make the transfer of the check absolute, and not merely to enable the bank to receive the money upon it as Murray's agent."

And there is a long line of decisions in New York state holding that the prima facie rule is that the title passes when the check is passed to the credit of the depositor. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

There is no evidence that the bank had any knowledge whatever of any equities or set-offs existing between Hughes and Summers when it in the first instance passed the amount of the check to the credit of Hughes.

Both plaintiff and defendant asked for instructions, all of which were refused by the court, which then proceeded to instruct the jury as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that if they shall believe from the evidence that the plaintiff bank received the check which is the . . . of this suit as a deposit to be treated as cash, and that such was the intention of the parties (Hughes and the bank), at the time the check was received and deposited, then title to said check passed to the bank at that time. But, if the jury shall or, but the intention of the parties governs; and that the intention may be shown by usage, the custom of the depositor and the bank, by the form of the indorsement, or otherwise. Among these cases may be noted: Re Franklin Bank, 1 Paige, 249, 19 Am. Dec. 413; Commercial Bank v. Hughes, 17 Wend. 94; Clark v. Merchants' Bank, 2 N. Y. 380; Ætna Nat. Bank v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 46 N. Y. 82, 7 Am. Rep. 314; Cragie v. Hadley, 99 N. Y. 131, 52 Am. Rep. 9, 1 N. E. 537; Market Bank v. Hartshorne, 3 Keyes, 137; Riverside Bank v. Woodhaven Junction Land Co. 34 App. Div. 359, 54 N. Y. Supp. 266; People v. St. Nicholas Bank, 77 Hun, 159, 28 N. Y. Supp. 407; Justh v. National Bank, 4 Jones & S. 273; Gordon v. Rasines, 5 Misc. 192, 25 N. Y. Supp. 767; Moore v. Riverside Bank, 25 Misc. 720, 55 N. Y. Supp. 615; Walton v. Riverside Bank, 29 Misc. 304, 60 N. Y. Supp. 519; National Citizens' Bank v. Howard, 3 How. Pr. N. S. 511. And in Brooks v. Bigelow, 142 Mass. 6, 6 N. E. 766, this rule was held to be the law in New York state.

Other cases, which hold that the title to the check did not pass to the bank, are reconcilable with the cases above cited, holding that the title did pass, for the reason that the former more or less clearly stated or implied that prima facie the title passes to the bank, but that the prima facie showing was overcome by circumstances indicating a different intention in the particular instance.

Thus, the facts that a depositor kept an account in the defendant bank, made from time to time remittances to it, and drew drafts upon it, and had an arrangement with it whereby he was allowed interest upon his average balances, were held in Scott v. Ocean Bank, 23 N. Y. 289, not sufficient to show that a bill of exchange deposited with the bank became its property, where it was not shown that the bill had been credited to the depositor, or was intended to be so credited as cash until the same should be paid.

And in Middlesex County v. State Bank, 32 N. J. Eq. 467, where the state treasurer, on hearing that one of his depository banks believe from the evidence that the parties intended that the bank should not receive said check as cash, but only as an agent for collection, then title to said check did not vest in the bank at the time of the deposit.

"The court further tells the jury the question as to whether the parties intended the check when deposited to be treated as cash, or merely for collection, is one of fact for the jury, under all the facts and circumstances proved in the case, relating thereto and throwing light thereon.

"If the jury shall believe from the evidence that the parties (Hughes and the bank), at the time the check was received and deposited, intended that the same should be treated as cash, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this action, unless they further believe from the evidence that, at the time of the deposit, the plaintiff had notice of the matters affecting Hughes's right to recover on said check, if any.

"But, if the jury shall believe from the evidence that the check was intended by the parties to be deposited merely for collection, then the plaintiff cannot claim to be a purchaser for value, and without notice of the matters affecting the consideration of the check; but, if the jury shall believe that after said check was protested the bank purchased the check, it is entitled to recover whatever amount of said check, if any, the jury may find due after allowing any offsets, if any, they may find due under the evidence, on account of the matters alleged in defendant's special plea."

We are of opinion that these instructions correctly apply the law to the facts of the case.

"Checks deposited and credited as cash do was embarrassed, drew on that bank, and deposited the draft in another bank, for which he was given credit as cash on its books, it was held that the bank, by such credit, did not in any wise make the draft its own, as it was the intention of the treasurer merely to have his check collected, the bank acting solely as his agent.

In Strong v. King, 35 Ill. 9, 85 Am. Dec. 336, it was held that, if a check was deposited in the usual course of business, the presumption would be that it was for collection merely, and not as money. This decision seems to be opposed to the rule that prima facie the title passes; but the court appears to have based its decision upon the ground that in the ordinary course of business deposits would be received by a teller, and according to the usage of banks a teller would not have the right to receive paper in any way other than for collection. And the court evidently did not intend to depart from the general rule, as it stated further on in the opinion: "If, however, a banker receives a check as and for so much money, and gives the depositor credit therefor, such an act is an appropriation of the check by the holder, and operates as a payment of the bill for which it was received from the moment the deposit was made. And from that time the check becomes the absolute property of the banker with whom it is deposited."

Where there was a tacit agreement between the parties, as shown by their course of dealing, that, though the amount of the check was credited to the depositor and he could draw against it, yet, if the papers so deposited were not paid on presentation, the amount thereof was to be charged up to the depositor's account, or taken off his next deposit slip, it was held, in Armour Packing Co. v. Davis, 118 N. C. 548, 24 S. E. 365, that such a deposit was a mere bailment for collection.

Some cases apply the rule that the title passes to the bank, without intimating that it is dependent upon, or liable to be defeated by, the intention of the parties;

though the silence on this point probably furnishes but little, if any, support to the view that the rule is an absolute one, and will not yield to a contrary intention of the parties.

Thus, in First Nat. Bank v. Dickson, 6 Dak. 301, 50 N. W. 124, certificates of deposit had been received and credited as cash in a bank, and, while on their way for collection, were attached by a creditor of the depositor, upon hearing which the bank charged them back to the depositor. In an action for the value of the certificates, the court held that the title was not re-vested in the depositor by the act of the bank.

Where tax receipts were received by a bank in good faith as deposits, and credited as so much money, it was held, in Wasson v. Lamb, 120 Ind. 514, 6 L.R.A. 191, 16 Am. St. Rep. 342, 22 N. E. 729, that the bank became at once legally liable to the depositor as for so much cash deposited. The court said: "Upon principle, there can be no reason why, if parties choose to treat a deposit of paper or other securities as cash, so that it is available to the depositor as cash, the transaction should not be regarded as equivalent to a deposit of money."

And where the checks and drafts were indorsed by the depositor at the time the deposit was made, and his account was credited for the whole sum in cash, and a like credit was given upon the pass books, against which amount under a course of dealings the depositor had a right to draw immediately, it was held, in Ayres v. Farmers' & M. Bank, 79 Mo. 421, 49 Am. Rep. 235, that the check so deposited became at once the property of the bank, and the bank became the debtor of the depositor to the amount of the check so deposited. And this decision is followed in Bullene v. Coates, 79 Mo. 426; Flannery v. Coates, 80 Mo. 444; and Kavanaugh v. Farmers' Bank, 59 Mo. App. 540.

So, also, in American Exch. Nat. Bank v. Gregg, 37 Ill. App. 425 (Reversed on another not become the property of the bank, . . . even though the depositor has been allowed to check against the deposit before the paper is collected, and the depositor can recover the check or other paper." Morse, Banks & Banking, 4th ed. § 586.

In National Commercial Bank v. Miller, 77 Ala. 173, 54 Am. Rep. 50, it is said: "When a check is deposited it is taken generally for collection by the bank as the agent of the depositor, and the bank does not owe the amount until its collection is accomplished. It may be that, if it is passed to the credit of the depositor, and mingled with the general funds of the bank, it is prima facie a payment on deposit; but the bank may permit, as matter of favor and convenience, checks to be drawn against it before payment; the depositor in the event of non-payment being responsible for the sums drawn, not by reason of his indorsement, the check not having ceased to be his property, but for money paid."

Conceding that there was a false representation upon which the defendant was entitled to a set-off against the check, it still appears that the horse was of considerable value for other than breeding purposes; in other words, that the damages sustained by reason of the false representation did not go to the full amount of the check, which represented the entire value of the horse. The defendant, Summers, admits that the horse was worth $125, and there was other evidence tending to prove that it was of even greater value. The verdict of the jury, which denied the right of the plaintiff to recover anything, ought to have been set aside by the trial court as contrary to the evidence.

For these reasons, its judgment must be reversed, and a new trial awarded.

point in 138 Ill. 596, 32 Am. St. Rep. 171, 28 N. E. 830), it was held that the general rule is that, a deposit having been made by a customer in a bank in the ordinary course of the business, of checks credited as money, the title to the checks immediately vests in the bank and becomes its property; and the subsequent failure of the bank to realize on the paper is not a circumstance which will excuse it from performing its implied contract to honor the checks of the depositor, drawn against such credit.

So, also, in American Trust & Sav. Bank v. Guelder & P. Mfg. Co. 150 Ill. 336, 37 N. E. 227, where a check was indorsed, "For deposit," and was received by the bank through the mail, and, upon receipt of the check, the bank gave the depositor credit for its amount on the depositor's account, the same as though it had been cash, and the depositor became entitled at once to draw upon the amount, it was held that the deposit was, in legal effect, a negotiation of the check, so as to vest the legal title thereto in the banker, with the right on his part to charge it back to the depositor in case it was not paid. Although the right of the bank to charge back the amount would appear to indicate that the transaction was a bailment, the court said: "The transaction, then, was one which, in the absence of fraud, would have passed the title irrevocably to" the bank.

And where a person deposited a check in a bank, and had the amount placed in a pass book by the officers of the bank, and took possession of the pass book as his own, it was held, in Rawls v. Saulsbury, 66 Ga. 394, that the relation of debtor and creditor existed between the depositor and the bank, the bank becoming the depositor's debtor to the amount charged in the bank book.

Where a forged check of a customer was received by a bank as cash, and passed to the credit of a depositor (who was ignorant of the forgery, and who had paid the full amount of the check), it was held in Levy v. Bank of United States, 4 Dall. 234, 1 L. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

ed. 814, equivalent to an actual payment; and if the depositor, after having been informed of the forgery, on a sudden misconception of his rights, agreed that, if the check was a forgery, it was no deposit, it would not constitute a promise to refund.

As intimated at the beginning of the note, there are a few cases which deny even that prima facie the title is deemed to have passed to the bank, and hold, on the contrary, that prima facie the title remains in the depositor, and that circumstances indicating a contrary intention are necessary to place the title in the bank. As applied to a given case, this view may work out the same result as that which regards the title as prima facie vested in the bank, since either view yields to the intention of the parties.

The leading case holding that prima facie the title does not pass to the bank upon the deposit is Balbach v. Frelinghuysen, 15 Fed. 675, where a check was deposited in a bank, and, before it had been collected, the bank failed, and the depositor sought to recover the check or its proceeds from the receiver. It was insisted by the receiver that the indorsement of the check to the bank, and its credit on its books and upon the pass book, to the depositor, and the right of the depositor to draw immediately against the amount, passed the title to the bank. It was held, however, that, notwithstanding these circumstances, the deposit would be considered a deposit for collection, and the bank the mere agent of the depositor, in the absence of any understanding, express or implied, to the contrary. The court said, in reference to the contention that the title passed: "The reply is twofold: (1) That in all cases where credits are thus made, banks claim and always exercise the right of charging checks returned to them for nonpayment to the account of the depositor, which could not be done if the check had become the property of the bank, and did not remain the property of the depositor until collected. (2) The practice, which has grown up among banks, to credit such deposits at once to the account of the depositor, and to allow him to draw against them before the collection has been made. is reckoned by the ablest text writers a mere gratuitous privilege, which does not grow into a binding legal usage." It may be noticed, in connection with this case, that there was nothing to show that the bank did exercise or claim the right to charge back against the depositor's account the amount of unpaid checks; but it did appear that the check in question had not been drawn against.

The above case is cited with approval, and followed, by Beal v. Somerville, 17 L.R.A. 291, 1 C. C. A. 598, 5 U. S. App. 14, 50 Fed. 649, where it was held that no title to a check on another bank passes to the bank with which it is deposited, although it is indorsed, "For deposit," and its amount is immediately credited on the depositor's pass book, in the absence of some special agreement to that effect, or some practice or custom equivalent to such agreement. Hence, if the depository bank becomes insolvent before collecting the check, it acquires no title to the proceeds; and the right of the depositor to draw against the proceeds will in no wise tend to support the position that the title is in the bank, unless that right is so absolute that the bank cannot lawfully suspend it by notice or otherwise pending the collection. And the opinion, after mentioning Metropolitan Nat. Bank v. Loyd, 90 N. Y. 530, says that while, perhaps, that case may state the law of New York state, its authority is not binding upon the Federal courts.

In National Gold Bank & T. Co. v. McDonald, 51 Cal. 64, 21 Am. Rep. 697, it was held that, when checks on another bank are deposited with the receiving teller, and the credit for them entered on the pass book, it cannot be contended that they are received as cash, or otherwise than for collection.

And in United States Nat. Bank v. Geer, 53 Neb. 67, 41 L.R.A. 439, 73 N. W. 266, it was held that an indorsement upon a certificate of deposit directing payment to the order of a cashier of a bank, "For account," was ambiguous, and that the effect of such indorsement depended solely upon the intent of the parties. But, upon a rehearing in 55 Neb. 462, 41 L.R.A. 444, 70 Am. St. Rep. 390, 75 N. W. 1088, it was held that such an indorsement was a restrictive indorsement, and not ambiguous, and vested no general property to the paper in the indorsee, but merely constituted him an agent for the purpose of collection; and parol evidence was not admissible to establish that the transfer to the title was absolute.

Where a deposit in a bank consisted of checks or drafts, it was held, in Perth Ambroy Gaslight Co. v. Middlesex County Bank, 60 N. J. Eq. 84, 45 Atl. 704, that the result might be either an increase of the debt from the bank to the depositor, or a mere bailment of the check or draft. The court said: "The actual result depends upon either what actually passes between the parties at the time, or what the custom and practice prevailing between them is, and upon the situation of the account between the dealer and banker. If a depositor deposits a check or draft on a third party with the understanding, either expressed or implied, that he is to draw against it at once as if it were cash, and the bank agrees to accept it and treat it as cash, and the depositor draws against it before the amount is realized by the bank, then it is properly treated as a deposit of cash. Or, if the depositor is already indebted to the bank, and the deposit is received in whole or partial payment, the same result follows. But, in the absence of an understanding or situation of this kind, it is a mere bailment."

In the absence of a special agreement, it was held, in National Commercial Bank v. Miller, 77 Ala. 168, 54 Am. Rep. 50, that when a check was deposited it was taken generally for collection by the bank as agent of the depositor, and the bank did not owe the amount until the collection was accomplished; that while, if it was passed to the credit of the depositor and mingled with the general funds of the bank, it might prima facie be a payment on deposit, yet the bank might permit, as a mere matter of favor and convenience, checks to be drawn against it before payment, the depositor being liable for the sums drawn as for money paid; but, where a check was indorsed, "For deposit," and the depositor had for some time previously kept a deposit account with the banker, in which he was accustomed to deposit checks payable to him, entries of which were made in his pass book, and to draw against such deposits, such an indorsement, in the absence of a different understanding, was presumptive of more than a mere agency or authority to collect; and the effect of the indorsement was to vest the bank with the title to and the control of the check.

Numerous cases hold that a check may be reclaimed by the depositor where the bank, at the time of the deposit, was insolvent, and the officers knew that it was insolvent; but these cases are not necessarily opposed to the general rule that the title passes upon the deposit, as the decisions are made solely on the ground of the fraud of the bank, which vitiates the contract as it would any other contract. Among the cases which hold that a check may be reclaimed from an insolvent bank, the following may be noticed: St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnston, 133 U. S. 566, 33 L. ed. 683, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 390; Wasson v. Hawkins, 59 Fed. 233; American Trust & Sav. Bank v. Gueder & P. Mfg. Co. 150 Ill. 336, 37 N. E. 227; First Nat. Bank v. Strauss, 66 Miss. 479, 14 Am. St. Rep. 579, 6 So. 232; Higgins v. Hayden, 53 Neb. 61, 73 N. W. 280; Cragie v. Hadley, 99 N. Y. 131, 52 Am. Rep. 9, 1 N. E. 537; Klepper v. Cox, 97 Tenn. 534, 34 L.R.A. 536, 56 Am. St. Rep. 823, 37 S. W. 284; Bruner v. First Nat. Bank, 97 Tenn. 540, 34 L.R.A. 532, 37 S. W. 286; Williams v. Cox, 97 Tenn. 555, 37 S. W. 282.

Although, as between the depositor and his bank, there may be no question that the title to the check remained in the depositor, yet he may have placed himself in such a position that he cannot enforce his claim to the check as against a third party. Such a situation frequently arises where the depositor indorses paper in blank and deposits with the bank for collection, and that bank sends it to another bank indorsed for collection, and by the custom of the banks the amount is credited on the books of the second bank to the first, to be drawn upon at will by the first bank. In some cases as in Cody v. City Nat. Bank, 55 Mich. 379, 21 N. W. 373, it may be difficult to determine whether the case really turns upon the question of the title to the check as between the depositor and the bank, or upon the question of the estoppel of the depositor.

Cases involving the estoppel of the depositor, or involving the question of a custom and usage existing between banks, are not within the intent and scope of this note, which has been confined to cases where the decision turns primarily upon the question whether or not the title to the check passes, immediately upon the deposit, to the bank, or remains in the depositor.

As shown by the title, this note is also confined to cases where the check was drawn on another bank, and excludes cases like First Nat. Bank v. Burkhardt, 100 U. S. 686, 25 L. ed. 766, where the check was drawn upon the same bank in which it was deposited.

JOHN REWOLINSKI et al., Respts.

Joint tenancy—definition.

Case Note.—Right of wife, under statute removing disabilities of married women, to devise property held by her husband and herself as joint tenants:—The apparent absence of other decisions involving the precise question passed upon in the foregoing case is doubtless attributable to the fact that in most jurisdictions it is either held that a conveyance to husband and wife makes them tenants by the entirety, or it is expressly provided by statute that, where a conveyance is made to husband and wife, they shall take as tenants in common; so that instances of joint tenancy in husband and wife are comparatively rare.

In connection with the subject, however, reference may be made to the case of Fisker 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) and the same time, and are held by one and the same possession, and so have the four unities of interest, title, time, and possession.

Same—survivorship.

2. A joint tenancy, by the common law, differs from others in that, if the four unities continue till the death of one of the parties, the other or others immediately become the owners of such interest as joint tenants by right of survivorship.

Tenancy in common.

3. Anything which destroys the unity of title or interest, as by alienation of one joint tenant, makes the owners of the several interests a tenant in common with the remaining joint tenant.

Joint tenancy—devise.

4. There can be no destruction of a joint tenancy by devise, since the right of survivorship takes precedence thereof.

Same—abolition by statute.

5. Joint tenancies, according to the common law, except as expressly declared, were abolished generally by § 2068, Rev. Stat. 1898, but an exception was made by § 2069 as to husband and wife.

Tenancy by entireties.

6. At the common law, circumstances making a joint tenancy generally, as to husband and wife, make them tenants by the entireties, differing from joint tenancies, in that there is no right of severance, terminating the right of survivorship.

Same—statutory change.

7. The added element mentioned, creating tenancies by the entirety, has not existed in this state since the revision of the statutes of 1878. Since that time husband and wife taking title under such circumstances as by the common law would make them tenants by the entireties are joint tenants.

Joint tenant—married woman—devise.

8. A married woman, joint tenant, is under all the disabilities of a joint tenant by the common law. She cannot under the statute, as regards her capacity to take, hold, enjoy, or convey property, devise her interest held as joint tenant. She has the same right as if she were unmarried, which APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Milwaukee County in favor of defendants in an action brought to enforce liens on certain real estate. Affirmed.

Statement by Marshall, J.:

Action to enforce alleged liens on real estate claimed to have been created as indicated by the facts found by the trial court, which may be stated briefly thus: (1) Johanna Ertman died in 1899 leaving her surviving Paul Ertman, her husband, and the plaintiffs, sons by a former husband. (2) January 22, 1892, said Paul Ertman, who was the owner of the real estate in question, and the said Johanna, his wife, conveyed such property to Valentine Lukaszewski, who reconveyed the same to them as husband and wife, and they owned and occupied it thereafter until the death of Johanna. (3) April 10, 1895, they duly mortgaged the property to Henry Herman to secure indebtedness to him of $800, and on May 10, 1897, they mortgaged the same to him to secure a like indebtedness of $100. After the death of Johanna her husband mortgaged the property to said Herman for $900, to take up the two prior mortgages. (4) Thereafter said Paul Ertman sold the said real estate and conveyed the same to the defendants, who have since occupied it. (5) Johanna Ertman left a last will and testament, which was in due time duly admitted to probate, whereby she willed $200, to each of the plaintiffs, to be paid out of her interest in said real estate; and she willed the residue of such less so expressly declared. and excepting from its operation devises or grants made to husband and wife, so far as it provides for the creation of an estate in joint tenancy by a conveyance to husband and wife, was not impliedly repealed by a statute providing that the real and personal estate of every female, acquired before or after marriage in any manner, shall be and remain her estate and property, and may be contracted, sold, transferred, mortgaged, conveyed, devised, or bequeathed by her in the same manner and with the same effect as if she were unmarried.

That the interest of a joint tenant is not devisable, since, as the paramount right of the survivor or survivors instantly prevails upon the death of the testator, there remains no estate of inheritance upon which the will can operate, is held in Duncan v. Forrer, 6 Binn. 193; and Wilkins v. Young, 144 Ind. 1, 55 Am. St. Rep. 162, 41 N. E. 68, 590.

realty to her husband. (6) The will was admitted to probate November 8, 1899, by the county court of Milwaukee county, Robert E. Bailey being appointed executor. (7) Said Johanna left no personal property and no real estate, except that in question. (8) July 7, 1903, the said county court, in due form, assigned said realty to Paul Ertman without prejudice to any conveyance made by him, subject to the payment of $200, to each of the plaintiffs, and $45.15, to the executor, which were declared to be liens upon the property. On these findings the court concluded, as matter of law, that at the time of the death of Johanna Ertman she and her husband were joint tenants of the realty, and thereupon that the latter took the whole by right of survivorship free from anything contained in the former's will, and that the defendants, as owners under Paul Ertman, were entitled to judgment dismissing the complaint with costs. Judgment was rendered accordingly, from which this appeal was taken.

It has been held in New York that the separate-property acts relating to the rights of married women do not abrogate the common-law doctrine that, under a conveyance to husband and wife, they take as tenants by the entirety, and upon the death of either the survivor takes the whole estate (Bertles v. Nunan, 92 N. Y. 152, 44 Am. Rep. 361), but that such acts have the effect to make them tenants in common of the use (Hiles v. Fisher, 144 N. Y. 306, 30 L.R.A. 305, 43 Am. St. Rep. 762, 39 N. E. 337).

On the other hand, in Morrill v. Morrill, 138 Mich. 112, 110 Am. St. Rep. 306, 101 N. W. 209, it was held that such legislation was without effect upon the common-law doctrine of tenancy by the entirety.

As to the effect of various statutes upon the effect of a conveyance to husband and wife, see note in 30 L.R.A. 305, on tenancy by entireties.

kins v. Young, 144 Ind. 1, 55 Am. St. Rep. 162, 41 N. E. 68, 590.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case turns upon whether a joint tenancy in lands of husband and wife has the same characteristics as to survivorship under our statutes as between others at common law. It is conceded that the circumstances detailed in the findings satisfy all the essentials of a joint tenancy at common law in cases other than those of husband and wife. The interests were created by one and the same purchase and by one and the same conveyance; they commenced at one and the same time, and were held by one and the same possession. Thus we have the four unities, unity of interest, unity of title, unity of time, and unity of possession.

The special significant incident of joint tenancy is the right of survivorship by which, on the death of any tenant, his interest goes to his survivors. Anything which destroys the unity of title or interest without affecting the unity of possession will turn the interest severed from the others into a tenancy in common as regards the remaining joint tenants. 2 Bl. Com. 192; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 6th ed. § 864. The most familiar method of so severing the interest of one joint tenant from the interests of others is by alienation. As such severance to be effective, is required to occur during the lifetime of the joint tenant, a devise by such a tenant is inoperative. The rule on that subject is thus stated at § 865 in Washburn on Real Property: "A devise by one joint tenant of his share will be inoperative, inasmuch as the right of survivorship takes precedence of such devise. And so far does this principle prevail that, if such deviser be himself the survivor, he must republish his will after the survivorship has accrued, in order to give it effect."

Section 2068, Rev. Stat. 1898, which originated before the conveyance in question, abolishes joint tenancies, except where the tenancy is expressly declared to be in joint tenancy, but by § 2069 grants to husband and wife are excepted. So, circumstances that would create a joint tenancy generally at common law will create one between husband and wife under the statutes, unless there be some other statute than those referred to to the contrary. In case of husband and wife, circumstances that would, as between other parties, create a joint tenancy only, would, as to them, add another element in the absence of any statutory regulation making them tenants by the entirety, as to which there could be no severance by partition or alienation. 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 652. That feature has not existed here since the Revision of 1878. Circumstances which prior thereto made the husband and wife tenants by entirety subsequently have made them joint tenants with the common-law characteristics thereof. That is clearly the effect of Citizens' Loan & T. Co. v. Witte, 116 Wis. 60, 92 N. W. 443, and Wallace v. St. John, 119 Wis. 585, 97 N. W. 197. The subject was, in the latter case, treated at length by the present chief justice. Nothing can be gained by going over the same anew. Citing from the earlier case with approval, the court said: "Both sections, as so amended [referring to § 2340 and § 2342], as well as the revisers in their notes, treat the estate created by deed running to husband and wife, as in the case at bar, as an estate 'held in joint tenancy,' instead of being held as tenants of the entirety, as at common law. . . . Manifestly, the revisers intended by the amendments to cover cases of tenants of the entirety held by husband and wife,—especially as in one section the words 'held in joint tenancy,' follow the words 'the real estate of every description,' and in the other section follow the words 'any interest or estate therein of any description,' and in both sections they are followed by the words, 'and the rents, issues, and profits thereof,' or their equivalent. Unless that is so, the new provision inserted in the sections is without significance."

Counsel for appellant earnestly contend that § 2342 aforesaid, abolishing the disabilities of married women as to the acquirement and enjoyment of property, inferentially at least, clothes such a woman, who is a joint tenant of property with her husband, with the capacity to pass her interest in such property by devise. These words are referred to, "any married female may . . . convey and devise real and personal property and any interest or estate therein of any description, including all held in joint tenancy with her husband, . . . with like effect as if she were unmarried." It is urged that nothing contained in Wallace v. St. John, supra, is inconsistent with the claim that such statute permits a joint tenancy between husband and wife to be severed by a devise by the wife, since the case only dealt with severance by alienation. The conclusive answer to that seems to be that in both of the cases cited the court held that, since the Revision of 1878, a conveyance of land to husband and wife, instead of creating estates by the entirety, creates a joint tenancy with all the common-law characteristics thereof. The language of § 2342, as suggested by counsel for respondent, gives to a married woman joint tenant the same rights in the property as she would possess if she were unmarried; but, as in the latter case she cannot defeat the right of survivorship by devising the property, she cannot in the former.

So the learned trial court reached the right conclusion. Johanna Ertman being a joint tenant of the property with her husband, she was under a disability, the same as he was, to pass her interest or to in any way encumber it by will. Her attempt to do so did not affect his right of survivorship. Upon her death he became the absolute owner of the whole property, and the respondents, as his grantees, succeeded to such ownership.

Judgment is affirmed.

D. A. EOFF, Collector, Appt.,
v.
WILLIAM KENNEFICK et al.

(— Ark. —, 96 S. W. 986.)

Tax—property of nonresident.

Personal property of a nonresident, which, for the performance of a railroad-construction contract, is in the state on the day taxes are to be assessed, is subject to assessment under a statute making taxable all real and personal property in the state.

(July 23, 1906.)

Case Note.—Local situs within the state of tangible personal property of nonresident for the purposes of local taxation:— It is settled beyond all question that the maxim, Mobilia sequuntur personam, in accordance with which the situs of personal property for many purposes is regarded as at the domicile of the owner, and not at the place where it may be found, does not apply so as to exclude the power of the state in which personal property has an actual situs, assuming it is not transiently there, to subject it to local taxation. This, of course, includes tangible as well as intangible property. Among many other cases in which this principle is stated or recognized, the following may be mentioned: St. Louis v. Wiggins Ferry Co. 11 Wall. 423, 20 L. ed. 192; Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 18, 35 L. ed. 613, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 595, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 876; *Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. The fact that personal property has been taxed for the same period at the domicile of the owner does not prevent its taxation in another state, in which it has a local situs. Coe v. Errol, 116 U. It is nevertheless true that the tangible personal property of a nonresident which is merely in transit is not subject to local taxation. *Ogilvie v. Battle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The assessor of Boone county listed and assessed for taxation for 1903 the following property of the Kennefick-Hammond Company: 14 horses, 88 mules, 75 wagons, 17 boilers, 2 light plants, 2 air compressors, harness, and blacksmith tools, valuing the boilers, light plants, air compressors, harness, and blacksmith tools, in the aggregate, at $20,670. This property was situated in Boone county on the first Monday in June, 1903,—how long before and how long after does not appear. It was used by the Kennefick-Hammond Company in the construction of a roadbed for a railroad through a portion of Boone county, about 15 miles in length. How long it required to complete the roadbed was not shown at the hearing of this cause. The taxes of 1903 were levied upon it, and the collector of Boone county was proceeding to collect the same when he was restrained from so doing by an order made by the chancellor of the Boone chancery court, upon application of the Kennefick-Hammond Company, which was afterwards made perpetual by the court.

The Kennefick-Hammond Company was a partnership composed of William Kennefick and F. S. Hammond, and they were citizens and residents of the state of Missouri before, on, and after the first Monday in June, 1903.

In Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 18, 35 L. ed. 613, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 595, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 876, Mr.

Many of the cases, however, which sustain the last proposition do not turn upon the question of local situs, but upon the principle that the local taxation of tangible personal property while the subject of interstate commerce would be an unlawful interference with interstate commerce; and they are therefore not in point in this note, which is confined to the question as to when, apart from other obstacles to local taxation, the tangible personal property of a nonresident may be regarded as having a situs within the state for the purposes of local taxation. As to the liability of property in transit to local taxation, so far as the question is affected by the commerce clause, see note in 60 L.R.A. 660.

Assuming that the property of the nonresident is not the subject of interstate commerce so as to be immune from local taxation on that ground, the question whether it has acquired a situs within the state for the purpose of taxation depends very largely upon the circumstances of the particular case.

Justice Gray, speaking for the court, said: "No general principles of law are better settled, or more fundamental, than that the legislative power of every state extends to all property within its borders, and that, only so far as the comity of that state allows, can such property be affected by the law of any other state. The old rule, expressed in the maxim, Mobilia sequuntur personam, by which personal property was regarded as subject to the law of the owner's domicile, grew up in the Middle Ages, when movable property consisted chiefly of gold and jewels, which could be easily carried by the owner from place to place, or secreted in spots known only to himself. In modern times, since the great increase in amount and variety of personal property, not immediately connected with the person of the owner, that rule has yielded more and more to the lex situs, the law of the place, where the property is kept and used.

. . . For the purposes of taxation, as has been repeatedly affirmed by this court, personal property may be separated from its owner, and he may be taxed, on its account, at the place where it is, although not the place of his own domicile, and even if he is not a citizen or a resident of the state which imposes the tax."

The statutes of this state provide that "all property, whether real or personal, in this state . . . shall be subject to taxation," except property exempted by the Constitution, of which the property in question is not a part. Personal property must

The case which on its facts most resembles EOFF v. KENNEFICK is Griggsby Constr. Co. v. Freeman, supra, which is sufficiently set forth in the foregoing opinion.

In Robinson v. Longley, 18 Nev. 71, 1 Pac. 377, it was held that a traveling circus and menagerie owned by a nonresident, brought into the state for exhibition, and then to be taken into two other states for the same purpose, was not subject to taxation within the state.

The decision in Fennell v. Pauley, supra, and the decision of the Wyoming supreme court in Kelley v. Rhoads, 7 Wyo. 239, 39 L.R.A. 594, 75 Am. St. Rep. 904, 51 Pac. 593, also discussed in that opinion, are supported by Russell v. Green, 10 Okla. 340, 62 Pac. 817, holding that cattle brought into Oklahoma for grazing purposes between March and September were subject to local taxation, under the statute providing that, "when any personal property shall be located in any county of this territory after the 1st day of March of any year, which shall acquire an actual situs therein before the 1st day of September, such property is taxable therein for that year; . . . whenever any live stock shall be located in this territory for the purpose of grazing be assessed in the name of the person who was the owner on the first Monday in June in the year in which the assessment was made. Kirby's Dig. §§ 6873, 6913. And in all cases in which it is necessary for the assessor, "in consequence of the sickness or absence of the person whose duty it is to make out a statement of personal property" or his refusal to do so, "to ascertain the several items and the value thereof," the assessor may do so and make return thereof from the best information he can get. Kirby's Dig. §§ 6966, 6968.

But plaintiffs insist that the property was in the state, at the time it was assessed, temporarily; that it had not been incorporated in and become a part of the property of the state; had not gained a situs here, but was in transitu, and not subject to taxation in this state. Tangible personal property of a nonresident, in transit, is not subject to local taxation in the state in which it may be temporarily. But when does property cease to be in transit and become of such permanency as will justify taxation in its new situs? It cannot always be in transit.

it shall be deemed to have acquired an actual situs therein."

A number of other cases, decided and reported in connection with the last case, are apparently to the same effect, although in some of them it appears only by implication that the owners of the cattle were nonresidents.

And, under the same statute, it was held in Prairie Cattle Co. v. Williamson, supra, that a nonresident owner was taxable in Oklahoma upon the average number of cattle that ranged and grazed therein during the entire year, notwithstanding that the owner of the cattle endeavored to keep them out of the territory.

In Hudson v. Miller, 10 Kan. App. 532, 63 Pac. 21, cattle belonging to a nonresident, which were brought into Kansas on February 10, to be fed with grain preparatory to marking them, and were shipped out by the last day of the following July, were held to be locally taxable.

Ice stored in ice houses, from which it is to be taken for sale when wanted, is taxable to a nonresident owner, under a statute providing for a tax on "stock in trade, employed in any town, owned by a person not a resident therein," although but a small portion of it is to be sold at that place, and most of it is to be taken to a city in another state for delivery as wanted. Winkley v. Newton, 67 N. H. 80, 35 L.R.A. 756, 36 Atl. 610.

So, ice cut in New Jersey by a foreign corporation, and stored in that state with the intention of selling it from the office of the corporation in another state, is subject to taxation in New Jersey while it remains 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

L.R.A. 594, 75 Am. St. Rep. 904, 51 Pac. 593, the "plaintiff, who was a resident and a citizen of the state of Kansas, was the owner of certain sheep, numbering about 10,000 head, which, on or about October 29, 1895, were in the county of Laramie [in the state of Wyoming] in charge of an agent, who was driving and transporting them through the state of Wyoming from Utah to Nebraska. In driving said sheep it was the practice to permit them to spread out at times in the neighborhood of a quarter of a mile, and, while being so driven, to graze over land of that width," and they were maintained solely in that way. They were driven across Wyoming for the purpose of shipment, and were not brought into the state for the purpose of being maintained permanently therein. The time consumed in driving the sheep through Wyoming was from six to eight weeks, and the distance traveled was about 500 miles. "For shipment purposes, it was not necessary that the sheep should be driven into Wyoming, and the railroad over which they were shipped could be reached from the point from which they were first driven by traveling a less distance than was required

there. John Hancock Ice Co. v. Rose, 67 N. J. L. 80, 50 Atl. 364.

In Coe v. Errol, 62 N. H. 303, it was held that logs cut in New Hampshire by a nonresident, and taken to a town on a river in that state to await a convenient opportunity for their transportation to another state, had a local situs in New Hampshire for the purposes of taxation, and that they were not in transit in such a sense as to render them immune from local taxation under the commerce clause. This decision was affirmed by the United States Supreme Court in 116 U. S. 517, 29 L. ed. 715, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 475. To the same effect is the decision in the C. N. Nelson Lumber Co. v. Loraine, 22 Fed. 54.

In Standard Oil Co. v. Bachelor, 80 Ind. 1, barrel staves purchased by a foreign corporation in Indiana for shipment to its place of business in Ohio were held to have lost their situs as taxable property in Indiana, and to be in transitu, notwithstanding at the time of their attempted assessment they were piled near a railroad track in Indiana awaiting an opportunity for shipment. This decision, however, would seem to be referable to the commerce clause, and therefore not to involve the proposition that, apart from that clause, the property of a nonresident, under such circumstances, cannot be assigned a local situs for the purposes of taxation.

In the subsequent case of Brown County v. Standard Oil Co. 103 Ind. 302, 2 N. E. 758, staves purchased by a foreign corporation, and piled in yards within the state awaiting a process by which they were to be cut of uniform length and thickness, it to drive them to any point" in Wyoming. The question was, Were the sheep subject to taxation while in Wyoming? The supreme court of Wyoming held that they were. The court said: "We are of the opinion, therefore, that, in determining the purpose and the situs, the course and method of travel is a proper subject and one of the elements for consideration. We do not dispute the proposition that an owner of live stock, if not otherwise disobedient to the law and observant of the police regulations of the state, has the right to transport them to market by driving on foot as well as by rail. Strictly speaking, they will be in transit by the one method as much as by the other. If, however, the purpose of such owner is not alone that of transportation, but comprehends also that of grazing and feeding them upon the natural grasses, which is their natural source of sustenance, not as a mere necessary incident of the travel, but as one of the purposes of such movement, they would not come within the rule which exempts personal property in transit from taxation."

This case (Kelley v. Rhoads) was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the judgment therein was reversed on the ground that the sheep were property engaged in interstate commerce. 188 U. S. 1, 47 L. ed. 359, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 259. The Supreme Court of the United States said: "The question to be determined, then, is whether the stock of the plaintiff was brought into the state for the purpose of being grazed at the time it was assessed for taxation. . . . Had the state court found directly the ultimate fact that these sheep were brought into the state for the purpose of being grazed, such finding might have bound us; but, under the facts actually found or agreed upon, we are at liberty to inquire whether they support the judgment. . . . The law upon this subject, so far as it concerns interference with interstate commerce, is settled by several cases in this court, which hold that property actually in transit is exempt from local taxation, although if it be stored for an indefinite time during such transit, at least for other than natural causes, or lack of facilities for immediate transportation, it may be lawfully assessed by the local authorities." Again it says: "The question turns upon the purpose for which the being stipulated with the contractor that the staves should be allowed to stand in piles for a period of three months before shipment, unless sooner called for by the company, were held to have a situs in Indiana for the purposes of taxation. The decision in the last case was distinguished upon the ground that the staves in that case were merely in the state temporarily, awaiting facilities for transportation, while in the case at bar they were awaiting a partial process of manufacture.

In Burlington Lumber Co. v. Willetts, 118 Ill. 559, 9 N. E. 254, saw logs belonging to an Iowa lumber company were held to have a situs in Illinois, rendering them subject to local taxation, where they were left in a harbor on the Illinois side of the Mississippi river for safe-keeping until needed, it appearing that the owner had leased land along the shore for that purpose and employed an agent to take care of the logs, and had kept logs at such place for several years because they could be kept there in greater safety and at less expense than at its place of business in Iowa.

So, ship timber owned by a nonresident, who had purchased the same during the winter and spring previous to its return for taxation intending to remove the same from the state after the opening of navigation, was held, in Carrier v. Gordon, 21 Ohio St. 605, to have a situs within the state for the purposes of local taxation. The court said that the safer and better rule is to consider property actually in transit as belonging to the place of its destination, and property not in transit as property in the place of its situs, without regard to the intention of 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the owner or to his residence in or out of the state.

Merchandise shipped by a nonresident manufacturer in bulk to a storage company, and stored by it awaiting orders for its distribution to purchasers, is subject to local taxation. Merchant's Transfer Co. v. Des Moines, 128 Iowa, 732, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 662, 105 N. W. 211. See note to this case on the question as to when transit commencing in another state is deemed to have terminated or been definitely interrupted, so as to render goods liable to local taxation.

As already intimated, many of the decisions holding that the property of a nonresident was not subject to local taxation turned upon the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, and are therefore not in point here. It may be noted in this connection that vehicles of commerce are not exempt from local taxation merely because engaged in foreign or interstate commerce. See Morgan v. Parham, 16 Wall. 471, 21 L. ed. 303; Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 18, 35 L. ed. 613, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 595, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 876, and note in 60 L.R.A. 653. Hence, the liability of such property, when owned by nonresidents, to local taxation, is dependent upon the question whether or not it has acquired a local situs. This question, however, as applied to vehicles of commerce, is quite distinctive, and is therefore reserved for future treatment in a separate note.

The question as to when a debt may have a situs for the purposes of taxation, apart from the domicile of the creditor, is treated in a case note in 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 637.

sheep were driven into the state. If for the purpose of being grazed, they are expressly within the 1st section of the act [that is, subject to taxation in Wyoming]. But if for the purpose of being driven through the state to a market, they would be exempt as a subject of interstate commerce, though they might incidentally have supported themselves in grazing while actually in transit." After repeating a part of the facts, it says: "It thus appears that the only purpose found for which this herd of sheep was being driven across the state was for shipment, and the agreed statement [of facts] wholly fails to show that they were detained at any place within the state for the purpose of grazing or otherwise. As they consumed from six to eight weeks in traveling about 500 miles, or, as the Supreme Court found, at the rate of about 9 miles per day, it does not even appear that they loitered unnecessarily on the way. As they required sustenance on the journey, and could obtain it only by grazing, it would appear, though there is no testimony upon that point, that they could hardly have been driven more rapidly without a loss of flesh during the transit."

The doctrine of the Wyoming court is not questioned by the Supreme Court of the United States, but the difference of the two courts is in its application to the facts in the case. As interpreted by the latter court it is applicable and should control in the case before us.

In Fennell v. Pauley, 112 Iowa, 94, 83 N. W. 799, the plaintiff was a resident of the state of Missouri in 1895-96. In December, 1895, he brought into Fremont county, in Iowa, 202 head of cattle for feeding purposes, and kept them upon land owned by him. In April, 1896, the cattle were taken back to the state of Missouri. The court said: "The contention is that this property, belonging to a nonresident and being only temporarily in this state, was not taxable here. Section 812, Code 1873, provides that all personal property shall be taxed in the name of the owner on the 1st day of January. That property of this nature is taxable is fixed by §§ 797-801; and § 817 requires personal property in the hands of an agent to be listed by the assessor. Section 823 requires the assessor to return all personal property found in his township. We understand that property in transit through the state cannot be taxed here, nor can such as belongs to a nonresident, which is here only as an incident of its transfer elsewhere. To give the right to assess the personal property of a nonresident found within this state, it must be located here with something like permanency, or for some purpose other than merely aiding its transit. . . . These cattle were here to be fed, in order to increase their weight and value for market. . . . In principle, it was the same as the investment of money in this state, and we cannot see why they should not be taxed here." To the same effect see Waggoner v. Whaley, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 1, 50 S. W. 154; Hardesty v. Fleming, 57 Tex. 395.

Griggsby Constr. Co. v. Freeman, 108 La. 435, 58 L.R.A. 349, 32 So. 399, is a case like this. In Louisiana all property in that state is subject to taxation, except that expressly exempted from taxation by law. The statutes provide that, in case the taxpayer fails or refuses to furnish a list of his property within the time prescribed, the assessor "shall himself fill out the list from the best information he can obtain." "In making his assessment for the year 1901 the assessor of the parish of Natchitoches called upon the plaintiff's agent to furnish, as required by law, a list of its property situated in the parish and subject to taxation. The plaintiff is a Texas corporation, having its domicile at Dallas, Texas. It operates in that state and adjoining states in the construction of dams, dikes, levees, railroad beds, and other earthwork, and for that purpose has outfits, consisting of mules, scrapers, wagons, commissary store goods, tents, etc., which it sends to the places where work is to be done. At the time when its agent was thus called upon by the assessor, plaintiff was doing grading work for the Texas & Pacific Railroad in the parish of Natchitoches, and the property sought to be assessed was a construction outfit and other movables necessary or convenient in the doing of that work. The agent questioned whether said property was liable to taxation in Louisiana, and asked for time to consult counsel. A second attempt was made to get from the agent a list of the property of plaintiff, and, this second attempt proving equally fruitless, the assessor, as required by law, made out a list of the property as best he could, and put same on his roll. Plaintiff failing to pay the tax thus assessed, the tax collector proceeded to enforce payment by seizure of some of the mules assessed, and plaintiff brought this suit, enjoining the seizure." The supreme court of Louisiana held that the property was subject to taxation, and said: "In the instant case the property was not in course of transportation, but was here for use and for a use likely to be of some duration,—possibly a full year,—and for the time being was incorporated in the bulk of the property of the state. It was distinguishable from the rest of the property of the taxing district in no respect except the intention of the owner to remove it at some future time more or-less distant. Under these circumstances, its situs approached nearer to permanency than did that of the sheep in the Wyoming case, or that of the coal in Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 633, 29 L. ed. 261, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1091. 1 Parnele's Wharton, Conf. L. § 80a, and cases cited.

The property of plaintiff in this case was not in transit, but was here, chiefly, if not solely, for use and profit, and was subject to taxation.

Decree is reversed, and the complaint of appellees is dismissed for the want of equity.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA

v.

JOSEPH HODGE, Appt.

(142 N. C. 665, 55 S. E. 626.)

Compounding felony—indictment.

An indictment for compounding a felony by agreeing not to prosecute persons arrested for larceny is insufficient, which does not charge that a larceny had been committed.

(December 4, 1906.)

Case Note.—Actual commission of antecedent crime as an ingredient of the offense of compounding a felony: — There are but few criminal cases in point.

The point actually decided in State v. Leeds, which is freely quoted in the above case, was that an indictment for compounding a crime, which did not distinctly aver and set forth the preceding crime with such particularity as to enable the party accused of compounding to make preparation for rebutting the charge, was defective, and should be quashed. It would seem to follow, however, that, unless the evidence showed that the preceding crime had actually been committed, the prosecution would fail.

In Fribly v. State, 42 Ohio St. 205, cited and criticized in STATE v. HODGE, the court gave as a plausible reason for holding as it did, that the contrary rule would impose upon the state the double burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt the actual commission of two crimes,—the felony compounded, and the compounding of the felony,—and that this, in most cases, would require the injured party to establish his own guilt of the preceding crime.

Although not necessary to the decision in State v. Carver, 69 N. H. 216, 39 Atl. 973, it was said, in effect, that the crime of compounding a public misdemeanor is committed by the bargain and acceptance of the reward; and, in such a case, the party may be convicted though no offense liable to a pen-

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Rutherford County denying a motion in arrest of judgment upon a verdict convicting him of compounding a felony. Reversed.

Statement by Connor, J.:

The defendant was tried and convicted upon an indictment in the following words, to wit: "The jurors for the state upon their oaths present that Joseph Hodge, late of the county of Rutherford, on the 4th day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and five, with force and arms, at and in the county aforesaid, did unlawfully, wilfully, and feloniously compound a felony, to wit, did swear out a warrant before 'Squire H. S. Taylor against Addie Yelton and Wm. Yelton, charging them with the larceny of certain berries and cherries, and after they had been arrested on said warrant, and before they had their trial, proposed to said defendants and their friends that if they would pay him ($10.00) ten dollars and pay his lawyer ($5.00) five dollars that he would drop the matter and not appear against them, said money was paid, and said prosecution abandoned, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state." Upon the rendition of the verdict, defendant moved in arrest of judg-alty has been committed by the person from whom the reward is taken.

Under some forms of the statute on this subject, the accused, to be guilty, must have had knowledge of the commission of the crime compounded. This being so, it would seem necessarily to follow that the crime alleged to have been compounded must actually have been committed. Such statutes controlled the decisions in Watt v. State, People v. Byron, and State v. Henning, cited in STATE v. HODGE.

The question under discussion has arisen in a number of civil cases in which actions on contracts have been defended upon the ground that the consideration was the compounding of a felony.

Thus, in Manning v. Columbian Lodge No. 117, 1 I. O. O. F. 57 N. J. Eq. 338, 45 Atl. 1092, Affirming (N. J. Eq.) 38 Atl. 444, it was held that, where defendant in an action on a note defends on the ground that it was given to compound a felony, he must plead and prove the actual commission of the preceding crime alleged to have been compounded.

In Deere v. Wolff, 65 Iowa, 32, 21 N. W. 168, where it was contended that a sale was invalid, in that the consideration thereof was the compounding of a felony, it was held that, before the vendee could be found guilty of compounding a felony, it must be established that the vendor was guilty of felony; and that a mere charge of guilt, ment. Motion denied. Judgment, and appeal by defendant.

Mr. D. F. Morrow for appellant.

Mr. Robert D. Gilmer, Attorney General, for the State.

Connor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant in this court assigns several grounds for his motion for arresting the judgment. We have found no difficulty in disposing of all save one,—that the indictment does not aver that the persons with whom he is charged with entering into the agreement, and from whom he received the money as the consideration for “dropping the matter and not appearing as a witness” on the trial, were guilty of the larceny charged against them. We have given the question anxious and careful examination, and find the authorities unsatisfactory and conflicting. In the absence of any statute in this state defining the offense of compounding a felony, we are compelled to look to common-law sources. Our Reports disclose but one indictment for the offense, and from this we derive no aid in the solution of the question presented here. There was no motion presenting the question respecting the sufficiency of the indictment. State v. Furr, 121 N. C. 606, 28 S. E. 552. Blackstone (4 Com. 134), after discussing the crime of receiving stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen, and a kindred offense, says: “Of a nature somewhat similar to the two last is the offense of theft bote, which is where the party robbed not only knows the felon, but also takes his goods again, or other amends, upon agreement not to prosecute. This is frequently called compounding of felony, and formerly was held to make a man an accessory, but is now punished only with fine and imprisonment.” Russell, Crimes, 194. Bishop defines the offense as “an agreement with the criminal not to prosecute him.” Crim. Law, 648. “The offense committed by a person who, having been directly injured by a felony, agrees with the criminal that he will not prosecute him, on condition of the latter’s making reparation or on receipt of a reward or bribe not to prosecute.” Black’s Law Dict. 240; 8 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 492, where several definitions are given. There is no substantial difference in the definitions given by the writers on criminal law and in well-considered cases. All of them concur with Blackstone that, to constitute the crime, the agreement must be not to prosecute the person guilty of the felony, or, as said in some cases, “the guilty person” or “the criminal.” It would seem that, in the light of the language uniformly used, there could be no doubt that, before a conviction can be had, it must be made to appear that a felony has been committed by the person with whom the corrupt agreement was made.

In the indictment before us, the solicitor charges that defendant “did unlawfully, wilfully, and feloniously compound a felony.” His Honor, following the decision of this court in State v. Furr, supra, instructed the jury, “that, before they could convict, they would have to find beyond a reasonable doubt that the Yeltons had committed a felony.” The editor of Cyc. Law & Proc. (vol. 8, p. 495) says: “The actual commission of a preceding crime would seem to be essential to the offense of compounding the same, and in the majority of jurisdictions this is the view taken, although in some the rule is otherwise,”—citing State v. Leeds, 68 N. J. L. 210, 52 Atl. 288. Dixon, J., says: “It is generally held that, to sustain an indictment for compounding a crime, it must be shown that the crime alleged to have been compounded had been committed,”— or an indictment for the crime, would not authorize the conclusion that there had been any compounding of a felony.

In Swope v. Jefferson F. Ins. Co. 93 Pa. 251, where a mortgagor claimed that the compounding of a felony committed by his son was the only consideration for the execution of the mortgage, it was held necessary for the mortgagor to show by such preponderance of evidence that his son had actually committed a felony as would justify the jury in so finding; though the proof of guilt need not be of that conclusive character that would be necessary to convict.

In Chandler v. Johnson, 39 Ga. 85, it was held that the defendant, when sued upon his note given to compound a felony, need not establish a clear case of guilt on his part; but that it would be sufficient to show that there was a bona fide charge against him.

So. 216, a bill was filed to cancel a deed, and defendant insisted that the real consideration of the deed, as shown by the bill, was the compounding of a felony, and that, therefore, a court of equity would not interfere to relieve the parties. But the bill averred that the charge preferred by defendant against plaintiff’s husband was false, malicious, and “trumped up;” and that defendant knew it to be false. It was held that, under the facts alleged, defendant was not guilty of compounding a felony; that had he been indicted for the compounding of a felony by receiving the deed from complainant in consideration of his promise to conceal or to abstain from a prosecution of her husband, it would have been a perfect defense to have shown that the charge and prosecution against the husband was unfounded, and could not have been successfully maintained.

citing 1 Hale, P. C. 619, wherein it is said: If "A hath his goods stolen by B, if A receives his goods again simply, without any contract to favor him in his prosecution, or to forbear prosecution, this is lawful; but if he receives them upon agreement not to prosecute, or to prosecute faintly, this is theft bote, punishable by imprisonment and ransom, but yet it makes not A an accessory, . . . but if he take money of B to favor him, whereby he escapes, this makes him accessory." Judge Dixon notes that in some states statutes have been enacted enlarging the scope of the offense; but he says: "The reason of the thing accords better with the common law, for it cannot be held that the public is injured by the refusal of a private person to present or prosecute a charge of crime, if in fact no crime has been perpetrated." In Swope v. Jefferson F. Ins. Co. 93 Pa. 251, it is said: "The guilt of the party accused and an agreement not to prosecute are essential ingredients in the compounding of a felony." Watt v. State, 97 Ala. 72, 11 So. 901. In State v. Henning, 33 Ind. 189, an indictment for compounding a crime was held bad, because it did not charge that the defendant had knowledge of the actual commission of the crime alleged to have been compounded. McClain treats the offense in connection with misprision of felony and accessories, as does Sir Mathew Hale; and in offenses of this class it is essential to show that a crime has been committed and that the felon is known to the defendant. Crim. Law, § 939. In Queen v. Burgess, L. R. 16 Q. B. Div. 141, the indictment charged the commission of the offense compounded, and that defendant, "well knowing the said felony to have been done and committed by the said A. B.," etc. It was held in that case (Coleridge, Ch. J.) that the offense could be committed by one other than the owner of the goods. The case of Frilby v. State, 42 Ohio St. 205, is cited as holding that in an indictment for compounding a felony it is not necessary to aver or show that crime has been committed. The decision is based upon the language of the statute, which is much more comprehensive in its terms than the definition of the offense at common law. The court treats the case as coming within the language of the statute, and cites no authorities. We cannot regard the decision as controlling us in dealing with the common-law offense. We are not quite sure that we comprehend the import of the language in which the opinion concludes: "It is necessary to aver and prove that the prosecution was for what appeared by the charge to be a crime; but it is not necessary that the actual commission of such crime be either averred or proved." The statute includes "abandoning, or agreeing to abandon, any prosecution threatened or commenced for any crime or misdemeanor." If the charge was for the commission of the statutory offense, we can easily perceive the meaning of the language quoted.

We conclude, therefore, that the common-law offense, as defined by all of the authorities, involves the charge that a felony had been committed and that the felon is known to the defendant. It would seem clear that, this being an essential ingredient in the offense, it must be alleged in the indictment. In Leeds's Case, supra, it is said: "As the preceding crime is essential to the offense of compounding the crime, it should be distinctly averred in the indictment for compounding, and should be set forth with such particularity as will enable the accused to make preparation for rebutting the charge." The precedents are uniform in this respect. 2 Wharton, Pl. & Pr. 895; Chitty, Crim. Law, 221. An examination of the record in State v. Furr, supra, shows that the bill is drawn according to the precedents. People v. Bryon, 103 Cal. 675, 37 Pac. 754. "There is a class of offenses involving an obstruction of public justice, in which it is held that it is not necessary to charge or prove the commission of the crime the prosecution of which is interfered with. Persuading or inducing a witness not to attend court, whether under subpoena or not, is indictable. Inducing one to absent himself from attending as a witness before a justice, in an examination of a charge for violating the criminal law, is a high-handed offense." 1 Revisal 1905, § 3696; Re Young, 137 N. C. 552, 50 S. E. 220. In State v. Keyes, 8 Vt. 57, 30 Am. Dec. 450, it was held that it was not necessary to allege or show that the person against whom the witness would have testified was guilty. State v. Carpenter, 20 Vt. 9. The form of the indictment for this offense is found in Chitty, Crim. Law, 235. By Stat. 18 Eliz. it is made a misdemeanor to agree for money to compound or withdraw a suit for a penalty without the consent of the court. Under this statute it is held that it is not necessary to allege or show the commission of the act for which the suit or prosecution is instituted. Reg. v. Best, 9 Car. & P. 368. It would seem that this statute is a part of the common law in force in this state. The case of State v. Carver, 69 N. H. 216, 39 Atl. 973, is not put upon that statute, although it is referred to in the opinion. In that case the indictment was in accordance with the precedents, except that, after describing the offense in the concluding sentence of the bill, it is charged that defendant forbore to prosecute for "said supposed" offense. This was held sufficient.

A careful examination of every case at our command fails to discover any one in which an indictment is sustained which omits the averment that a crime had been committed. The judgment must be arrested. It is but just to the learned judge who tried the case to say that it does not appear that this objection was raised before him. As we have seen, he correctly instructed the jury. It may be well enough to suggest that the bill does not very clearly allege any agreement to forbear prosecution. It would conform more closely to the precedents to charge clearly the agreement which is the gist of the offense. We also note that the indictment charges that defendant "proposed to said defendants and their friends," etc., whereas the evidence was "that the father of the Yeltons, through his friends, compromised the case," etc. It is not clear that this was not a variance, entitling the defendant to an acquittal on this indictment. For the reasons given, the motion in arrest must be allowed.

Judgment arrested.

ALABAMA COAL & COKE COMPANY

v.

GULF COAL & COKE COMPANY, Appt.

(— Ala. —, 40 So. 397.)

Bill to quiet title—owner of minerals.

1. The owner of the minerals underlying land is within the protection of a statute permitting one in peaceable possession of "lands" to maintain a bill to quiet title to them against one denying or disputing his title.

Pleading—amendment—departure.

2. No departure in a suit to quiet title to real estate is effected by an amendment seeking to estop defendant from questioning plaintiff's title on the ground that a deed in plaintiff's chain of title had never been delivered, for the reason that defendant claiming under the grantor in the undelivered deed had taken no steps to cancel the record of it, although the bill proceeded merely on the statutory grounds for such action.

Bona fide purchaser—undelivered deed.

3. One purchasing real estate in the chain of title to which is an undelivered deed acquires no title, and therefore is not entitled to protection as a bona fide purchaser because he had no notice of the fact of nondelivery.

Estoppel—permitting undelivered deed to remain on record.

4. Failure of successors in title to one whose undelivered deed to real estate has been recorded, to remove it from the record, will not estop them from denying the title of a stranger who purchases the property in reliance on the record.

(February 1, 1906.)

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Chancery Court for Walker County in complainant's favor in a suit to quiet title to real estate. Reversed.

The amendment which complainant filed by leave of court averred, in effect, that James I. Odom was, in December, 1882, the owner of the land in controversy, and that he and his wife made a deed of the land to Thomas Peters, which deed was duly acknowledged and filed for record. That Peters conveyed the property to Samuel Noble by way of mortgage, which was foreclosed and the property purchased by A. L. Tyler and T. G. Bush, trustees. That Tyler and Bush conveyed the property to complainant in satisfaction of stock subscriptions, and that the entire stock of complainant company was sold by the original subscribers for a valuable consideration to the present stockholders of the corporation, who had no notice of any adverse claim to the land;

Case Note.—Permitting undelivered deed, wrongfully recorded by grantee, to remain on record as estoppel of grantor or his successors to deny its delivery as against one who has purchased in reliance on the record:

—While the decision in ALABAMA COAL & COKE Co. v. GULF COAL & COKE Co. is formally put upon the ground that the complainant was not a bona fide purchaser, it in effect denies the right of one, under any circumstances, to invoke an estoppel against the owner to deny the delivery of a deed because he has permitted it to remain on the record, since the holding that he was not a bona fide purchaser was based, not upon notice of the actual facts, or lack of consideration, or any of the matters of fact upon which the question as to bona fides usually turns, but upon the broad proposition laid down in the case of Shook v. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Southern Bldg. & L. Asso., cited in the opinion, that one who does not acquire title cannot, under any circumstances, become a bona fide purchaser. This decision is against the weight of authority, as is apparent from the cases subsequently cited. It is true that the decisions in these cases were rendered upon the assumption that the person invoking the estoppel was a bona fide purchaser; but in so assuming the courts did not mean to imply that apart from the estoppel, he had acquired any title to the premises, but merely that he had paid value without notice of the real fact of the nondelivery. Upon the contrary, it was clearly assumed that, apart from the estoppel, he had no title, and that was the very reason why he invoked the doctrine of estoppel.

Where an undelivered deed, deposited in that, after the recording of his deed to Peters, Odom conveyed the same property to Musgrove brothers, whose title defendant holds; and that, prior to the payment of the purchase money under these conveyances, the respective grantees had notice of the record of the prior deed from Odom to Peters; and that they therefore knew that Peters could make sale of the property to bona fide purchasers and obtain the money therefor; and that, with full knowledge of that fact, they permitted the deed to remain on record, and in equity and good faith they were estopped to show the nondelivery of the Peters deed as against complainant.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. W. C. Davis and A. F. Fite, for appellant:

The original bill and the proposed amendment could each stand on a different state of facts, and are therefore inconsistent and repugnant to the rules of equity pleading.

escrow with instructions that it should not be delivered until the grantor's death, was wrongfully obtained by the grantee and placed upon record, the grantor having knowledge thereof and acquiescing therein for three years, it was held, in Pittman v. Sofley, 64 Ill. 155, that the grantor was estopped from alleging the invalidity of the deed as against a purchaser in good faith without notice of the nondelivery of the deed; the court saying: "For years the complainant [grantor] acquiesced in the truth of the record, and silently assented to the goodness of the title evidenced by it. He instituted no suit, and used no effort to prevent imposition. . . . In the absence of sufficient notice to a bona fide purchaser, the grantor must be regarded as having ratified the delivery."

Under a similar state of facts, where the grantor for seven years knew of the wrongful recording of the deed, a similar holding was made, in McConnell v. Rowland, 48 W. Va. 276, 37 S. E. 586.

Where the grantor, for three years, knew of the wrongful recording of a deed by the grantee, but made no effort to secure its cancellation, it was held, in Johnson v. Erlandson (N. D.) 105 N. W. 722, a complete estoppel as against a bona fide purchaser from the grantee, relying upon the recorded title and without knowledge of the nondelivery of the deed. Again, in Connell v. Connell, 32 W. Va. 319, 9 S. E. 254, where a grantor attempted to assert the invalidity of a deed, wrongfully recorded by the 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

grantee, as against a purchaser in good faith without notice, the court said: "The plaintiff is estopped at this late day from denying the validity of said deed. He had full notice for nearly eighteen years that said deed was upon the public records of the county, and he not only took no action to set it aside, but never questioned its validity until the property passed into the hands of a purchaser from . . . [the grantee]." Upon similar facts, like decisions have been made in Haven v. Kramer, 41 Iowa, 382, and Mays v. Shields, 117 Ga. 814, 45 S. E. 68.

A somewhat similar case is that of Costello v. Meade, 55 How. Pr. 356, where it was held that the holder of a mortgage, who learned of the recording of a forged satisfaction piece, but took no steps to correct the record, suffering it to appear as though the mortgage was actually discharged, was estopped to assert the forgery as against persons who had acquired subsequent rights in reliance upon the truth of the record.

This note is not intended to cover the question as to the effect of recording, or permitting or acquiescing in the record of, a deed, or a delivery thereof in fact or law, by the grantor, but merely the question whether permitting the deed to remain on the record will estop one to deny its delivery.

And also see 22 L.R.A. 256, for a note on Estoppel of landowner by permitting record title to remain in another; but which does not treat the exact point ruled by ALABAMA COAL & COKE CO. v. GULF COAL & COKE CO.

Messrs. Smith & Smith for appellee.

Tyson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill in this cause was filed under §§ 809 et seq. of the Code of 1896 to quiet the title to the coal and other minerals owned by complainant in, under, and upon a certain tract of land. It contains all the necessary statutory averments. The point is made that the owner of coal and minerals in, under, and upon land, with no title to the surface, cannot invoke the remedy afforded by the statute. The language of the statute pertinent to this point is this: "When any person is in peaceable possession of lands, whether actual or constructive, claiming to own the same, and his title thereto or to any part thereof is denied or disputed, . . . such person so in possession may bring and maintain a suit in equity to settle the title to such lands and to clear up all doubts or disputes concerning the same." It is admitted that the coal and other mineral are a part of the land, but the contention seems to proceed upon the theory that, because this interest does not comprise the whole of the land, therefore it is not land within the meaning of the word "lands," employed in the statute. We think this a too narrow and technical construction. The statute is a remedial one and should be liberally construed. Whenever a person acquires such an interest in land as is capable of being possessed peaceably, and it is so possessed, we are of the opinion that the statute affords the owner of such an interest a remedy to have his title quieted.

The right of the owner to maintain such a bill was recognized in the case of Smith v. Gordon, 136 Ala. 495, 34 So. 838. If this be not true, the owner of the surface, after parting with the mineral interest, could not bring such a bill because he is not the owner of the whole of the land. And, by analogy, the owner of a life estate in lands would be denied the benefit of the statute because he does not own the whole estate.

The amendment to the bill was clearly not a departure. Ibid.; Bledsoe v. Price, 132 Ala. 621, 32 So. 325. This amendment seeks to estop the respondent from showing that the deed from Odom to Peters, from whom complainant derives his title by mesne conveyances, was never in fact delivered. It is not averred that the respondent in any wise induced the complainant, or any one of those through whom it claims, to purchase the lands. The ground of the estoppel sought to be enforced is rested solely upon the fact that respondent and its predecessors in title, knowing that Peters could make sale of the property to bona fide purchasers and obtain the money therefor, and, with full knowledge that the deed to Peters was of record, took no action to have it annulled. If the deed was never delivered by Odom to Peters, then Peters acquired no title or estate in the land whatsoever. Tarwater v. Going, 140 Ala. 273, 37 So. 330; Lyon v. Hardin, 129 Ala. 643, 646, 29 So. 777; Fitzpatrick v. Brigman, 130 Ala. 450, 30 So. 500; Frisbie v. McCarty, 1 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 56; Goodlett v. Kelly, 74 Ala. 213. Nor did Peters's grantee, or any other person claiming under him, acquire any title. Fitzpatrick v. Brigman and Goodlett v. Kelly, supra; 1 Tiedeman, Real Prop. § 812, and cases cited in note 2.

The fact that complainant, or those through whom it claimed, did not know of the nondelivery of the deed by Odom to Peters is of no moment. They are not bona fide purchasers, and are therefore not entitled to protection on account of their want of knowledge or notice of that fact, having acquired no title or estate under the conveyance to them to the lands. Shook v. Southern Bldg. & L. Asso. 140 Ala. 575, 37 So. 409. This being the law, the respondents knew that Peters could not make sale of the property to bona fide purchasers, and therefore the equity upon which the predicate is laid in the amendment to the bill for an estoppel is wanting. And clearly the respondent was under no duty to take any action to have the deed to Peters annulled. If in possession, it may have done so in order to remove it as a cloud upon its title; but it owed the complainant no duty to do so, and, failing in this regard, does not work an estoppel against it and in favor of the complainant to now assert that the deed to Peters was void because never delivered. The demurrer interposed to this phase of the bill, as amended, was improperly overruled.

The decree appealed from will be reversed, and one will be here entered sustaining the demurrer.

Reversed and rendered.

H. C. TIPTON, Appt.,

v.

R. M. SMYTHE.

(78 Ark. 392, 94 S. W. 678.)

State bonds—limitation of time for payment—validity.

1. A statute limiting the time for preresentation of state bonds which have been overdue for a period of eighteen months, to six months from the time of notice, and which provides for publication of notice in a newspaper published at the capital city of the state, and for filing of copies with the secretaries of various boards of trade, is not unreasonable, and therefore does not impair the constitutional rights of a bondholder, although, by reason of absence from the country, he actually receives no notice of the statute until after the expiration of the limitation period.

Same—obligation of contract—impairment.

2. No impairment of a contract right to use state bonds in payment for state lands is effected by a statute providing for the payment of the bonds in cash, and limiting the time for presentation to six months after publication of notice, after the expiration of which the bonds are not to be recognized as valid for any purpose.

Same—implied repeal.

3. That a statute providing a limitation period for the presentation of overdue state bonds does not in express terms repeal a statute authorizing them to be tendered in payment for state lands, does not leave the rights accorded by such statute in force, where it provides that, after the expiration of the limitation period, the owner shall be debarred from deriving any benefit from them, and that they shall thereafter be void.

to compel defendant to accept a coupon from state bonds in payment for land. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Robert L. Rogers for appellant.

Messrs. Bradshaw, Rhoton, & Helm for appellee.

McCulloch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee, R. M. Smythe, being the owner of a bond numbered 2,034, in the sum of $1,000 with 55 semiannual interest coupons of $30 each attached thereto, issued by the state of Arkansas on January 1, 1870, and due thirty years after date, applied to the commissioner of state lands to purchase a certain tract of real-estate bank lands situated in Phillips county at the price of $240, and tendered to the treasurer of state eight of said interest coupons in payment therefor. The treasurer refused to accept said coupons on the ground that the bonds and coupons attached were barred because not presented within the time required by an act of the general assembly approved May 3, 1901 (Laws 1901, p. 262); and appellee thereupon presented to the circuit court of Pulaski county his petition for writ of mandamus to require the treasurer to accept said coupons in payment for the land. The treasurer appeared and demurred to the petition, the demurrer was overruled, and final judgment was rendered awarding the writ in accordance with the prayer of the petition; and the treasurer has appealed to this court.

Said bond was issued by the state pursuant to the provisions of an act of the general assembly of April 6, 1869 (Laws 1869, p. 115), providing for the funding of the public debt of the state; the particular bond in question being a reissue, under said act, of real-estate bank bonds then outstanding. Section 10 (page 118) of said act of 1869 pledged the faith of the state for the payment of said bonds and interest, and to provide annually a sinking fund to pay off the principal as the same should become due. Section 11 of the act provides that "the proceeds of all of the mortgages, notes, bills, and other securities in possession of the state, obtained as security for the bonds issued to the real estate and state bank, are hereby set aside as a sinking fund for the payment of the interest and principal of the bonds to be issued in pursuance of this act." The act of May 3, 1901, the validity of which is challenged by appellee, is entitled "An Act to Provide for the Cancellation of Certain State Bonds, and to Fix the Rate of Sinking Fund Tax." It provides (§ 1) that immediately after its passage "the state treasurer shall make a call for all outstanding valid bonds of the state, except those of the issue of 1899;" and (§ 2) that the publication should be made in a daily newspaper published in the city of Little Rock, and certified copies of the call should be filed with the secretaries of the stock exchange of New York, Boston, and St. Louis, six months before the day fixed in the notice for expiration of the time in which the owners of bonds were allowed to present bonds for redemption. Section 3 provides that the call or notice shall warn all holders of bonds to present same for redemption and payment within six months from the first day of said publication, "or that said bonds shall thereafter be null and void and nonpayable out of the treasury." Section 5 provides that all valid bonds presented within the time prescribed shall be redeemed, and paid by the treasurer out of the moneys in his hands to the credit of the sinking fund, and the succeeding section provides for a levy of taxes to raise a sinking fund, out of which the bonds shall be paid. Section 4 of the act is as follows: "All persons who shall hold any of said valid bonds, and shall neglect or refuse to present same to the treasurer of state for redemption within the time prescribed by this act and set out

The following periods have been held unreasonable for this purpose:

Eight months. Hathaway v. Merchants' Loan & T. Co. 218 Ill. 580, 75 N. E. 1060.

Six months. Sherman v. Nason, 25 Mont. 283, 64 Pac. 768; Keyser v. Lowell, 54 C. C. A. 574, 117 Fed. 400 (action on judgment of sister state).

Three months. Relyea v. Tomahawk Paper & Pulp Co. 102 Wis. 301, 72 Am. St. Rep. 878, 78 N. W. 412; Lamb v. Powder River Live Stock Co. 67 L.R.A. 558, 65 C. C. A. 570, 132 Fed. 434 (action on judgment of sister state).

Eight weeks. Parmenter v. State, 135 N. Y. 154, 31 N. E. 1035.

Thirty days. Berry v. Ransdall, 4 Met. (Ky.) 292.

Generally, it is assumed that existing 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

causes of action are sufficiently protected by the lapse of a reasonable time between the enactment and the taking effect of the new statute; but in Gilbert v. Ackerman, 159 N. Y. 118, 45 L.R.A. 118, 53 N. E. 753, and Price v. Hopkin, 13 Mich. 318, it was held that a new statute must fix a reasonable period of grace after it goes into effect. The contrary position was expressly taken in Smith v. Morrison; Stine v. Bennett; Duncan v. Cobb; Eaton v. Manitowac County; Hedger v. Rennaker; and Wrightman v. Boone County,—supra.

On the broad general question as to the constitutionality of statutes which reduce the period of time allowed by the statute limitations, as affecting existing causes of action, which this note does not attempt to treat, see note to 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 528.

in said notice, shall thereafter be debarred from deriving any benefit from same; and said bonds shall thereafter be invalid and nonpayable. The treasurer of state shall, upon expiration of the period of presentation and redemption herein fixed, indorse on the record of each of said bonds herein called in but not presented, that same is barred of payment by the provisions of this act, and same shall no longer be carried on the books of the treasurer or auditor as part of the valid indebtedness of this state."

Appellee, in his petition attacks the validity of the act of May 3, 1901, on the following grounds: "(A) Because said act seeks to deprive the owner of this bond of his property, without due process of law, by canceling said bond without payment, in violation of the Constitution of the state of Arkansas, and of the Constitution of the United States. (B) Because said act seeks to call in, or to cancel, without payment, an obligation of the state of Arkansas, under terms and conditions which were not the law, and not therefore a part of the contract, at the time of the issuance of said bond, and thereby impairs the obligation of the contract between the state of Arkansas and the holder of the bond; and said act is in conflict with the Constitution of the State of Arkansas and the Constitution of the United States. (C) Because the time within which to present said bond for payment is too short, and is in violation of public policy. (D) Because said act does not repeal § 4866 of Kirby's Digest, providing for the acceptance of said bonds in payment of the purchase price of real-estate bank lands belonging to the state of Arkansas." A feature of both the first and second contentions of appellee, that the act in question seeks to call in and cancel the bonds of the state without payment thereof, can easily be disposed of by reference to the express terms of the act itself. The express object and purpose of the act is to call in the bonds for payment and redemption, and not for adjudication as to their validity or cancellation without payment. No unreasonable provisions are found in the act requiring the bondholder to submit his bond to the treasurer or any other person or board for final determination as to its validity. It is true that the act authorized the treasurer to pay valid bonds only, and thereby imposed upon him the duty of ascertaining the validity of all bonds presented for payment; but his adverse decision as to the validity of a bond was in no wise binding upon the bondholder, to whom the courts are always open for an adjudication of such questions. In this respect the act in question is entirely different from the statute condemned by this court in McCracken v. Moody, 33 Ark. 81, whereby 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

holders of school-district warrants were required to present them within a fixed time for cancelation and reissue, and to submit them for final determination as to their validity to a board composed of the county judge and county clerk. It is urged against the validity of the statute that it is in violation of the Constitution of this state and of the Constitution of the United States, because the time within which the bonds must have been presented was too short, and the effect was to deprive the holder of his property "without due process of law;" and that it impaired the obligation of the contract between the state and its bondholders, inasmuch as, at the date of the issuance of the bond, no authority existed in the law for peremptorily calling in such obligations. We do not think either contention is sound. The statute merely prescribes a period of limitation within which outstanding past-due bonds of the state might be presented for payment and redemption. That the legislature may prescribe a period of limitation within which rights may be asserted, even though no limitation existed when the right accrued, or may shorten a period of limitation which existed when the right accrued, is too well settled now for controversy. The only restriction upon that power is that the added limitation must be reasonable, and must afford an ample opportunity for the assertion of existing rights; otherwise the effect would be to impair the obligation of a contract, or to deprive a person of property without due process of law.

Chief Justice Waite, in delivering the opinion of the court in Terry v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 628, 24 L. ed. 365, said: "This court has often decided that statutes of limitation affecting existing rights are not unconstitutional if a reasonable time is given for the commencement of an action before the bar takes effect. [Citing] Hawkins v. Barney, 5 Pet. 457, 8 L. ed. 190; Jackson ex dem. Hart v. Lamphire, 3 Pet. 280, 7 L. ed. 679; Sohn v. Waterson, 17 Wall. 590, 21 L. ed. 737; Christmas v. Russell, 5 Wall. 290, 18 L. ed. 475; Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. 122, 4 L. ed. 529. It is difficult to see why, if the legislature may prescribe a limitation when none existed before, it may not change one which has already been established. The parties to a contract have no more a vested interest in the particular limitation which has been fixed than they have in an unrestricted right to sue. . . . In all such cases the question is one of reasonableness; and we have, therefore, only to consider whether the time allowed in this statute is, under all the circumstances, reasonable. Of that the legislature is primarily the judge; and we cannot overrule the decision of that department of the government unless a palpable error has been committed." The same doctrine has been announced by that court in the following cases: Koshkonong v. Burton, 104 U. S. 668, 26 L. ed. 886; Vance v. Vance, 108 U. S. 514, 27 L. ed. 808, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 854; Re Brown, 135 U. S. 703, 34 L. ed. 317, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 972; Turner v. New York, 168 U. S. 90, 42 L. ed. 392, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 38; Saranac Land & Timber Co. v. Comptroller (Saranac Land & Timber Co. v. Roberts) 177 U. S. 318, 44 L. ed. 786, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 642; Wilson v. Iaeminger, 185 U. S. 57, 46 L. ed. 805, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 573. To the same effect, see Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. p. 523; 2 Lewis's Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 668; Meigs v. Roberts, 162 N. Y. 371, 76 Am. St. Rep. 322, 56 N. E. 838; Bigelow v. Bemis, 2 Allen, 496.

It being therefore clear that the legislature had the power to pass a statute fixing a period within which the state's obligations should be presented for payment and redemption, it only remains for us to determine whether the statute in question prescribed a reasonable limitation upon the right of presentation. Of this the legislature is primarily the judge, as we have already seen. Koshkonong v. Burton, supra. "It is essential," says Judge Cooley, "that such statutes allow a reasonable time after they take effect for the commencement of suits upon existing causes of action; though what shall be considered a reasonable time must be settled by the judgment of the legislature, and the courts will not inquire into the wisdom of its decision in establishing the period of legal bar, unless the time allowed is manifestly so insufficient that the statute becomes a denial of justice." Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. p. 523. In determining whether or not the statute is reasonable, the court must consider the circumstances under which it is made to apply, and also whether the notice provided for is reasonable. "It is evident from this statement of the question that no one rule as to length of time which will be deemed reasonable can be laid down for the government of all cases alike. Different circumstances will often require a different rule. What would be reasonable in one class of cases would be entirely unreasonable in another." Re Brown, supra. However, a reference to cases will illustrate the shortest periods which the courts have approved as reasonable. The shortest statute of limitation of this state which has heretofore been passed upon by this court is the two years' statute as to suits to recover lands held under sales for nonpayment of taxes, and the court has repeatedly upheld the statute. Ross v. Royal, 77 Ark. 324, 91 S. W. 178; Finley v. Hogan, 60 Ark. 499, 30 S. W. 1045. In Terry v. 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Anderson, supra, a statute which limited the time for bringing suit to nine and one-half months was held not unreasonable. In Turner v. New York, supra, the Supreme Court of the United States, following the decision of the New York court of appeals in Meigs v. Roberts, supra, held that a statute of that state providing that deeds from the comptroller of the state of lands in the forest preserve sold for nonpayment of taxes should, after having been recorded for two years and in any action brought more than six months after the act took effect, be conclusive evidence that there was no irregularity in the assessment of the taxes, was a statute of limitation and as such was reasonable and valid. This decision was also followed in Saranac Land & Timber Co. v. Comptroller, supra, where Mr. Justice McKenna, speaking for the court, said: "The decision [in Turner v. New York] establishes the following propositions: (1) That statutes of limitations are within the constitutional power of the legislature of a state to enact. (2) That the limitation of six months was not unreasonable." In Vance v. Vance, supra, the same court upheld as reasonable a provision of the Constitution of the state of Louisiana adopted in 1868, and a statute pursuant thereto, passed March 8, 1869, requiring that all "tacit mortgages [in favor of a minor on the property of his tutor] and privileges now existing in this state shall cease to have effect against third persons after the 1st of January, 1870, unless duly recorded." The statute gave only the period from the date of passage March 8, 1869, until January 1, 1870, within which such mortgages might be recorded, and the court held it to be a reasonable provision even against an infant. In Krone v. Krone, 37 Mich. 308, the court, by Judge Cooley, upheld a statute shortening the period of limitation to one year on causes of action then existing. In Osborne v. Lindstrom, 9 N. D. 1, 46 L.R.A. 715, 81 Am. Rep. 516, 81 N. W. 72, a statute under which an existing cause of action could be asserted within nine months after the statute went into effect was upheld as reasonable. In Bigelow v. Bemis, supra, the supreme court of Massachusetts held that a statute was reasonable which shortened the period of limitation, and left about five months within which an existing cause of action might be asserted.

Applying the rule illustrated by these cases, we see no grounds upon which the statute under consideration can be held to be unreasonable. It must be remembered that when this statute was passed the bonds were past due about a year and a half. The statute required the notice to be published in a daily newspaper in the capital city of the state, and certified copies to be filed with the secretaries of the stock exchanges of New York, Boston, and St. Louis, for six months before the expiration of the time for presenting the bonds for payment. It is alleged in the petition that appellee was at the time of the passage of this act and the publication of the notice, without the limits of the United States, and had no information thereof. It is argued that the statute was unreasonable because a bondholder so situated could receive no notice of the terms of the statute. The same argument could be made in favor of a bondholder in foreign lands if the statute had given six years instead of six months for presentation if he had been making no effort to secure payment of his matured demand against the state. The legislature doubtless had in contemplation, when it fixed a short period, that the bonds were past due, and that the holders were accessible and in waiting for payment. It was not unreasonable to anticipate such a condition, and indulge the reasonable presumption that the holders of matured bonds would receive notice given in the manner pointed out by the statute. It is known that such securities are generally handled through the medium of the stock exchanges in the principal cities of the country, and that information concerning their value may be ascertained through those channels. We cannot say that the statute imposed such unreasonable terms, either as to the length of time or adequacy of the notice, that it deprived the bondholder of his property "without due process of law," or impaired the obligation of the contract.

Again, it is argued that the statute in question impairs the obligation of the contract if it be construed to bar the bondholder of using the bond in payment of real-estate bank lands, as provided by statute. Kirby's Digest, § 4866. The statute just cited provides that such bonds shall be receivable in payment of the purchase price of real-estate bank lands, but it was enacted February 26, 1879 (Acts 1879, p. 10), long after the issuance of the bonds, and therefore its provisions did not enter into and become a part of the contract. But, conceding that they did, the contract was in no wise impaired by the act of May 3, 1901, as payment of the bond in money was provided for, and would have been made if it had been presented. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Re Brown, 135 U. S. 703, 34 L. ed. 317, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 972, where a statute authorizing the issuance of refunding bonds, as an inducement for acceptance of the bonds provided that they should be receivable for taxes, held that a subsequent statute limiting the time within which the same might be so used was 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) void because it impaired the obligation of the contract. The decision was placed upon the ground that as long as the bonds remained unpaid, the holder had, according to the terms of the original statute authorizing the issuance of the same the right to use them in payment of taxes, and that a restriction of that right impaired the obligation to that extent. No provision was made for payment of the bonds within the limits prescribed by the new statute, and the court found that it would be impracticable for the bondholder to use all the bonds in payment of taxes within the time prescribed. The statute we are now considering is vastly different in its operation. There can be no higher method of discharging a past-due obligation than by payment in money; and, when this method of payment was provided by the statute, the bondholder sustained no impairment of his contract by being deprived of the right to use it in payment for lands.

Lastly, it is contended that the statute does not in express terms repeal the act of 1879, making the bonds receivable in payment of the purchase price of real-estate bank lands, and should be construed not to deprive the holder of that right given by the former statute. The statute in the broadest terms provides that bonds not presented within the time prescribed should thereafter be treated as invalid and barred for all purposes. By no sort of reasoning can the act be construed to leave the bonds in force for the purposes of use in payment for lands purchased from the state.

The Circuit Court erred in awarding the writ of mandamus, and the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to sustain the demurrer to the petition.

FLORIDA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF FLORIDA, Plff. in Err.,

v.

S. PETER HORNE.

(— Fla. —, 42 So. 388.)

Conditional pardon—violation—rearrest.

1. Where a prisoner has accepted a conditional pardon, and has been released from imprisonment by virtue thereof, but has violated or failed to perform the condition, conditions, or any of them, the pardon, in case of a condition precedent, does not take effect, and, in case of a condition subsequent,

Headnotes by the COURT.

Note.—The question as to the power to impose upon a pardon conditions extending beyond the term of the sentence is discussed in a case note in 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1064.

becomes void; and the criminal may thereupon be rearrested and compelled to undergo the punishment imposed by his original sentence, or so much thereof as he had not suffered at the time of his release.

Same—reimprisonment.

2. A conditional pardon may, by its express terms, provide that, upon violation of the conditions, the offender shall be liable to summary arrest and recommitment for the unexpired portion of his original sentence. Such stipulations upon acceptance of the pardon become binding upon the convict, and authorize his rearrest and recommitment in the manner and by or through the officials authorized as stipulated in the pardon.

Criminal law—duration of sentence—termination.

3. Under a statute which provides that, "in all cases, the court shall award the sentence, and shall fix the punishment or penalty prescribed by law," the power of the court extends to fixing the punishment; that is, the length of time within the given maximum a prisoner should be imprisoned. The law does not contemplate that the court, in fixing the punishment, shall also fix the beginning and end of the period during which the imprisonment shall be suffered. The time fixed for executing a sentence, or for the commencement of its execution, is not one of its essential elements, and, strictly speaking, is not a part of the sentence at all. The essential part of the sentence is the punishment, including the kind of punishment and the amount thereof, without reference to the time when it shall be inflicted. The sentence, with reference to the kind of punishment and the amount thereof, should, as a rule, be strictly executed. But an order of the court with reference to the time when the sentence shall be executed is not so material. Expiration of time without imprisonment is in no sense an execution of the sentence.

Conditional pardon—meaning of sentence.

4. Where reference is made in a conditional pardon to the sentence to be affected by the pardon, the sentence is to be taken in its legal and proper aspect, without reference to the words.

Same—remainder of term.

5. Where a conditional pardon contains a provision that, upon the breach of the condition on which the pardon is granted, "it shall be the duty of the sheriff of any county of this state to immediately arrest him and return him to the penitentiary to serve out the remainder of his term," the reference is to the material terms of the sentence, viz., to the length of imprisonment fixed by the sentence, and not to the particular period of time mentioned in the sentence, during which it was to be executed; since the latter is not a material or effective part of the sentence.

Same—validity.

6. Under a constitutional provision that the pardoning power "may, upon such conditions and with such limitations and restrictions as they may deem proper, . . . grant pardon after conviction, in all cases except treason and impeachment, subject to such regulations as may be prescribed by law relative to the manner of applying for pardons," the pardoning power may, in granting a pardon after conviction, impose any condition, limitation, or restriction that is not illegal, immoral, or impossible of performance, and the acceptance of the pardon binds the person accepting it to all such conditions, limitations, and restrictions contained therein that are legal, moral, and possible of performance.

Same—period of sentence.

7. The condition of a pardon that requires reimprisonment for the original sentence of imprisonment after the expiration of the particular period of time fixed by the court within which the sentence imposed should be executed is not immoral or impossible of performance during the life of the convict; nor is it illegal, since the particular period of time within which the sentence is to be suffered by the convict as specified in the sentence is not a part of the legal sentence, except so far as it fixes the quantum of time that he must suffer such penalty, and the condition imposed is not forbidden by law, and does not increase the punishment imposed by the court in the sentence.

Same—effect of violation.

8. If the condition of a pardon upon which the convict secures his release from imprisonment is violated, the pardon becomes void and the convict may be arrested to undergo so much of the original sentence as he had not suffered at the time of his release. When the conditions of a pardon are violated, the pardon is thereby rendered in law void, and, if the sentence of imprisonment has not been fully executed, the law imposes the obligation to complete the service of imprisonment fixed in the judgment of conviction and sentence of punishment. The pardon may, as one of its restrictions and limitations, designate a time for the observance of its conditions; but when the conditions are violated, the pardon becomes void in law, and the party is subject to the unsatisfied portion of his sentence as though no pardon had been granted.

Same—hearing.

9. When a convict has been released upon a conditional pardon, his rearrest and recommitment cannot be had upon the mere order of the governor alone, unless such a course is provided by a statute or by the express terms of the pardon. Unless a statute or the express terms of the pardon provide otherwise, the convict is entitled to a hearing before a court of general criminal jurisdiction in order that he may show, if he can, that he has performed the conditions of the pardon, or that he has a legal excuse for not having done so, or that he was not the same person who was convicted; and, on such a hearing, the court may, in its discretion, take the verdict of a jury as to the facts involved. But the convict is not entitled to a jury trial as a matter of right, except upon the question as to whether he is the same person who was convicted.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Gadsden County to review a judgment releasing petitioner in a writ of habeas corpus from custody to which he had been committed for a violation of a conditional pardon. Reversed.

Statement by the Court:

On July 25, 1906, the defendant in error, by counsel, presented to the chief justice of this court a petition for a writ of habeas corpus sworn to by the petitioner, in which it is stated that "the petitioner is unlawfully, as he apprehends, restrained of his liberty by" the sheriff of Leon county, Florida, who "holds petitioner in custody by virtue of a revocation of pardon or commitment, . . ." and does not hold him by virtue of any other writ or process; that on April 15, 1898, in the circuit court for Gadsden county petitioner was convicted of the offense of assault with intent to murder, and on April 22, 1898, was sentenced to five years' imprisonment from the date of the sentence; that on January 5, 1901, he was granted a conditional pardon by the pardoning board of Florida, and was thereby restored to his liberty, and he returned to Leon county; that on July 18, 1906, "long after the term of years of his original sentence had expired, and without giving him an opportunity to be heard by himself or counsel," the governor of the state of Florida, without authority of law, revoked the pardon granted to petitioner, and ordered that he be recommitted to the state prison; that, by reason thereof, the sheriff of Leon county is detaining the petitioner in the county jail at Tallahassee, Florida, for the purpose of surrendering him to the state-prison authorities. The verdict and sentence of conviction, the conditional pardon, the executive order for reimprisonment, and the return of the sheriff thereon are as follows:

State of Florida v. Peter Horne.

Assault with intent to murder.

State of Florida, Gadsden county,

April 15th, 1898.

We the jury find the defendant guilty, so say we all. E. F. Shepard, Foreman.

It is considered by the court that you, Peter Horne, for your said offense of assault with intent to murder of which you now stand convicted, be imprisoned by confinement in the state prison at hard labor for the period of five years, to begin and run from this day, and that you do pay the costs of this prosecution.

April 22, 1898.

State of Florida:

Whereas, at a meeting this day held at the capitol in the city of Tallahassee, at which were present His Excellency William D. Bloxham, Governor of said state, John L. Crawford, Secretary of State, William H. Reynolds, Comptroller, ———, Commissioner of Agriculture, and William B. Lamar, Attorney General of said state, who, under the Constitution of said state, have full power to remit fines and forfeitures, commute punishments and grant pardons after convictions, it was determined that Peter Horne, who was convicted at the spring term, A. D. 1898, of the circuit court of Gadsden county, Fla., of an assault with attempt to murder, and was sentenced therefor to imprisonment at hard labor in the penitentiary for the term of five years, should now, upon petitions signed by numerous citizens of Gadsden and Wakulla counties, members of the legislature and other prominent citizens, be granted a pardon conditioned upon his abstaining hereafter from all intoxicating liquors and other beverages, and shall lead a peaceable, law-abiding life; failing in which it shall be the duty of any sheriff of this state to at once arrest him and return him to complete his term.

Therefore, be it known, that the said Peter Horne is hereby granted a conditional pardon, it being a condition of this pardon that if the said Horne shall break the peace, take a drink of intoxicating liquor or other beverage, or become intoxicated, then this conditional pardon shall be null and void, and it shall be the duty of the sheriff of any county of this state to immediately arrest him and return him to the penitentiary to serve out the remainder of his term.

In testimony whereof, we have at the capitol in Tallahassee, hereunto set our hands this fifth day of January, A. D. 1901.

William D. Bloxham, Governor.

John L. Crawford, Secretary of State.

William B. Lamar, Attorney General.

William H. Reynolds, Comptroller.

———, Commissioner of Agriculture.

State of Florida. Executive Department.
Tallahassee, Florida, July 18th, 1906.

Whereas, it appears that on the 5th day of January, A. D. 1901, the state board of pardons granted to one Peter Horne, who was convicted at the spring term, A. D. 1898, of the circuit court in and for Gadsden county, Florida, of the crime of assault with intent to murder, and was sentenced therefor to imprisonment of hard labor in the penitentiary for the term of five years, a conditional pardon upon the conditions that he the said Peter Horne shall abstain thereafter from the use of all intoxicating liquors and other beverages, and should lead a peaceable, law-abiding life, failing in which it should become the duty of any sheriff of this state to at once arrest him and return him to the penitentiary to complete his term of imprisonment: and,

Whereas, it now appears that said Peter Horne has not kept and observed the conditions and obligations of the said conditional pardon granted him, but complaint has been made that he has not abstained from the use of all intoxicating liquors and other beverages, but has become and is in a state of complete intoxication, and that he is now under arrest, and in the city jail of Tallahassee, Florida, under a charge of drunkenness and disorderly conduct, as shown by the affidavit of William Langston, chief of police of the city of Tallahassee, now on file in the executive office:

Now, therefore, it is ordered, that the said Peter Horne be immediately arrested by the sheriff or constable of any county of the state of Florida, and immediately delivered to the state-prison authorities, to complete the remainder of the original sentence imposed on him by said court.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand at Tallahassee, the capitol, this 18th day of July, A. D. 1906, and caused the same to be attested by the great seal of the state.

[Signed] N. B. Broward, Governor.

By the Governor, attest:

[Signed] John L. Crawford,
Secretary of State.

State of Florida, Leon County.

The revocation of the pardon of S. Peter Horne, with direction to recommit him to the state prison of Florida, came to hand July 18th, 1906, and on the same day the said S. Peter Horne was taken in custody by me and committed to the county jail of Leon county, Florida, where he now is, to await transportation to the state prison of the state of Florida. This July 22, 1906.

C. Hopkins, Sheriff.

By J. B. Hopkins,
Deputy Sheriff.

Under authority of § 5, art. 5, of the Constitution, the chief justice issued a writ of habeas corpus upon the petition, returnable before the judge of the second judicial circuit, in which both Leon and Gadsden counties are situated. The return of the sheriff was that he held the petitioner "by virtue of a revocation of pardon or commitment issued by the governor of Florida . . . to recommit [him] to the state prison in accordance with such order." Upon motion to quash the return and discharge the petitioner, the court made an order that the authority under which the petitioner is held is "insufficient in law, in that it appears that the term of sentence of the said S. Peter Horne had expired prior to the alleged breaches of the conditions of his pardon; therefore, it is considered by the court that the said S. Peter Horne be discharged from custody and go hence without day."

Under the provisions of chapter 4920, Acts of 1901 (Laws 1901, p. 52), the judge hearing the cause granted to the state of Florida a writ of error herein returnable today in the present term of this court. The order of the circuit court is assigned as error.

Mr. W. H. Ellis, Attorney General, for plaintiff in error:

The petitioner should not have been discharged from custody unless the conditional pardon was absolute by reason of void conditions.

Messrs. T. L. Clarke and W. C. Hodges for defendant in error.

Per Curiam:

Where a prisoner has accepted a conditional pardon, and has been released from imprisonment by virtue thereof, but has violated or failed to perform the condition, conditions, or any of them, the pardon, in case of a condition precedent, does not take effect, and, in case of a condition subsequent, becomes void; and the criminal may thereupon be rearrested and compelled to undergo the punishment imposed by his original sentence, or so much thereof as he had not suffered at the time of his release.

Sometimes conditional pardons expressly provide that, upon violation of the condition, the offender shall be liable to summary arrest and recommitment for the unexpired portion of his original sentence. Such stipulations upon acceptance of the pardon become binding upon the convict, and authorize his rearrest and recommitment in the manner and by or through the official authority as stipulated in the pardon. Alvarez v. State, 50 Fla. 24, 111 Am. St. Rep. 102, 39 So. 481; 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 595; 6 Current Law, 876.

The questions presented by counsel are whether the conditional pardon provides for the arrest and reimprisonment of the petitioner after the expiration of the period of time mentioned in the sentence of imprisonment, and, if it does so provide, whether such a provision is legal and enforceable.

Section 2403 of the Revised Statutes of 1892 provides that "whoever commits an assault on another with intent to commit any felony punishable with death or imprisonment for life shall be punished by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding twenty years." The commission of murder in the first degree is punishable by death, or by imprisonment for life upon a recommendation of a majority of the trial jury in their verdict; the commission of murder in the second degree is punishable by imprisonment for life; and the commission of murder in the third degree is punishable by imprisonment not exceeding twenty years. Rev. Stat. 1892, §§ 2380, 2924.

Section 2923 of the Revised Statutes provides that "in all cases the court shall award the sentence, and shall fix the punishment or penalty prescribed by law." Section 2939, Rev. Stat., provides that, "when punishment by imprisonment in the state prison is awarded against any convict, the form of the sentence shall be that he be imprisoned by confinement at hard labor." The judgment and sentence of the court pronounced against the petitioner on April 22, 1898, was as follows: "It is considered by the court that you, Peter Horne, for your said offense of assault with intent to murder, of which you now stand convicted, be imprisoned in the state prison at hard labor for the period of five years to begin and run from this day."

Under the statute above quoted that in all cases the court shall award the sentence and shall fix the punishment or penalty prescribed by law, the effective part of the sentence awarded and punishment fixed in the sentence set out above is that the petitioner "be imprisoned in the state prison at hard labor for the period of five years." The period or cycle of time during which he would be required to be imprisoned for the length of time fixed by the court is to be determined by law. The power of the court extends to fixing the punishment; that is, the length of time within the given maximum the petitioner should be imprisoned. The law does not contemplate that the court, in fixing the punishment, shall also fix the beginning and ending of the period during which the imprisonment shall be suffered. The time fixed for executing a sentence, or for the commencement of its execution, is not one of its essential elements, and, strictly speaking, is not a part of the sentence at all. The essential portion of the sentence is the punishment, including the kind of punishment and the amount thereof, without reference to the time when it shall be inflicted. The sentence, with reference to the kind of punishment and the amount thereof, should, as a rule, be strictly executed. But the order of the court with reference to the time when the sentence shall be executed is not so material. Expiration of time without imprisonment is in no sense an execution of the sentence. Hollon v. Hopkins, 21 Kan. 638; Dolan's Case, 101 Mass. 219; State v. Cockerham, 24 N. C. (2 Ired. L.) 204; Ex parte Bell, 56 Miss. 282; Re Edwards, 43 N. J. L. 555, 38 Am. Rep. 653, note. While, as a general rule, the imprisonment begins with the sentence, and the sentence is subject to existing valid laws, the imprisonment may be suspended by appellate or other judicial proceedings or by reprieve or otherwise; and the period during which the imprisonment may be suffered may be interrupted by escape or be changed by the pardoning power so long as the change does not increase the penalty imposed by the sentence, or is not otherwise illegal. See Fite v. State, 114 Tenn. 646, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 520, 88 S. W. 941.

The condition contained in the pardon refers to the sentence to be affected by it in its legal and proper aspect, without reference to its words.

The terms of the pardon provide "that if the said Horne shall break the peace, take a drink of intoxicating liquor or other beverage, or become intoxicated, then this conditional pardon shall be null and void; and it shall be the duty of the sheriff of any county of this state to immediately arrest him and return him to the penitentiary to serve out the remainder of his term." This provision should be considered with the previous portion of the pardon in which the word "hereafter" is used in expressing the conditions on which the pardon was asked, and, so considered, the observance of the condition is not limited to the term of the sentence, as in Arthur v. Craig, 48 Iowa, 264, 30 Am. Rep. 395. The provision authorizing any sheriff of the state to "arrest him and return him to the penitentiary to serve out the remainder of his term," has reference to the material terms of the sentence of the court, viz., to the length of imprisonment fixed by the sentence, and not to the particular period of time mentioned in the sentence during which the sentence was to be executed; which latter we have seen is immaterial and not really an effective part of the sentence.

With these principles in view, the pardon granted by the pardoning power and accepted by the petitioner, under which he secured his release, clearly contemplates that the breach of the conditions thereof at any time would render the pardon void, and subject the petitioner to reimprisonment during the remainder of the time he had not been actually imprisoned under the sentence, without reference to the expiration of the particular period of time mentioned in the sentence. This being ascertained to be the purport and effect of the terms of the conditional pardon, it must now be determined if the condition is binding upon the petitioner after the expiration of five years from the date of his sentence to five years' imprisonment.

Section 12 of article 4 of the Constitution, as amended in 1895 (Laws 1895, p. 366), reads as follows: "The governor, secretary of state, comptroller, attorney general, and commissioner of agriculture, or a major part of them, of whom the governor shall be one, may, upon such conditions and with such limitations and restrictions as they may deem proper, remit fines and forfeitures, commute punishment, and grant pardon after conviction, in all cases except treason and impeachment, subject to such regulations as may be prescribed by law relative to the manner of applying for pardons." All the authorities agree that, under a constitutional provision like this, the pardoning power may, in granting a pardon after conviction, impose any condition, limitation, or restriction that is not illegal, immoral, or impossible of performance, and that the acceptance of the pardon binds the person accepting it to all such conditions, limitations, and restrictions contained therein that are legal, moral, and possible of performance. Ex parte Hawkins, 61 Ark. 321, 30 L.R.A. 736, 54 Am. St. Rep. 209, 33 S. W. 106; State v. Smith, 1 Bail. L. 283, 19 Am. Dec. 679; Arthur v. Craig, supra; People v. Potter, 1 Park. Crim. Rep. 47, 1 Edm. Sel. Cas. 235; Flavell's Case, 8 Watts & S. 197; Lee v. Murphy, 22 Gratt. 789, 12 Am. Rep. 563; Re Convicts, 73 Vt. 414, 56 L.R.A. 658, 51 Atl. 10.

The condition of the pardon in this case that requires reimprisonment for the remainder of the original sentence of imprisonment, after the expiration of the particular period of time fixed by the court within which the sentence imposed should be executed, cannot be said to be immoral, or to be impossible of performance during the life of the petitioner; nor can it be illegal, since the particular period of time within which the sentence is to be suffered by the convict as specified in the sentence is not a part of the legal sentence, except so far as it fixes the quantum of time that he must suffer such penalty, and the condition imposed is not forbidden by law, and does not increase the punishment imposed by the court in its sentence. The case of State ex rel. Davis v. Hunter, 124 Iowa, 569, 104 Am. St. Rep. 361, 100 N. W. 510, does not conflict with this rule, as in that case a condition imposed was held to be illegal. 4 Current Law, 872.

If the particular period of time fixed by the court within which the execution of the sentence of imprisonment was to be fully performed or suffered is extended, or held in abeyance, or postponed, the time or duration of imprisonment is not thereby increased, and the interruption of the execution of the sentence during the time the petitioner enjoyed his liberty under the conditional pardon was secured by him by his acceptance of the conditional pardon, and the petitioner cannot complain of it.

If the condition of the pardon upon which the petitioner secured his release from imprisonment has been violated by him, the pardon is void, and the petitioner may be arrested and compelled to undergo so much of the original sentence as he had not suffered at the time of his release. Alvarez v. State, 50 Fla. 24, 111 Am. St. Rep. 102, 39 So. 481; State v. Barnes, 32 S. C. 14, 6 L.R.A. 743, 17 Am. St. Rep. 832, 10 S. E. 611; 12 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 968; People v. Potter, 1 Park. Crim. Rep. 47; Re Convicts and Arthur v. Craig, supra; Fuller v. State, 122 Ala. 32, 45 L.R.A. 502, 82 Am. St. Rep. 17, 26 So. 146; State v. Chancellor, 1 Strobb. L. 347, 47 Am. Dec. 557; Ex parte Marks, 64 Cal. 29, 49 Am. Rep. 684, 28 Pac. 109.

There is undoubted wisdom in the policy of conferring upon responsible constitutional officers the power to grant conditional pardons by which persons convicted of crime may be encouraged and prompted to again become useful citizens. Should the opportunity thereby afforded a convict to reform be not appreciated, and the restraining and salutary conditions of the pardon be violated at any time during the convict's life, or during the time fixed by the pardon for their observance, the pardon becomes void, and there is both punishment for the lapse of conduct and protection to society in the exercise of the power given by law to enforce the unsatisfied portion of the original sentence.

The defendant in error accepted the conditional pardon, thereby securing his release from imprisonment; and he is bound by its legal conditions and limitations. The provisions of the pardon are, in effect, that if, at any time during his life, the defendant in error shall fail to observe its conditions, the pardon shall be null and void, and he shall be arrested to serve out the remainder of his sentence of imprisonment that he has not already actually suffered. The violation at any time of the conditions of the pardon renders it by its terms null and void, and the status of the defendant in error is as though he had never received the conditional pardon. If, when the conditions of the pardon are violated, a portion of the quantum of imprisonment fixed by the sentence has not been suffered or served, the party should be returned to serve the remainder of his time of imprisonment, as stipulated in the terms of the pardon; and, besides this, the pardon, by the breach of its conditions, is rendered in law void; and, if the sentence of imprisonment has not been fully executed, the law imposes the obligation to complete the service of imprisonment fixed in the judgment of conviction and sentence of punishment. The pardon may, as one of its restrictions and limitations, designate the time for the observance of its conditions; but, when the conditions are violated, the pardon becomes void in law, and the party is subject to the unsatisfied portion of the sentence as though no pardon had been granted.

When a convict has been released upon a conditional pardon, his rearrest and recommitment to his original sentence cannot be had upon the mere order of the governor alone, unless such a course is provided by statute, or by the express terms of the pardon. The petitioner (in the absence of statute or of express provisions in the pardon to the contrary) is entitled to a hearing before the court having jurisdiction of the writ under which he is held, in order that he may show that he has performed the condition of the pardon, or that he has a legal excuse for not having done so, or that he is not the same person who was convicted; and on such a hearing the court may, in its discretion, take the verdict of a jury as to the facts involved. But the petitioner is not entitled to a jury trial as a matter of right, except upon the question whether he is the same person who was convicted. If it be found upon such investigation that there has not been a violation of, or non-compliance with, the condition or conditions of the pardon; or if the petitioner shall show to the satisfaction of the court some valid reason or excuse for such violation or noncompliance,—he should be discharged from custody; but, if the violation of, or noncompliance with, the condition or conditions of the pardon be shown to the satisfaction of the court, without any legal reason or excuse therefor, the petitioner should be remanded to custody and ordered to have the original sentence imposed upon him duly executed, or so much thereof as has not been already suffered. The conditional pardon granted to the defendant in error in express terms authorizes any sheriff of the state to arrest him upon his violating the conditions of the pardon. It became the duty, then, of the sheriff to arrest the defendant in error upon it being made known to him from any responsible source that he had violated or was violating the conditions of his pardon, and to detain him in custody until such alleged violation could be inquired into and determined in the proper manner by the proper authority, and to bring such alleged violation promptly to the attention of some court of general criminal jurisdiction to be disposed of. It having been brought to the attention of the sheriff in this case by the executive order that the defendant in error had violated the conditions of his pardon, the sheriff acted within his authority in arresting and detaining him in custody, notwithstanding the fact that the executive order expressly ordering the arrest was, of itself, a nullity, because such order was not authorized by the pardon or by the statute. The terms and stipulations of the pardon itself, by which the defendant in error was completely bound, expressly authorized such arrest and detention though they did not authorize the executive order. Alvarez v. State, supra.

It appearing that the arrest of the defendant in error was warranted under the conditions of the pardon by which he secured his release from imprisonment, and that the order of the court discharging him from custody is erroneous, it is ordered that the judgment of the court below in this cause be and the same is hereby reversed at the cost of the defendant in error, and the cause is remanded with directions that in the habeas corpus proceedings the court do make inquiry into the truth of the alleged violation by the defendant in error of the conditions of his pardon in the manner herein pointed out, and, if such alleged violation of the conditions of such pardon shall be therein established to his satisfaction, that then the defendant in error be remanded to custody, and that the remainder of the original sentence imposed upon him, but not suffered, shall be fully executed; but, if the alleged violations of the conditions of such pardon shall not be established, or if there be shown any satisfactory legal excuse for such violation, he shall be discharged from further custody; and it is further ordered that the state attorney for the second judicial circuit shall be notified by the judge of said circuit of the time and place when and where he will hear and determine the matter, and that he be given an opportunity to produce witnesses to establish, if he can, the truth of the alleged violation of the conditions of the pardon, and that the defendant in error be accorded the like privilege of producing witnesses to refute such alleged violation if he can. Alvarez v. State, supra.

An order will be entered accordingly.

FOWLER UTILITIES COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
GEORGE H. GRAY.

(— Ind. —, 79 N. E. 897.)

Contract—enforcement—want of mutuality.

Want of mutuality will prevent a court of equity from enjoining violation of a contract by a heating company, after installing a system in a building, to furnish heat at a certain sum per annum, where the use of heat from its plant rests in the discretion of the consumer.

(January 18, 1907.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Benton County in plaintiff's favor in a suit to enjoin violation of a contract. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles M. Snyder, for appellant:

A promise made by one party without a corresponding obligation by the other is void.

Messrs. Fraser & Isham, B. B. Berry, and Dawson Smith, for appellee:

The contract alleged in the complaint is binding on both parties, even though no time is fixed in which appellee is bound to take the heat.

Carnig v. Carr, 167 Mass. 544, 35 L.R.A. 514, 57 Am. St. Rep. 488, 46 N. E. 117; Warner v. Texas & P. R. Co. 164 U. S. 418, 41 L. ed. 495, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 147; Pennsylvania Co. v. Dolan, 6 Ind. App. 118, 51 Am. St. Rep. 289, 32 N. E. 802.

Montgomery, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is a suit for an injunction to prevent the violation of an oral agreement made about September 1, 1902, wherein appellant promised to install a heating plant in appellee's building with sufficient capacity to heat the same to 78 degrees Fahrenheit, and to connect the same with a central hot-water heating plant, in consideration of the sum of $200 payable upon the installation of such plant, and $50 per year payable as long as appellee desired heat to be so supplied; and appellant was operating its central plant under a franchise granted by the board of trustees of the town of Fowler. The annual payments were to be made in two instalments—$25 on January 1st, and $25 on October 1st, of each year; and no greater charge for heating the building to be made so long as appellee desired the same to be so heated. The complaint further alleged that the plant had been completed and heat thereby supplied as agreed, and that appellee had paid said sum of $200, and all other payments as they accrued under said agreement, but that appellant is now demanding an increased price for heating said building, and threatening to cut off the hot-water supply from the same unless said increased demand is paid. A demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and appellant answered (1) by denial, and (2) affirmatively setting up the statute of frauds; and to the latter answer appellee replied in denial. A trial resulted in a finding and decree in favor of appellee, enjoining appellant from doing any act tending to violate or terminate the agreement to furnish heat for appellee's building at the rate of $50 per year so long as he may desire such heat supplied, and be able and willing to pay therefor, within the term of appellant's franchise.

The assignment of errors properly challenges the sufficiency of the complaint. The right to a future supply of hot-water heat at a special price, which appellee claims and is seeking to enforce by this suit, rests wholly upon contract. The theory of the suit, as clearly manifest from the record, is that appellant is bound to supply such heat for an indefinite time, to be determined solely by the arbitrary discretion and will of appellee. It is admitted that appellee is not bound to accept such heat for any particular period, and his only obligation is an implied promise to pay at the stipulated rate for such time as he may suffer the heat to be supplied. The general rule is that an injunction will not be granted to restrain a breach of contract by a defendant when the complainant's promises are of such a nature that they could not be specifically enforced, unless they have been already performed. 22 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 850. This rule is founded upon a want of mutuality. The term "contract" implies mutual obligation, and in general contracts, other than options, are not enforceable unless both parties thereto are bound, so that an action could be maintained by each against the other for a breach. Bishop, Contr. enlarged ed. § 78; Lawson, Contr. § 97; Henry School Twp. v. Meredith, 32 Ind. App. 607, 612, 70 N. E. 393. There are many unilateral contracts which constitute an exception to this rule, including the right to exercise certain options; but the contract in suit has been executed in part, and does not belong to that class. The principle applicable to the contract under consideration is stated in the following paragraph, quoted from the case of Rutland Marble Co. v. Ripley, 10 Wall. 339, 359, 19 L. ed. 955, 962: "Another reason why specific performance should not be decreed in this case is found in the want of mutuality. Such performance by Ripley could not be decreed or enforced at the suit of the marble company, for the contract expressly stipulates that he may relinquish the business and abandon the contract at any time on giving one year's notice. And it is a general principle that when, from personal incapacity, the nature of the contract, or any other cause, a contract is incapable of being enforced against one party, that party is equally incapable of enforcing it specifically against the other, though its execution in the latter way might in itself be free from the difficulty attending its execution in the former."

This is not an action for specific performance, but the contract is to be enforced negatively by an injunction prohibiting its breach, and the general rule governing such actions applies. In the case of Iron Age Pub. Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 83 Ala. 498, 3 Am. St. Rep. 758, 3 So. 449, involving a contract determinable at will, the court said: "We can tie the hands of the Associated Press and the other defendants by injunction, forbidding the delivery of the press despatches to anyone else than the complainant, as prayed for, and leave the complainant free to terminate the contract at its will without limitation of time or circumstance, or to perform its duties as correspondent as negligently or diligently as discretion may dictate. . . . The first decree suggested would be entirely opposed to all equity precedents and practice; the settled rule being that the courts will not interfere by injunction in cases of this kind, if, indeed, in any case where defendant cannot be made secure in his rights and remedies for violation of the duties imposed on the complainant by the contract sought to be enforced. Bromley v. Jefferies, 2 Vern. 415; Richmond v. Dubuque & S. C. R. Co. 33 Iowa, 422, and cases cited on page 486." The application of the rule to cases of this class is concisely stated by Judge Sanborn in Cold Blast Transp. Co. v. Kansas City Bolt & Nut Co. 57 L.R.A. 696, 699, 52 C. C. A. 25, 114 Fed. 77, as follows: "A contract for the future delivery of personal property is void, for want or consideration and mutuality, if the quantity to be delivered is conditioned by the will, wish, or want of one of the parties." See also Lancaster v. Roberts, 144 Ill. 213, 33 N. E. 27; Welty v. Jacobs, 171 Ill. 624, 40 L.R.A. 98, 49 N. E. 723; Rust v. Conrad, 47 Mich. 449, 41 Am. Rep. 720, 11 N. W. 265; American Base Ball & A. Exhibition Co. v. Harper, 54 Cent. L. J. 449; Hoffman v. Maffioli, 104 Wis. 630, 47 L.R.A. 427, 80 N. W. 1032; Campbell v. Lambert, 36 La. Ann. 35, 51 Am. Rep. 1; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Mitchell, 38 Tex. 85; Philadelphia Ball Club v. Hallman, 8 Pa. Co. Ct. 57; Davie v. Lumberman's Min. Co. 93 Mich. 491, 24 L.R.A. 357, 53 N. W. 625. In the case last cited above, the supreme court of Michigan said: "When a party agrees to sell articles of merchandise or deliver the productions of his labor to another at a certain price as long as he can make it pay, everyone must clearly understand that the term is dependent on conditions over which the promisee has no control, and, in so far as anyone has the power to make the term effective, it is lodged solely in the promisor, who, by judicious purchases, or skilful manipulations of labor, may be able to make a transaction pay, when a more careless, negligent, or improvident person would be unable to do so. This serious element of uncertainty destroys all mutuality in the contract, and gives the promisor full power to say when a further execution of the contract will not be advantageous, because he cannot make it pay. Contracts cannot arise where there is no mutuality, nor can they arise from the action of one party alone, where the other has no power to prevent his action." It was held, in the Philadelphia Ball Club Case, that an agreement, whereby one engaged to play baseball for a period of time which at the option of the club might equal the term of the player's life, and which reserved to the club the right to discharge the player on ten days' notice without cause, was not enforceable by an injunction against its violation by the player, for the reason that the agreement was too unfair and wanting in mutuality.

When a party comes into equity, it should be very plain that his claim is an equitable one. The application is in a measure addressed to the judicial discretion of the court. The court will not exercise its extraordinary power to restrain an apprehended injury resulting from a breach of contract, unless the petitioner is without adequate remedy at law, and the contract itself be free from doubt, and not uncertain or vague in its terms or provisions. Loy v. Madison & H. Gas Co. 156 Ind. 332, 58 N. E. 844. In the case of Rust v. Conrad, supra, a bill in equity founded upon a contract determinable at the will of one of the parties was dismissed as not of equitable cognizance; the principal ground, as stated by Judge Cooley, being as follows: "But the court will also refuse to interfere in any case where, if it were to do so, one of the parties might nullify its action through the exercise of a discretion which the contract or the law invests him with. The refusal in such a case does not depend of necessity upon any illegality, inequality, or unfairness, but it is sufficiently based upon the impropriety of imposing on the judge the labor, and on the public the expense, of an investigation of disputes when the circumstances are such as to preclude any judgment that may be rendered from being final. No court can with reason be called upon to do a vain thing. . . . All contracts where the party has reserved to himself, or where the law gives him, the authority to render nugatory any decree that ought to be rendered in their enforcement, rest upon the same principle. This was recognized in Rutland Marble Co. v. Ripley, 10 Wall. 339, 359, 19 L. ed. 955, 962; and more distinctly asserted and decided in Southern Exp. Co. v. Western North Carolina R. Co. 99 U. S. 191, 25 L. ed. 319. In this last case the very strong assertion is made that 'a court of equity never interferes where the power of revocation exists.'"

It is admitted that the supply of hot-water heat bargained for in the contract under consideration could be terminated at the will of appellee, without liability for damages, and it must follow that its continuance was dependent upon the pleasure of both parties. The decree entered by the trial court may, for aught we know, have been virtually annulled before this time at the instance of appellee in the exercise of his discretion. The agreement relied upon, so far as it remains executory, is not binding for want of mutuality, and its performance cannot be enforced in equity at the suit of either party.

Other objections to the complaint have been urged, but the conclusion reached renders their consideration unnecessary.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to sustain appellant's demurrer to the complaint.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

HARRIET F. KUHLEN

v.

BOSTON & NORTHERN STREET RAILWAY COMPANY.

(— Mass. —, 79 N. E. 815.)

Carrier—crush at car—negligence.

1. Where it appears that there is usually a large crowd at a particular station to take a particular train, and that there has been on many occasions surging and struggling to get upon the cars, the jury may find the carrier negligent in failing to anticipate such occurrences and take precautions to protect intending passengers from injury therefrom.

Same—extra men.

2. The jury must determine whether or not a carrier is bound to provide extra men at certain hours of the day to prevent injury to intending passengers on its platforms, the crowding of which at such times is unavoidable.

Same—negligence of passenger.

3. An intending passenger is not negligent, as matter of law, in entering a crowd attempting to board a train, by the fact that she narrowly escaped injury at the same place by doing so on former occasions.

Evidence—lease—effect on liability.

4. Since the fact that a carrier is operating under a lease of tracks and station facilities which makes it subject to the rules and regulations of the lessor does not of itself absolve it from liability for failure to exercise supervision over persons coming to the station to take its trains, necessary to prevent injury by crowding into the cars, it is not error to exclude from evidence the lease, in an action against the carrier for injury caused by such a crowd.

(January 1, 1907.)

Case Note.—Injury by crush in entering car at elevated or subway station:—

While it is not negligence, as matter of law, for a street surface railway company to permit its cars to become overcrowded, as shown by case note in 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 399, a higher degree of care seems to be exacted of elevated and subway companies, which control the means of access to their trains, and are able to regulate the number of persons who shall be admitted, than is exacted in the case of ordinary street surface railways. One of the earliest cases in which the question of the liability of an elevated railroad company for injury to a passenger about to take a train, caused by overcrowding, arose, was McGearty v. Manhattan R. Co. 15 App. Div. 2, 43 N. Y. Supp. 1088, which held that, where an elevated railroad company permitted the platform from which passengers entered its trains to become so overcrowded that a passenger was pushed off into the street by the surging of the crowd, it was liable for the resulting injuries. The court said in this case: "It is easy to see that, as there was a constant accumulation of passengers upon the platform, unless they were removed by the trains, the platform of the station would become overcrowded, and that such overcrowding might render the place unsafe. That was shown to be the condition in this case. The trains did not remove the passengers as fast as they accumulated, and the defendant continued to sell tickets and admit passengers to the platform. When the plaintiff entered upon the platform, it was a safe place, and he had the right to assume that no part of it would be rendered unsafe by any act of the defendant. . . . The defendant must be assumed to have known the capacity of its platform, and when it had admitted passengers to the extent of such capacity. If, when having done this, the passengers were not removed by its trains, it became its duty to permit no more to enter. It had no more right to accumulate a crowd at the rear, which, pressing forward, would precipitate those at the edge of the platform into the street, than it would have the right to go upon the platform and push them off by physical force."

A similar case is Dawson v. New York & B. Bridge, 31 App. Div. 537, 52 N. Y. Supp. 133, in which it was held that, where an elevated railroad company permitted a mass of persons desiring to board a train to crowd upon the car platform so rapidly and with such force that a passenger was unable to control his own movements, and was thrust hither and thither against his will, until one of his legs sank into the space between the third and fourth cars, whereby he was injured, the jury might well conclude that a reasonable degree of foresight on the part of the carrier would have anticipated the danger to passengers which might thus arise from overcrowding, and that, if they had exercised due care to protect the passenger against that danger, he would not have been injured. The theory upon which the decision is based is shown by the following language of the court: "The defendants in the case at bar

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Essex County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused to plaintiff, an intending passenger, on defendant's car, by a crush at the station. Overruled.

The facts upon which the case depended sufficiently appear in the opinion. The instructions requested by defendant and refused by the court, which are referred to, but not set out in the opinion, are as follows:

"(1) On all the evidence, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover.

"(2) The plaintiff was not in the exercise of due care.

"(3) There is no evidence of negligence of the defendant, its servants, or agents.

"(4) The plaintiff assumed the risk of being jostled, and all danger and inconvenience incident thereto, when she entered into the crowd endeavoring to get upon the car.

"(5) In choosing to travel on a street car when the same was crowded, the plaintiff assumed the risk of injury incident to such crowding.

"(7) If it is not practicable for the defendant to carry on its business without the crowding of its platforms and cars at certain hours of the day, it is not negligence on the part of the defendant to fail to employ a large force of men at those hours to prevent jostling and crowding at the entrance to the cars."

exercised complete control over the avenues of access to the train upon which the plaintiff took passage. It was within their power to limit the number of passengers who should be permitted to be upon the station platform at that particular time and the number who should go or remain together upon the car platform; and it was their duty to exercise that power so far as they could reasonably foresee that a failure to exercise it would result in injury to incoming passengers."

Both these cases are cited with approval in Dittmar v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. 91 App. Div. 378, 86 N. Y. Supp. 878, in which the plaintiff, having ascended to the platform of the carrier to take a train, was pushed by the crowd with considerable force against the side of the car, where she was held for a moment or two, and then thrown by the crowd violently into the car, sustaining the injuries on which she based her action. It was admitted that the passengers were required to pay their fare before being admitted to the platform, and that the carrier had the means of keeping people from going on the platform when there was no way of carrying them from it. The court said it was established beyond dispute that, if the plaintiff sustained injuries, they were due to the act of the defendant in selling tickets and accumulating passengers upon the platform in such numbers as to render their movements uncontrollable, and that the natural rush of the crowd for the train when it ultimately came along was so forcible and violent as to be sufficient to inflict upon her the bodily injury of which she complained. A judgment in favor of the plaintiff was therefore affirmed.

In Viemeister v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. 91 App. Div. 510, 87 N. Y. Supp. 162, which was an action by a passenger on an elevated train for an injury to his knee received in entering the car as a result of the overcrowding, there was some evidence that the overcrowding of the car was not only due to the natural and voluntary rush of passengers from the platform, but that the guard, against the remonstrance of those who were in the car, pushed and forced others into the car with considerable violence. The court instructed the jury that, if the plaintiff was injured by the rush of people who wanted to get on the car, without the intervention or assistance of the guard, he could not recover, since this was a risk which every man takes in a crowded city in trying to get home at the same time that everybody else wants to get home; that he could recover only in case the injury was inflicted by the guard pushing more people into the car than it would safely hold. But on appeal this instruction was held to be erroneous, and to require the reversal of the judgment in favor of the defendant, and the court said, in criticiz-

Sheldon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is the duty of the defendant, as a carrier of passengers for hire, to use the highest degree of care consistent with the nature and extent of its business, not only to provide safe and suitable vehicles for their carriage, but to maintain all such reasonable arrangements for control and supervision both of the passengers and of its own servants as prudence would dictate to guard its passengers, while they occupy that relation, against all dangers that are naturally and according to the usual course of things to be expected. It is bound to select and employ a sufficient number of competent servants to meet any exigency which, in the exercise of that high degree of vigilance and care to which it is held, it ought reasonably to have anticipated. This is the unvarying doctrine of our own decisions. Treat v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 131 Mass. 373; Com. v. Coburn, 132 Mass. 555; Bryant v. Rich, 106 Mass. 180, 8 Am. Rep. 311; Dodge v. Boston & B. S. S. Co. 148 Mass. 210, 2 L.R.A. 83, 12 Am. St. Rep. 541, 19 N. E. 373. And its duty to use all proper means and precautions to protect its passengers against injuries caused by the misconduct of other passengers, such as under the circumstances might have been anticipated and could have been guarded against, is no less stringent than the obligation to prevent misconduct or negligence on the part of its own servants. Simmons v. New Bedford, V. & N. S. B. Co. 97 Mass. 361, 93 Am. Dec. 99; Nichols v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 168 Mass. 528, 47 N. E. 427. "There is no doubt of the duty of a railroad company to use all such means and precautions as are reasonably practicable for the protection and safety of its passengers, not only from the negligence or misconduct of its own agents and servants, but also of other passengers and of other ing the judge's charge: "Assuming that the jury could have found from the evidence that the plaintiff was injured by the natural, voluntary, and unrestrained movements incident to the overcrowding of passengers, and without the physical aid of the guard exerted in pushing them against each other, a basis would have been clearly established under the law for a finding that [it] . . . was negligent. The conditions were created by the defendant, and, if they were dangerous, it was certainly responsible for them. The remarks of the learned trial court may perhaps be conceded to be sound when applied to a road which is operated upon the surface of a public highway, but have no application to a road built upon private property to which the company controls access, and where a crowd cannot congregate in dangerous numbers unless the individuals composing it pay fares to the company in advance;" quoting with approval the language of the court in Dawson v. New York & B. Bridge, supra.

The theory upon which the liability of the carrier is sustained in this class of cases is further illustrated by the case of Wagner v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. 95 App. Div. 219, 88 N. Y. Supp. 791, in which the liability of the carrier was denied, where it appeared that it operated a railroad over the Brooklyn bridge, and had the privilege of maintaining a booth for the sale of tickets and ticket-chopping boxes, but had no control of the bridge itself, which was open to the public and under the police control of the city of New York, and on the day of the accident there was a blockade on the defendant's road, and, for the purpose of preventing the crowd from passing up the stairway from the bridge to the car platform, the defendant had stretched a chain across the passage at the foot of the stairway, but the crowd pressed through the barrier and pushed over one of the ticket-chopping boxes, and the plaintiff, who had been pushed forward by the crowd, stumbled over it and was injured. The court distinguished the class of cases discussed above, on the ground that in those cases the carrier, having control of the premises, was responsible for the overcrowding of such premises, while in the present case the evidence was undisputed that the carrier was not in a position to control the assembling of the crowd, and was actually engaged in an effort to prevent the overcrowding of the platform above, which was in its control, at the time when the crowd overrode its barriers and crushed down the box.

Cases as to the liability for injury because of crowding, to a passenger during the course of the transportation or at its termination, are not included in this note.

As to the general question of the duty of carrier permitting cars to become overcrowded, see note in 24 L.R.A. 710.

persons who are not passengers." Allen, J., in Brooks v. Old Colony R. Co. 168 Mass. 104, 165, 46 N. E. 566. In United R. & Electric Co. v. State, 93 Md. 619, 54 L.R.A. 942, 86 Am. St. Rep. 453, 49 Atl. 923, it was held in an elaborate opinion that a passenger on a street-railway car could hold the railway company liable for an assault committed upon him by a drunken and disorderly passenger who had once been put off the car, but afterwards had been allowed to get on again and ride without hindrance; and this upon the general ground that, when the servants of a carrier know, or have the means of knowing, that a disorderly passenger is likely to commit an assault, it is their duty to eject him, as in Vinton v. Middlesex R. Co. 11 Allen, 304, 87 Am. Dec. 714; and their employer is liable for their neglect of this duty if it results in injury to another passenger. McSherry, Ch. J., said in this case: "It is just as incumbent on the carrier to protect all his passengers from assault by a fellow passenger when his servants have knowledge, or the means of knowing, that an assault on someone is imminent, and when they have time and means to avert it, as it is to protect all his passengers from injuries likely to result from defective means or methods of transportation." The same general doctrine has been maintained in other jurisdictions, so far as we are aware, without exceptions. Muhlhaue v. Monongahela Street R. Co. 201 Pa. 237, 50 Atl. 937; Pittsburg & C. R. Co. v. Pillow, 70 Pa. 510, 18 Am. Rep. 424; McGearty v. Manhattan R. Co. 15 App. Div. 2, 43 N. Y. Supp. 1086; Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Hinds, 53 Pa. 512, 91 Am. Dec. 224; Flint v. Burke, 53 Miss. 200, 24 Am. Rep. 689. Other cases bearing on the same subject are cited by Loring, J., in Jacobs v. West End Street R. Co. 178 Mass. 116, 118, 59 N. E. 639. The cases of Thomson v. Manhattan R. Co. 75 Hun, 548, 27 N. Y. Supp. 608; Putnam v. Broadway & S. Ave. R. Co. 55 N. Y. 108, 14 Am. Rep. 190; Ellinger v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 153 Pa. 213, 34 Am. St. Rep. 697, 25 Atl. 1132; Graeff v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 161 Pa. 230, 23 L.R.A. 606, 41 Am. St. Rep. 885, 28 Atl. 1107; and Cornman v. Eastern Counties R. Co. 4 Hurlst. & N. 781, relied upon by the defendant,—either turn upon the proposition that, as a common carrier can be held liable for injury done by one passenger to another only upon proof that it has failed to discharge its duty of using the utmost vigilance to maintain order and guard against violence, so it must be shown that the circumstances which called for special action either were known, or, in the exercise of proper care, ought to have been known, to the defendant or its servants, or else lay down the rule (perhaps sometimes carried too far) that the carrier is not to be held liable for a mere breach of courtesy from one passenger to another.

There was evidence that there was usually a large crowd in the subway station at this time of the day; that there had been on many previous occasions the same surging and struggling to get upon the car as occurred at this time; and the jury had a right to find, as under the careful instructions of the court they must have found, that the defendant and its servants ought to have anticipated just what actually did take place, and ought, in the exercise of the necessary care, to have taken reasonable precautions to guard against such injuries as were caused to the plaintiff; and that they were negligent in failing to take such precautions and to give to the plaintiff that degree of protection which she had a right to expect from them. It follows that the defendant's third request for instructions was rightly refused.

Nor could its seventh request have been given. It was for the jury to say whether or not, if the crowding of its platforms and cars at certain hours of the day was unavoidable in carrying on its business, that the high degree of care which it was bound to exercise called for the employment of an increased number of men to prevent such jostling and crowding at the entrance of the cars as would involve danger to passengers, and whether or not it was reasonable, in view of the nature and extent of the defendant's business, to require this precaution to be taken.

It could not have been said, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff herself was not in the exercise of due care, or that she had assumed the risk of the injury that was done to her. She had been in similar crowds before, had seen the same pushing and struggling and the same failure on the part of the defendant to control the assemblage; and she had formerly so narrowly escaped injury that she said in testifying: "Many a night I have almost got killed." With the knowledge gained by this experience, however, she joined in the general rush to get into the car. All these circumstances were important to be considered by the jury in passing upon the question of her due care; and their attention was called to these circumstances by the presiding judge in his charge. But they are not conclusive against her as matter of law. The jury might say that, in spite of the failure of the defendant's servants and agents to control the crowd on previous occasions, she might depend somewhat on the hope that they would not continue to fall short of their duty. And it is hard to see how the same circumstances which simply require the question of the defendant's negligence to be left to the jury can be conclusive, as against the plaintiff, to show either that she was negligent, or that she assumed the risk. We think that these questions also were for the jury. Treat v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 131 Mass. 371; Simmons v. New Bedford, V. & N. S. B. Co. 97 Mass. 367, 93 Am. Dec. 99; Gaynor v. Old Colony & N. R. Co. 100 Mass. 208, 97 Am. Dec. 96. Accordingly the defendant's first, second, fourth, and fifth requests could not have been given.

The subway and this station were built by the Boston Transit Commission, which alone had the power to make or authorize any change therein, and were the property of the city of Boston. The defendant's occupation thereof was either under a lease or merely permissive. Stat. 1894, chap. 548, §§ 23 et seq. p. 769; Stat. 1897, chap. 500, §§ 5, 12, pp. 501, 506. See Falkins v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 188 Mass. 153, 74 N. E. 338; Hilborn v. Boston & N. Street R. Co. 191 Mass. 14, 77 N. E. 646. For the purpose of showing the conditions of its occupation of the subway, the defendant offered in evidence a written agreement between the Boston Elevated Railway Company, the lessee of the subway, and the Lynn & Boston Railroad Company, to whose rights the defendant has succeeded; and the only remaining question arises upon the defendant's exception to the exclusion of this agreement, a copy of which is annexed to the bill of exceptions. The defendant refers to the fact that in the case last cited it appeared by the agreement of the parties "that the subway and the stations in it were constructed by the Boston Transit Commission, and are owned by the city of Boston; that the platform at this station is now of the same width and in the same condition as constructed by the Transit Commission; that the Boston Elevated Railway Company operates its cars in the subway under a lease of the subway; and that the defendant operates its cars therein under permission of said elevated company, authorized by the legislature; that the elevated company has the entire management, charge, and control of the subway, the stations and platforms, except that it can make alterations therein only by the permission of the Boston L.R.A. (N.S.) ton Transit Commission." Hilborn v. Boston & N. Street R. Co. 191 Mass. 14, 16, 17, 77 N. E. 646. The defendant contends that this agreement, if it had been admitted, would have proved in the case at bar the same facts which were agreed upon in that case, and claims that it had no control or management of the station, and could not have limited the number of persons admitted thereto.

The main purpose of this agreement appears to have been to determine the amount of money to be paid by the defendant for its use of the subway, and to regulate the other pecuniary relations between the parties. The thirteenth clause, however, provides "that the cars of said Lynn & Boston Company while on the tracks of, or leased to, the elevated company, either within the subway or without, shall be subject to the rules and regularities [sic] of said elevated company and the reasonable direction of its officials." There was no offer to show what "reasonable directions," if any, had been given to the defendant, or what rules, if any, had been established by the elevated company. Nor was there any offer to show that the defendant had not been given full power to make whatever police arrangements might be necessary for the proper supervision of any expected crowds of passengers; and, if the defendant had such power, it could be held liable under the circumstances of this case. In view of the fact, which appears to have been conceded at the trial, that the defendant held this out as the proper place for its passengers to come to for the purpose of taking its cars, so that its passengers had a right to regard themselves as having come thither by its invitation, we do not see that the defendant was injured by the exclusion of this agreement. The general principle has been established that one who, though not strictly in control of a defective thing or dangerous place, yet uses it for his own benefit, and for his own purposes invites another to enter it, may, if the other elements of liability concur, be held responsible to the latter for an injury caused by the defect or danger. Heaven v. Pender, L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 503; Poor v. Sears, 154 Mass. 539, 26 Am. St. Rep. 272, 28 N. E. 1046; Carleton v. Franconia Iron & Steel Co. 99 Mass. 216, 218; Cotant v. Boone Suburban R. Co. 125 Iowa, 46, 69 L.R.A. 982, 99 N. W. 115. The details of this agreement do not appear to have been at all material to the issues raised at the trial. The effect of admitting the agreement might have been to distract the attention of the jury from the real issues of the case. We find no error at the trial.

Exceptions overruled.

CHARLES JAMES PHALEN, Appt.,
v.UNITED STATES TRUST COMPANY, Trustee, etc., of James Phalen, Deceased, et al., Resp'ts.

(186 N. Y. 178, 78 N. E. 943.)

Marriage settlement—equitable enforcement.

1. An antenuptial marriage settlement by which the groom's father undertakes to make no discrimination among his children in his will is enforceable in equity so as to prevent the enforcement of a provision in the will giving the groom only a life estate, while the portions of testator's other children are made absolute.

Same—equitable discretion.

2. Equity may exercise a judicial discretion in refusing specifically to enforce the provisions of a contract made in contemplation of marriage by which the groom is to secure an absolute estate, if, when suit is brought, his habits are such that enforcement would endanger the estate, or defeat the object of the contract.

Case Note.—Specific performance of agreement on part of third person to make provision for parties to contemplated marriage:

—Although contracts between parties contemplating marriage, in relation to their respective rights in and to the property of one another, are not infrequent in this country, instances where provision has been made by a third party in consideration of the marriage seem to have seldom been before the courts. Such agreements are, however, generally regarded, in the face of various objections, as valid and enforceable.

That the provision agreed to be made was testamentary in character, as in the case in hand, seems to be considered immaterial. As was said in King v. Molloy, 61 Kan. 683, 60 Pac. 731, 61 Pac. 686, in which, however, the settlement under consideration was made between the parties to the marriage: "Marriage settlements controlling the division and affecting the descent of property, which are intelligently made, and are just and equitable in their provisions, are sanctioned by the courts."

In De Pierres v. Thorn, 4 Bosw. 266, specific performance was decreed of a marriage settlement made in France, whereby the parents of the future wife agreed, in consideration of the projected marriage, to secure by mortgage upon their property the payment, on their demise, of a certain sum to the future husband and wife by way of dowry; and it was held that the daughter, who was to have a separate estate in the property, had a right and interest which would entitle her to maintain the action.

In Chichester v. Vass, 1 Munf. 98, 4 Am. Dec. 531, it was held that a husband might enforce a promise made before marriage by his wife's father, that he would endeavor 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Same—probate of will.

3. Neglect to interpose objections to the probate of a will will not prevent the enforcement of a contract made in anticipation of marriage, the provisions of which are antagonistic to the will.

Same—enforcement—party plaintiff.

4. A son who is a party to the contract may enforce the provision in marriage articles entered into by his father in contemplation of the son's marriage, which is subsequently consummated, to make no discrimination against him by will in favor of the other children.

(O'Brien, Haight, and Vann, JJ., dissent.)

(October 9, 1906.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, reversing an order of a Special Term for New York County which overruled a demurrer to a complaint filed to enforce specific performance of a marriage-settlement contract. Reversed.

Statement by Werner, J.:

This action was brought by the plaintiff, to do his daughters equal justice as fast as it was in his power with convenience; the judge writing the principal opinion saying: "The following principles appear to me to require no comment or illustration: (1) That a promise made by a father to a person who seeks an alliance with his daughter is a promise made in consideration of marriage, if the marriage be afterwards had with his consent. (2) That, although such promise may literally import a provision to be made for the daughter, yet, being made to the intended husband, it must be construed to be one which shall inure to the benefit of both, unless there be some special reservation to the contrary, manifesting a clear intention to preclude him from participating in the benefit thereof."

In Bell v. Sappington, 111 Ga. 391, 36 S. E. 780, it was held that an agreement on the part of a mother, in contemplation of the marriage, that, if her son-in-law would build a house upon a vacant lot belonging to her, she would convey the lot to her daughter, was supported by a valid consideration, the court, however, seeming to place more stress upon the relation of parent and child and the fact that valuable improvements had been placed upon the premises than on the fact that the marriage had taken place.

In Stoddert v. Tuck, 5 Md. 18, specific performance was denied at the suit of the married couple and the bride's father, of an agreement between the fathers of the parties contemplating marriage to make certain gifts to give the young couple a start, the principal questions in the case being the existence of the contract and the effect of part performance to take it out of the statute of frauds.

Charles James Phalen, to enforce specific performance of formal marriage articles, entered into in the city of Paris, France, on August 7, 1873, in contemplation of the plaintiff's marriage to Julia de Zakrevsky, the daughter of a Russian nobleman. The parties to such articles were the plaintiff, his father and mother, his intended bride, and her father. His father, the testator, James Phalen, covenanted and agreed in such articles, so far as material to the questions presented on this appeal, to make no distinction between his children in the distribution of his estate by will. The marriage contemplated by the articles took place a few days after their execution. The plaintiff's father died in 1887. He left a will, dated May 15, 1882, whereby he carried out his agreements contained in the marriage articles. He subsequently executed various codicils thereto, none of which conflicted with the provisions of the articles, except the seventh and last. By that codicil the testator directed that the portion of his residuary estate which he had bequeathed to the plaintiff absolutely should be held in trust, the income thereof to be paid to him during his life, and upon his death the principal was to go to his heirs at law. The testator had, however, given corresponding portions of his residuary estate to his other children absolutely. The will and codicil were thereafter admitted to probate. An accounting was had by the executors, upon which the plaintiff duly appeared, interposed objections, but subsequently withdrew them. A final decree was thereafter entered distributing the estate in accordance with the directions contained in the will and codicils, and not according to the marriage articles. The foregoing are, substantially, the material facts set forth in the complaint. The defendant trust company, as trustee under the will of the testator, interposed a demurrer to the complaint upon the ground, among others, that it did not set forth facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was overruled at the special term, but sustained by the appellate division.

Werner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We think the complaint sets forth a good cause of action in equity. To hold otherwise we would have to overturn principles of law and equity that have been recognized and established for centuries. Antenuptial contracts, whereby the parents of the parties about to marry have agreed to settle property upon one or both of the spouses, either upon the performance of the marriage ceremony or by testamentary devise or bequest, are of such frequent occurrence, especially in England, that they form a distinct class in the body of our law. For the purposes of this discussion we may assume that this action could not be maintained at law, although there is very respectable authority to the contrary in England, where actions at law have been maintained even upon informal agreements of this nature. Shadwell v. Shadwell, 30 L. J. C. P. N. S. 145, 9 C. B. N. S. 159; Douglas v. Vincent, 2 Vern. 201. One of the very purposes of equity is to aid where the law fails. In the determination of this appeal it should be borne in mind that a court of equity will take into consideration the facts and circumstances appearing when the case is tried. If it should then appear that the plaintiff's habits are such as to endanger the safety of the fund which he claims, and that its transmission to him might deprive his wife and children of proper means of support, or if for any other good reason a court of equity might deem it unfair, inequitable, or unjust that specific performance of the contract in suit should be decreed, a wise judicial discretion would, of course, be interposed to withhold a decree, the effect of which would be to defeat the very object for which the contract was made. A court of equity can always mold its decrees so as to measure out justice to all concerned, and the question whether specific performance will or will not be decreed in a given case is always addressed, in the first instance, to the sound judicial discretion of the court whose aid is invoked. Seymour v. De Lancey, 6 Johns. Ch. 222; Margraf v. Muir, 57 N. Y. 155; Day v. Hunt, 112 N. Y. 191, 19 N. E. 414; Conger v. New York, W. S. & B. R. Co. 120 N. Y. 29, 23 N. E. 983; Stokes v. Stokes, 155 N. Y. 590, 50 N. E. 342. And it is usually a question that must be decided in the light of the facts and circumstances existing at the time of the trial, so that it can rarely be disposed of upon a demurrer to a complaint.

It is suggested that, if we should give effect to the antenuptial contract formally drawn up and signed by the plaintiff and all other parties in interest, we would be treating it as a testamentary instrument which the plaintiff is, in some unexplained way, precluded from enforcing because he interposed no objections to the probate of his father's will. We think there is no force in this contention. Such agreements have been upheld for hundreds of years, although their ultimate effect is usually to change the current of attempted testamentary disposition of estates. The direct, and, indeed, the only, purpose of this agreement, plainly expressed, was to secure to the plaintiff an equal share with his sisters in the distribution of his father's estate. That was the end in view, and equity, if no good reason intervenes, will give effect to the expressed intention. The principle upon which such agreements are sustained was stated by Lord Camden as early as the year 1769, in Durour v. Perraro, Hargrave's Judicial Arguments, 304, and it was not then new. That was a case of mutual wills, in which the learned jurist said (page 309): "Though a will is always revocable, and the last must always be the testator's will, yet a man may so bind his assets by agreement that his will shall be a trustee for performance of his agreement. A covenant to leave so much to his wife or daughter, etc. . . . These cases are common; and there is no difference between promising to make a will in such a form and making his will with a promise not to revoke it. This court does not set aside the will, but makes the devisee, heir, or executor a trustee to perform the contract. . . . No man shall deceive another to his prejudice. By engaging to do something that is in his power, he is made a trustee for the performance, and transmits that trust to those that claim under him. This court is never deceived by the form of 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

instruments. The actions of men here are stripped of their legal clothing, and appear in their first and naked simplicity. Good faith and conscience are the rules by which every transaction is judged in this court; and there is not an instance to be found since the jurisdiction was established where one man has ever been released from his engagement after the other has performed his part."

We deem it unnecessary to discuss the intermediate cases which have fully and firmly established the principle that a man's representatives shall be trustees of a resulting trust for the benefit of those to whom he has bound his estate by such a contract as is here involved, for we consider the comparatively modern case of Johnston v. Spicer, 107 N. Y. 185, 13 N. E. 753, decisive of this whole controversy. In that case the husband, by an antenuptial contract, had provided that in case of his death without issue all his property should belong to the lady whom he was about to marry. The parties intermarried, and the husband predeceased the wife, intestate and without issue. This court held that, by virtue of the contract, the husband's estate went to the heirs of the wife, and, speaking through Ruger, Ch. J., said: "It has been the constant practice of the courts of this country, as well as of England, to enforce antenuptial agreements according to their terms, whether they relate to existing or after-acquired property, and to decree a specific or substituted performance of them according to the nature of the case [citing authorities]. . . . The suggestion that such contracts may be invalid, as being of a testamentary character and as contravening the statutes regulating the execution of wills, is of no force in view of the fact that for many centuries they have been sanctioned and protected by the courts, and their validity in this state has been expressly ratified and approved by statutory provisions. Laws 1848, chap. 200, § 4, p. 308; Laws 1849, chap. 375, § 3, p. 529." To the same effect are numerous other cases in this state, and they are all based upon the principle that, although a contract may contain covenants to leave property by will, that is no reason why it should not be performed. The facts of those cases are too voluminous and various for repetition here, and a few of them are cited merely to show how firmly the principle is established. Parcell v. Stryker, 41 N. Y. 480; Stanton v. Miller, 58 N. Y. 192; Shakespeare v. Markham, 72 N. Y. 400; Winne v. Winne, 166 N. Y. 283, 82 Am. St. Rep. 647, 59 N. E. 832; Gall v. Gall, 64 Hun, 600, 19 N. Y. Supp. 332; Gates v. Gates, 34 App. Div. 608, 54 N. Y. Supp. 454.

tion that this complaint does not state a good cause of action, because the contract which it sets forth may be one which would not support an action at law. There are many contracts upon which an action at law cannot be maintained that are enforceable in equity. "There are agreements which the common law, by virtue of its own doctrines, irrespective of statutory regulation, treats as invalid, as not contracts, and for which it furnishes no remedy, but which equity, in the application of its conscientious principles, considers as binding, and enforces by awarding its relief of a specific performance." Pom. Spec. Perf. § 31. In Sprague v. Cochran, 144 N. Y. 104, 38 N. E. 1000, this principle was applied to take a case out of the operation of the statute of frauds, and to the same effect is Smith v. Smith, 125 N. Y. 224, 26 N. E. 259. Many more cases might be cited to illustrate the rule that equity decrees performance of just contracts which are not enforceable at law, but this axiomatic fact needs no further demonstration.

We now pass to that phase of the discussion in which it is argued that there was no consideration as between father and son which enables the latter to maintain an action to enforce the agreement. In support of this position, there are cited some recent cases in this court, founded upon oral agreements to devise or convey estates in consideration of services rendered to, or benefits actually received by, the promisors, who died without having carried out their respective parts of the several agreements. Such contracts have been held at least open to suspicion, and courts are very reluctant to enforce them. Gall v. Gall, 138 N. Y. 675, 34 N. E. 515; Mahaney v. Carr, 175 N. Y. 454, 67 N. E. 903; Ide v. Brown, 178 N. Y. 26, 70 N. E. 101. But there is a very wide distinction between those cases and the case at bar. This action is founded upon what are known as formal marriage articles, whereby certain property is settled, or agreed to be settled, upon either one or both of the spouses about to be married. Instead of being frowned upon, such agreements are favored by the courts, and have been upheld and enforced in equity whenever the contingency provided by the contract arose. Johnston v. Spicer, supra. "They usually proceed from the prudence and foresight of friends or the warm and anxious affection of parents; and, if fairly made, they ought to be supported according to the true intent and meaning of the instrument by which they are created. A court of equity will carry the intention of these settlements into effect, and not permit the intention to be defeated." 2 Kent, Com. *165. It may be conceded that when the elder Phalen made his will he complied with the terms of the contract, in so far as it related to a testamentary provision for the wife and children of the plaintiff; but he did not perform his agreement to give to the plaintiff the same share as his two sisters, and the facts thus far disclosed suggest no reason why a court of equity should not compel complete performance at the suit of the son. He was a party to the agreement and performed his part by the marriage with his wife. He had a legal interest in the complete execution of the contract, and, under principles now well settled, he can compel performance unless some good reason is made to appear why he should not be permitted to do so.

It is the rule, both in law and equity, as was held in Borland v. Welch, 162 N. Y. 104, 56 N. E. 556, that such agreements cannot be enforced by mere volunteers or strangers to the consideration. In that case collateral relatives of the wife sought to claim under a marriage settlement made between the husband and wife and trustees, and it was held that they were mere volunteers. But there Judge Cullen referred to the rule, subscribed to by this court, that even a person not a party to such a contract may compel performance if it has been made for his benefit. In one case it was held that the relation of parent and child (Todd v. Weber, 95 N. Y. 181, 47 Am. Rep. 20), and in another husband and wife (Buchanan v. Tilden, 158 N. Y. 109, 44 L.R.A. 170, 70 Am. St. Rep. 454, 52 N. E. 724), was sufficient consideration to support the action. It is not necessary to go so far in this case. Here the principle was not only within the "influence of the consideration," as it was called, but was actually a party to the contract. In Borland v. Welch, supra, Judge Cullen quotes with approval the general rule laid down in Atherly on Marriage Settlements (page 110 of 162 N. Y. page 557 of 56 N. E.): "Equity will execute marriage articles [and other family settlements] at the instance of all persons who are within the influence of the marriage consideration, for all these rest their claims on the ground of a valuable consideration." This statement of the rule was concurred in by all the members of this court then sitting, and we regard it as entirely sound in principle. The strict legal definition of consideration need not here be discussed, since marriage settlements have always been regarded as exceptions to the general rule upon this question. "Articles for settlements in most cases stipulate for benefits to persons other than the parties to them. The frequent use of such stipulations during the past two centuries, and the number of cases in which the benefits stipulated for have been secured by the courts to those for whom they were intended, show that both conveyancers and judges have relied on and assumed their validity generally. Yet they are obnoxious to a general rule of law and equity, and depend for their efficacy on exceptions from that rule made in favor of some of them, and upon a doctrine of equity the scope of which has hardly yet been accurately determined." 1 Vaizey, Settlements, p. 140.

The question as to what persons are within the consideration of the agreement in this class of cases has frequently arisen; but it has never been doubted that the parties whose marriage forms the occasion of the agreement are within the consideration and entitled to enforce the contract. Even the issue of such marriage may enforce such an agreement, although they may not be born at the time it is made. Gale v. Gale, L. R. 6 Ch. Div. 144, 148. "The promise of a third party may be for the wife's benefit, or it may be for the mutual benefit of the married parties, and enforceable accordingly." Schouler, Dom. Rel. § 178. Actions at law have even been sustained upon mere letters to the party about to marry and at his suit, although the only consideration was the marriage. In Shadwell v. Shadwell (1860) 30 L. J. C. P. N. S. 145, 9 C. B. N. S. 159, the defendant's testator wrote to his nephew, the plaintiff, as follows: "My dear Lancey: I am glad to hear of your intended marriage with Ellen Nicholl, and, as I promised to assist you at starting, I am happy to tell you that I will pay to you one hundred and fifty pounds yearly during my life, and until your annual income derived from your profession of a chancery barrister shall amount to six hundred guineas, of which your own admission will be the only evidence that I shall receive or require." In an action by the nephew to recover, after his marriage with the lady named, the arrears of the annuity promised, he was permitted to recover at law. In the case of Coverdale v. Eastwood, L. R. 15 Eq. 121, after proposals of marriage had been accepted, the lady's father wrote to the intended husband as follows: "V. being my only child, of course she will come into the possession of what belongs to me at my decease." In other letters he made statements evidencing the same intention. The father, being then a widower, subsequently remarried. Upon his death he left a will bequeathing part of his estate to his widow and creating certain annuities. Upon a bill filed by the daughter for the enforcement of this contract, it was held, notwithstanding the manifest equities of the widow, that the daughter was entitled to the whole estate. This, as Mr. Schouler says, is a harsh case. Similar informal agreements have been enforced many times in England. Douglas v. Vincent, 2 Vern. 201; Wankford 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

v. Fotherly, 2 Vern. 322; Moore v. Hart, 1 Vern. 201.

The foregoing principles and authorities seem to completely dispose of this case, and the discussion might well close at this point; but there are a few authorities which need only to be cited to show that covenants in marriage settlements, such as the one here in question, binding the parent to leave to a child all or an aliquot part of his property at death, are most usual in such settlements, and have always been sustained. Laver v. Fielder, 32 Beav. 1, presented the same general features as those in the case at bar, except that the agreement was informal and the plaintiff was not a party thereto. It was contained in a letter by the father to the prospective son-in-law in which he promised that "at my decease she (the daughter) shall be entitled to her share of whatever property I may die seised." The father, in making his will, failed to comply with his agreement, and, after a suit by the widow and a son to settle the estate, the daughter was permitted to maintain an action for the enforcement of the agreement, and judgment was decreed in her favor. In Jones v. Martin, 3 Anstr. 822, more fully reported in 5 Ves. Jr. 266, note, the father covenanted, on his daughter's marriage, to leave her at his death an equal share of personalty with his son. The father in his lifetime transferred certain property to his son, which was more than the latter's proportion as fixed by the marriage settlement. In an action brought after the parent's death by the daughter and her husband for an accounting and an enforcement of the agreement, judgment was rendered for the relief asked. It was held in the House of Lords that "this covenant was stated by the counsel for the respondent to be vague, and idle, unmeaning, and insecure. It is not, however, an unusual covenant in settlements. Many marriages are entered into on such covenants, and they are not inexpedient. They are entitled to favorable consideration. . . . But then it does not confine or restrict the father's powers. He may alter the nature of his property from personal to real; or he may give scope to projects, or indulge in a free and unlimited expense. But he must not be allowed to entertain more partial inclinations and dispositions towards one child before another." In Bennett v. Houldsworth, L. R. 6 Ch. Div. 671, the father, by a settlement prior to the marriage of his daughter, covenanted that he would, by his will, divide his estate into as many equal parts as he had children, one of such parts for the benefit of his daughter and her husband, remainder to their issue. He failed to carry out the provision for this settlement. In an action by the trustees of the settlement, the agreement was held binding. In that case the vice chancellor said: "The settlement is, in my opinion, in very plain terms. It does entitle the parties under the settlement to have one equal fourth part of the whole of the testator's estate applied upon the terms of the settlement; but it is only upon the terms of the settlement. The representative of the trustees of the settlement, who asks by this suit to have the trusts of that deed carried into execution, does not ask for the payment of any debt, but asks that the fourth part may be ascertained, and that it may be paid to him in satisfaction of the obligation contained in the settlement. In my opinion, that is a claim which cannot be resisted." To the same effect is McCarogher v. Whieldon, L. R. 3 Eq. 236. Again, in Willis v. Black, 4 Russ. Ch. 170, the father covenanted upon the marriage of his daughter to settle upon her and her husband, among other things, as great a share of his property as he should by his will or otherwise provide for any of his younger children. That agreement was enforced after the father's death at the suit of the trustees of the settlement. Romaine v. Onslow, 24 Week. Rep. 899. In Keays v. Gilmore, Ir. Rep. 8 Eq. 296, the father, in a letter to a cousin, promised, upon the marriage of his son, to give to his son upon the father's death a child's portion of his estate. An action was maintained by the son's wife as his executrix for a construction of the agreement, and its validity was sustained, and within the past year the Irish court of chancery (Doyle v. Crean [1905] Ir. K. B. 252) gave effect to a contract almost exactly similar in its terms. The father, by a settlement made upon the marriage of his daughter, agreed to distribute his estate equally among his children. An action was maintained by the trustees of the settlement on behalf of the daughter, without question as to the daughter's right to insist upon the performance of the agreement. Other cases illustrating the general principle are Eardley v. Owen, 10 Beav. 572, and Re Brookman, L. R. 5 Ch. 182. These cases disclose how uniformly such agreements have been sustained by the courts.

Since the demurrer was not taken on the ground that the plaintiff's wife was a necessary party, that question is not now before us. It may be that, if the case should come to trial, she ought to be brought in as a party so that the rights of all persons in interest may be properly presented and disposed of. Specific performance ought not to be decreed unless all proper parties are before the court. Miller v. Bear, 3 Paige, 466.

the interlocutory judgment of the Special Term overruling the demurrer affirmed, with costs in all courts, with leave to defendant to withdraw demurrer and serve answer within twenty days upon payment of costs.

Cullen, Ch. J., and Willard Bartlett and Hiscock, JJ., concur.

O'Brien, J., dissenting:

This is an action for specific performance of an alleged contract claimed to have been made between the plaintiff and his father. The father was a citizen of New York, but for many years prior to his death he resided with his family in Paris. He died in that city on the 20th of January, 1887, leaving a will executed there, to which were attached seven codicils; the last or seventh of the codicils having been executed on the 17th of January, 1887, a few days prior to his death. By this will and the codicils attached the testator disposed of a large estate, both real and personal, to his widow and children. The will and codicils were admitted to probate in this state; the plaintiff being a party to the proceedings for that purpose before the surrogate. By the last codicil the testator disposed of that portion of his property which had been left by the prior provisions of the will to the plaintiff in trust to the defendant to pay the income thereof annually or at convenient intervals in each year to or for the use and support of the plaintiff during his life; and at his death the said trust should cease, and the principal and any unpaid portion of the income of the fund was to go and be divided among his heirs at law. By the prior provision of the will and codicils, after providing for the widow, the testator devised the remainder of his estate in substantially equal shares to his children, and thus by the last codicil these provisions as to the plaintiff were changed into a life estate with remainder to the plaintiff's heirs. The estate was distributed by the executors in conformity with the provisions of this testamentary instrument. An intermediate accounting was had, and a final judicial accounting and settlement subsequently, in which full distribution was made according to the terms of the will, and the executors were discharged from their trust.

The controversy in this case does not arise from any defect in the will, but from the transactions which took place many years prior to its execution and to the death of the testator. On the 11th of August, 1873, the plaintiff became engaged to be married to a lady who resided and was domiciled at Baden-Baden. The marriage was preceded by the execution of an antenuptial contract or settlement made by the plaintiff and his father and mother of the first part, and the intended wife, with her father and mother, of the second part. By this instrument the testator made some gifts of property to the plaintiff, including a house in Paris; but the main provisions of the instrument were obviously intended for the benefit of the wife. The only provision of the instrument that is of any importance in the present controversy is the following: "And the said James Phalen and Catherine S., his wife, do further respectively covenant and agree that they will make no distinction between their children as regards the proportion of their estates coming to each under their respective wills; account, however, being taken of any advance which may have been made to either during the lifetime of their said parents, the amount of which advance is in all cases to be deducted from the share to which such child would otherwise have been entitled." The theory of this action is that, inasmuch as the testator left the plaintiff's equal share not absolutely to him, but in trust as before stated, the provision of the marriage settlement was violated, and hence conferred upon the plaintiff a right of action for specific performance. The complaint sets out the will and codicil and the other writing referred to, and demands judgment for the following relief: (1) That the trust under the seventh codicil in the fund held for the plaintiff be declared to be created in violation of plaintiff's rights under his contract, and the plaintiff is entitled to the principal of his said fund held by the United States Trust Company; (2) that the trust under the seventh codicil be abrogated, and that the remainders in said fund given by the seventh codicil to the heirs of the plaintiff be extinguished, and that the plaintiff's two sisters, Florence and Catherine, and all other persons who may ever be his heirs at law, be barred therefrom, and that it be declared that the United States Trust Company holds that fund under the will as modified by the first six codicils; and (3) that the trust company be directed to turn over all of said fund, with the increment thereto and the accumulation thereof, to the plaintiff. There are some other statements and exceptions in the prayer, but they have no bearing upon the case. The trust company was the only defendant that appeared in the action, and it demurred to the complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The trial court overruled the demurrer, but that judgment was reversed by the appellate division, and the plaintiff has appealed to this court.

The first question that is naturally presented is the legal effect and nature of that 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

provision of the antenuptial agreement which has already been quoted. It is impossible, I think, to classify it among any of the recognized methods for the devolution of property or the creation of any particular obligation. It is not a testamentary instrument of any kind, since it was not executed according to the laws that provide for the distribution of property to take effect after death. It was not a conveyance of any property whatever. It created no lien upon any of the testator's estate. It was neither an executed nor an executory contract. It will be seen that fourteen years had elapsed from the time that the marriage agreement was made until the testator executed the seventh codicil of his will, which it is claimed constituted a breach of contract, and is clearly the sole reason for this action. If this theory of the case be correct, it must follow that, had the plaintiff, the son, developed in the meantime habits of extravagance, or become otherwise improvident and incapable of taking care of a large estate, a contingency that actually happened, the testator had disabled himself from so changing his will as to make what might seem to him a proper disposition of the plaintiff's share under all the circumstances. It is argued that the testator, fourteen years before he executed the codicil, had so bound himself hand and foot that he was not at liberty to make what he thought to be a wise disposition of his property, simply because of his promise in the marriage agreement to make no distinction between his children. This proposition would seem to be so plainly contrary to good sense and to all our notions of law that the mere statement of it is sufficient to show its absurdity. Indeed, it is not attempted to sustain this action upon any principle of law or equity, or by arguments founded upon any rule of law or equity. What is claimed is simply this: That there are to be found among the adjudicated cases remarks to that effect by learned judges in the discussion of cases, but where, it will be seen, the question now before us was not involved. It is perfectly safe to say that in no case has it yet been decided that a man who made a promise such as that contained in this case has disabled himself forever from making such a disposition of his property by will as seemed to him to be wise and judicious. A brief review of the cases cited in support of the complaint in this action will, I think, show that when they are fairly considered and analyzed they decide nothing that sustains the plaintiff in this case. The discussion in the opinions may be omitted. It will be sufficient to point out the questions that were actually involved and decided in the particular case.

The leading case cited and relied upon by the learned counsel for the plaintiff is that of Parsell v. Stryker, 41 N. Y. 480. In that case a person let a farm to his grandson for the life of the former. The tenant was bound to occupy the place and do all the work, and was to have two thirds of the produce, and the farm was to belong to the grandson on the death of the grandfather. It was subsequently agreed that the grandfather should make a will devising the farm to the grandson. It was held that an action for specific performance would lie for the performance of this agreement. Here the grandson went into possession and occupancy of the farm under a promise that it should belong to him at the death of the grandfather. The court decreed specific performance and the conveyance to the grandson by the defendants in the action, to whom it had been subsequently conveyed by the grandfather in violation of the agreement. That case has little, if any, bearing upon the case at bar. The fact that the grandson, on the faith of the promise, went into possession and occupancy of the farm and worked it, yielding a portion of the products to the lessor, was sufficient to confer upon a court of equity jurisdiction to decree specific performance. The promise to leave the farm to the grandson by will was of no consequence. A verbal agreement to give it upon the death of the owner would be sufficient when accompanied by possession. In fact, that is just what was decided in the case of Freeman v. Freeman, 43 N. Y. 34, 3 Am. Rep. 657. In a court of equity the grandson's case was just as strong without any promise to make a will as it was with a promise. That was a circumstance wholly immaterial to the right of action. It was the possession and occupancy of the farm by the grandson under a promise that his grandfather would give it to him that constituted the equitable claim of the plaintiff; and so it will be seen that the case decides nothing that can aid the plaintiff here. Edson v. Parsons, 155 N. Y. 555, 50 N. E. 265, cited in behalf of the plaintiff, was a controversy arising out of an alleged agreement between sisters to make mutual wills. On the trial the complaint was dismissed, and the judgment was affirmed in this court. The case decides nothing that bears upon the nature or legal effect of the promise, which is the foundation of this action. In Winne v. Winne, 166 N. Y. 263, 82 Am. St. Rep. 647, 59 N. E. 832, there was an agreement between the mother of a boy and the deceased. The deceased was to have, and the mother of the plaintiff was to surrender to her, the custody and control of the plaintiff. The deceased was to maintain him as her own child, and at her death give him all her property and make him her sole heir, and his mother was to have nothing more to do with him. This agreement was completely carried out and executed, but the deceased died intestate, and the boy, or his representatives, claimed the property owned by the deceased at her death. The latter left no father, mother, child, nor descendant, and no child was born to her after such contract was made. The court decreed specific performance so far as to declare that the property belonged to the plaintiff. This court, however, was careful to add at the end of the opinion this paragraph: "While we are of opinion that specific performance of this contract was properly awarded, this decision is based solely upon the findings of the trial court and the particular facts and circumstances of this case. Yet it must not be regarded as an authority for maintaining such an action under different circumstances or upon other proof, as the granting or denial of such relief always rests in the sound discretion of the court, and should be denied unless the agreement is fair and just, and its enforcement equitable." It is hardly necessary to add that in the case at bar it is sought to maintain the action under very different circumstances; and, under the language of the opinion just quoted, it can have no application to this case.

These are the cases cited in behalf of the plaintiff from this court. There are numerous cases cited from the supreme court which call for a brief review. Shakespeare v. Markham, 10 Hun, 311, assumed the form of an accounting before the surrogate to recover from the estate of a deceased person a large sum of money claimed to be due the contestant for services rendered, and for taking care of and for supporting, the testator in his old age, under an expectation of receiving a legacy from him. The testator died without having made any testamentary provision in favor of the contestant. In the surrogate's court the claim was allowed, but the determination was subsequently reversed upon appeal, and the reversal was affirmed in this court. Shakespeare v. Markham, 72 N. Y. 400. Just why that case is supposed to be an authority in favor of the plaintiff in the case at bar it is quite difficult to see. Colby v. Colby, 81 Hun, 221, 30 N. Y. Supp. 677, was a case where there was a mutual promise of marriage between the parties, and the learned trial judge held that it was an authority in support of this action. It is stated in the case that the deceased made a proposition of marriage, which she accepted, and that thereupon an agreement in writing was made and subscribed by the parties, by the terms of which it was mutually agreed that the two should be presently married, and that the plaintiff should live with the defendant at his residence and be a faithful and loving wife to him as long as he should live, and if the plaintiff should survive him she should have the said premises as her own in fee simple absolute; and that, in pursuance of the terms of said contract, and in part performance of said agreement, the said Colby executed and published his will in due form of law, by which he devised to the plaintiff, her heirs and assigns, forever, the whole of said premises; and he agreed that he would not revoke or alter the will. The marriage took place according to this agreement, and the parties lived together as husband and wife until the death of the husband on the 10th day of March, 1894. Now, here was an agreement in the nature of an antenuptial settlement between husband and wife, whereby the wife was to have, in case she survived her husband, certain specific real estate. It appeared that the husband, before his death, executed and published another and different will, whereby he undertook to revoke the one made prior to the marriage. It appeared that the widow was in possession of the premises, claiming to be the owner under the contract, and demanded specific performance. It was held that she had a good cause of action; but it is obvious that the promise not to revoke the will had little, if anything, to do with her rights. The antenuptial agreement, followed by the marriage, and the possession by the wife after her husband's death, gave her an equitable claim to the property, which a court of equity would, of course, enforce. Suppose the husband had not revoked the will at all, but it had been set aside by reason of some defect in the execution, or of undue influence, or incapacity, or other cause; this would not affect the rights of the wife in the slightest particular. She would still, in virtue of the marriage contract and the marriage and her possession, have good title in a court of equity. So that we see that the promise not to revoke the will was in legal effect wholly immaterial. The case furnishes no support for the present action.

Other cases cited upon the brief of the plaintiff's counsel are equally wide of the mark. None of them decide anything that tends to sustain the plaintiff in this case. It is said, for instance, that the case of Johnston v. Spicer, 107 N. Y. 185, 13 N. E. 753, sustains the plaintiff's contention. I am unable to see that it has any application whatever. The proposition decided in that case was this: Antenuptial contracts, intended to regulate and control the interest which each of the parties to the marriage shall take in the property of the other during coverture or after death, are favored by the courts, and will be enforced in equity according to the intention of the parties.

No one disputes that proposition. But there is no question in this case between the parties to the marriage. There is no question here with respect to any property as between the husband and wife. The sole question here is whether there was a valid contract between the father and the son whereby the father bound himself not to make the codicil in question, whether there was a breach of the contract, and, if there was, whether the plaintiff's remedy is by action for damages or suit for specific performance.

On the other hand, there are three or four quite recent cases in this court that seem to me to be squarely against the plaintiff's contention. In Gall v. Gall, 64 Hun, 600, 19 N. Y. Supp. 332, a deceased person had promised that, if the plaintiff, then residing in California, would go to live with him in New York, he would make a will in his favor. The deceased did make the will, but afterwards he married again and had issue. The action in that case, as in this, was for specific performance, and it was held that it could not be maintained, and that judgment was affirmed in this court. Gall v. Gall, 138 N. Y. 675, 34 N. E. 515; Mahaney v. Carr, 175 N. Y. 454, 67 N. E. 903, was a case that in its main features cannot be distinguished from the one at bar. It was an action by a grandchild against the representatives of her grandfather to compel the specific performance of an agreement that, if the girl would make her grandfather's home her home and assume the duties of a daughter, the deceased would give to her a child's share of his property upon his death, to wit, a one-fourth interest. The courts below sustained the action, but it was reversed in this court upon an opinion which seems to me to answer the argument of the learned counsel for the plaintiff in this case. Ide v. Brown, 178 N. Y. 26, 70 N. E. 101, is to the same effect. In that case the plaintiff, a young girl, whose father and mother had died, brought an action to enforce specific performance of an agreement on the part of the deceased to make a will in her favor vesting her with the title to a large amount of real and personal property. It was held that the action could not be maintained. Thus, it will be seen that, instead of judicial authority to support this action, the decisions of the courts are against it. It can, I think, be safely asserted that there is no case in this state that decides that a promise such as the plaintiff relies upon in this case can be made the subject of specific performance in a court of equity, or even of an action at law.

But perhaps the most conclusive argument and authority against the plaintiff's contention is to be found in the history of this very case. It seems that after the probate of the will and codicil the plaintiff filed a petition with the surrogate of New York to revoke the last codicil on the ground of fraud and undue influence. The question of the validity of this codicil was tried at great length before the surrogate, and he held that the codicil was valid, and dismissed the petition. On appeal to the supreme court, the question was again fully argued and heard, and that court unanimously affirmed the decree of the surrogate. An appeal was taken to this court, and the decision of the courts below was unanimously affirmed on the opinion below. Re Phalen, 47 N. Y. S. R. 44, 19 N. Y. Supp. 358, Affirmed in 140 N. Y. 659, 35 N. E. 893. The court found, as will be seen from the opinion, that the plaintiff had separated from his wife and was incompetent to manage property by reason of bad habits. All this took place nearly fifteen years ago, and several years after the father's death. Now, if it be true, as asserted upon this appeal, that the father had bound himself by a valid contract between himself and the plaintiff not to make the codicil in question, and it was made in violation of the rights of the son, it was, as between the son and the estate, simply invalid and void, and should have been canceled and revoked. The legal effect of the decision is that the testator had the right and the power to make the codicil which constitutes the sole complaint of the plaintiff, and the testamentary power and capacity of the father was in no wise restricted in law by anything contained in the so-called contract upon which the present action was based. It cannot be supposed that this court and the court below would declare valid a testamentary instrument made in violation of a binding contract. The question then before the court is the same question now presented, namely, the right of the father to alter his will and make such disposition of his property as he thought best; and it cannot be doubted that he acted wisely in thus protecting the son from the result of his own improvidence. It would, in our judgment, be very unwise to reopen the controversy now, fifteen years after it had been settled by the court, and after the estate had been distributed and the executors discharged. The case in its general aspects does not seem to be so meritorious as to warrant such a result, and I venture to say that not a single case can be found in this state where such an action was sustained. If the testator had, by his promise in the marriage contract, disabled himself from changing his will, then why, it may be asked, did this court hold the last codicil valid?

Passing from the question of the nature and validity of the promise in question, there are two other points that should be stated. If the promise set out in the complaint is a contract or binding obligation, it certainly must be supported by a sufficient consideration. It was a promise, in substance, that, if the deceased made a will at all, it should be in a particular form, based upon the principle of equality between his children. Now, what consideration was there for the promise moving from the son to the father? It is said that marriage is a good consideration; and so it is between the parties; but it does not follow that it is a consideration for the promise of third parties. What did the son give the father that would constitute a consideration for the promise? Nothing whatever. It is true that he afterwards married; but his father never requested him to marry, and he never promised his father that he would. That was the plaintiff's own voluntary act. Did the plaintiff suffer any detriment in consequence of his father's promise? Certainly not, unless we are prepared to hold that it is a detriment to a young man to marry, sufficient in the eye of the law to form a consideration for a promise on the part of another. I assume that that proposition will meet with no favor from any direction. The deceased secured no benefit, pecuniary or otherwise, from the promise on his part; and the question returns again, What was the consideration moving from the son to the father that supports this promise which is called a contract? If the son had refused to marry, and the father had sued him for specific performance, of course such an action would be absurd; and yet a court of equity will not enforce a promise unless it is mutual. Both parties must be bound, and, if both are not bound, neither is bound. Consideration is the important element of a contract, and must not be confounded with motive, which is not the same thing as consideration. The latter means something which is of value in the eye of the law moving from the plaintiff, either of benefit to the plaintiff or of detriment to the defendant. It is the price or matter of inducement to the contract, whether it be the compensation that is paid or the inconvenience that is suffered by the party from whom it proceeds. Bouvier, Law Dict. 401. Chancellor Kent thus defined "consideration:" "There must be something given in exchange, something that is mutual, or something which is an inducement to the contract; and it must be a thing which is lawful and competent in value to sustain the assumption." 2 Kent,

Com. 463. So that the promise in this case is not supported by any consideration, and hence the deceased had the right at any time before his death to make such a disposition by will of his property as he thought best.

This is an action in equity. The character of the action is stamped by the relief demanded, and that has already been stated. Unless the complaint states facts sufficient to invoke the jurisdiction of equity, then it does not contain a good cause of action. The rule in such cases is this: "In case a plaintiff has the right to maintain an action at law or a suit in equity, and he elects to bring a suit in equity, demanding only equitable relief, but fails to state sufficient facts in his complaint to constitute an equitable cause of action, and the defendant demurs on the ground 'that the said complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action,' the demurrer will be sustained, though the facts alleged are sufficient to constitute a legal cause of action; and so, in case he elects to bring an action at law, demanding only legal relief, but fails to state sufficient facts in his complaint to constitute a legal cause of action, and the defendant demurs on the ground 'that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action,' the demurrer will be sustained, though the facts alleged are sufficient to constitute an equitable cause of action." Wisner v. Consolidated Fruit Jar Co. 25 App. Div. 362, 49 N. Y. Supp. 500; Edson v. Girvan, 29 Hun, 422; Swart v. Boughton, 35 Hun, 281; Willis v. Fairchild, 19 Jones & S. 405; Fisher v. Charter Oak L. Ins. Co. 20 Jones & S. 179; O'Brien v. Fitzgerald, 143 N. Y. 377, 38 N. E. 371. This must be the true rule in such cases, since, by § 1207 of the Code, where the defendant does not answer, the plaintiff can have no judgment except that demanded in the complaint. The facts stated in the complaint in this case relate exclusively to the breach of an alleged contract between the plaintiff and his father. If, therefore, the plaintiff has any cause of action whatever, it is an action at law to recover damages for the breach. There are no facts stated that bring the case within the jurisdiction of any recognized department of equity. So that, in whatever aspect the case is considered, it must be held that the demurrer was well taken, and that the judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF RICHMOND, Plff. in Err.,

v.

Bank—examination of returned vouchers.

1. Whether or not a depositor exercises reasonable care and diligence in examining his pass book and returned vouchers, and in supervising the conduct of his agent if the latter is permitted to make the examination, is a question for the jury, where there is evidence tending to show that he has not done so.

Same—dishonest agent—knowledge of depositor.

2. A bank depositor who intrusts the examination of the pass books and returned vouchers to an agent, who has been guilty of raising its checks, is charged with such knowledge as he has in making the examination.

(January 17, 1907.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the City of Richmond to review a judgment in Case Note.—Depositor's right to recover amount of forged or raised checks paid by bank as affected by the fact that he intrusted the examination of vouchers to the employee, who was guilty of the original fraud: — It is clear that a depositor is not in the first instance, and apart from any subsequent fraud or breach of duty on the part of the employee, chargeable with the latter's knowledge of his own fraud in forging or raising checks paid by the bank. Shipman v. Bank of State, 126 N. Y. 318, 12 L.R.A. 791, 22 Am. St. Rep. 821, 27 N. E. 371. This is assumed by all of the cases subsequently cited, including those that hold that the depositor becomes chargeable with such knowledge by intrusting the examination of the vouchers to the dishonest employee.

If, therefore, the right of the depositor to recover from the bank the amount of the forged or raised checks may, under any circumstances, be affected by the employee's knowledge of his own fraud, it must be because of some subsequent breach of duty intrusted to him with respect to the verification of the account and the examination of the vouchers returned by the bank.

Again, it is obvious that any proposition to the effect that the knowledge of his own forgeries, by the employee to whom the verification of the account and the examination of the vouchers are intrusted, will preclude a recovery against the bank by the depositor, presupposes and rests upon the assumption that the latter owes to the bank a duty to verify the account and examine the vouchers. That the depositor does owe such a duty to the bank is now established favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a bank-deposit account against which the bank claimed to set off certain raised checks of the depositor. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George Bryan and A. W. Patterson, for plaintiff in error:

When a bank depositor sends his pass book to the bank to be written up, it is his duty, upon its return, either in person or by duly authorized agent, to examine the account and vouchers returned within a reasonable time, and give to the bank timely notice of any objections thereto.

Leather Mfrs. Nat. Bank v. Morgan, 117 U. S. 96, 29 L. ed. 811, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 657.

by the great weight of authority. See note 27 L.R.A. 426. There was formerly, however, a conflict of authority upon the point; some cases holding that the depositor owed no such duty to the bank, and that the observance of such precautions was merely for the depositor's own protection. The discussion of that general question does not fall within the scope of this note; but it is to be noted, in this connection, that the cases of Weisser v. Denison, 10 N. Y. 68, 61 Am. Dec. 731, and Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Barnes, 65 Ill. 69, 16 Am. Rep. 576, holding that the fact that the examination of the vouchers was intrusted by the depositor to the employee who forged the checks did not prevent a recovery by the depositor of the amount of such checks from the bank which paid the same, are of but little value upon the point discussed in this note, for the reason that the decisions were rendered upon the express holding and assumption that the depositor owed no duty of examination to the bank, and that the examination was merely for his own protection. Of course, upon that assumption, the depositor would not be prejudiced, so far as his rights against the bank were concerned, by the fact that the examination of the vouchers for any reason failed to disclose the forgeries.

So, the case of Welsh v. German American Bank, 73 N. Y. 425, 29 Am. Rep. 175, holding that the depositor could recover from the bank the amount paid by it on forged indorsements of his checks, notwithstanding that the examination of the vouchers returned by the bank was intrusted to the employee who forged the indorsements, is of little value on the point covered in this note, for the reason that the case was decided upon the assumption that the depositor owed no duty to the bank to examine the vouchers with a view to the detection of forgeries in the indorsements.

Assuming that the depositor owes to the bank, and not merely to himself, the duty of verifying the account and examining the vouchers returned by the bank, there are a number of different views, having more or less support from the case, affecting the 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

If the examination is made by an agent, it must be done in good faith and with ordinary diligence; and, where such agent himself commits forgeries which mislead the bank and injure the depositor, the latter is not protected, in the absence of at least reasonable diligence in supervising the conduct of the agent.

ultimate question whether the depositor is estopped as against the bank by intrusting that duty to the dishonest employee. These views may be formulated as follows:

(1) That, while the depositor is not in the first instance chargeable with the dishonest employee's knowledge of his own fraud in raising or forging the check, yet, by intrusting the verification of the account and the examination of the vouchers to that employee, he becomes chargeable with the latter's antecedent knowledge. It is apparent that in this view, assuming the existence of the other conditions essential to an estoppel, e. g., prejudice to the bank and freedom from negligence on its part, the estoppel of the depositor and his inability to recover against the bank follow—inevitably and irrespective of any negligence on his own part, or any question as to whether the examination, if made by an honest and competent person with due care, would have disclosed the fraud—from the fact of intrusting to the dishonest employee the duty of verification and examination which he owed to the bank.

(2) That the effect of intrusting the verification of the account and the examination of the vouchers to the dishonest employee is the same as if no verification or examination had been made at all. This view works out practically the same results as the first; in other words, the estoppel of the depositor and his inability to recover from the bank necessarily follow from intrusting the duty of verification and examination to the dishonest employee, assuming, as before, the existence of the other conditions essential to an estoppel.

(3) That the duty resting upon the depositor to verify the account and examine the vouchers is not a personal one, but may be delegated to a competent employee; and that the fraud, negligence, or omission of such employee is not imputable to the depositor. In this view, the depositor is exonerated if he had good reason to believe, and did believe, that the employee in question was honest and competent. This view, if it could be maintained without qualification, would be the most favorable to depositor,

No duty rests upon the depositor to carry on the examination of the account as shown by the pass book when written up, in such a manner as necessarily to lead to a discovery of the forgery.

Hardy v. Chesapeake Bank, 51 Md. 562, 34 Am. Rep. 325; Wind v. Fifth Nat. Bank, 39 Mo. App. 72.

Harrison, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The electric company, plaintiff, kept an active account with the defendant bank, and this action is to recover a balance of de-since it would protect him even if an examination by an honest and competent person would have disclosed the fraud.

(4) That the depositor who intrusts the verification of the account and the examination of the vouchers to the fraudulent employee, if in no worse, is at least in no better, position than if such duty had been intrusted to an honest and competent employee. This view assumes that the negligence or omission of such an employee would be imputable to the depositor; in other words, that the duty which the depositor owes to the bank cannot be delegated to an employee so as to absolve the former from responsibility for the latter's negligence. In this view, it is apparent that the rights of the parties are made to turn upon the question whether an honest and competent employee, not having previous knowledge of the forgeries or other fraud, would, by the exercise of reasonable care, have discovered the same by his examination of the vouchers. This presents a question of fact, or a mixed question of law and fact, which in general is for the jury, or the court sitting as the jury, but which may, of course, under some circumstances, be disposed of by the court as a matter of law, upon the ground that the evidence upon the point is uncontradicted, and is fairly susceptible of but one conclusion.

(5) The fifth view varies but slightly from the fourth, and in practical cases it is with difficulty to be distinguished therefrom. It, however, makes the rights of the respective parties turn, not, as in the fourth view, upon the question whether an examination of the vouchers by an honest and competent employee would have disclosed the fraud, but upon the question whether a reasonable supervision by the depositor over the fraudulent employee in the discharge of the duty of examining the vouchers would have disclosed the forgeries. It is perhaps, for practical purposes, an over-refinement to attempt to distinguish between the fourth and fifth views. It is apparent, however, that, under conceivable circumstances, there might be a practical as well as a theoretical difference between 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

them, since forgeries which might be apparent upon an examination of the vouchers by an honest and competent employee might not be apparent upon a reasonable supervision by the depositor of the conduct of the fraudulent employee in the examination of such vouchers.

Coming now to the cases which support these respective views: It will be observed that the first view is presented by the statement in the opinion in FIRST NAT. BANK v. RICHMOND ELECTRIC CO., that, "if the depositor assigns the duty of examining such vouchers and account to this same clerk who has had an opportunity of committing a fraud and has done so, then such employee, in the discharge of this duty, is the agent of the depositor, and such depositor is chargeable with his agent's knowledge of the fraud." This proposition goes farther than the exigencies of the case required, since it is apparent from the facts in the case that an independent examination of the vouchers by the depositor himself, or by an honest employee without the intervention of the dishonest employee, would have disclosed the forgeries. It would seem, therefore, that the case upon its facts might have been brought within the fourth, or possibly the fifth, view above referred to.

Some portions of the opinion in First Nat. Bank v. Allen, 100 Ala. 476, 27 L.R.A. 426, 48 Am. St. Rep. 80, 14 So. 335, also lend color to the first view. Thus, the court in denying the right of a depositor to recover from the bank the amount of checks forged by his bookkeeper and paid by the bank, it appearing that the bookkeeper assisted in the verification of the account and the examination of the vouchers, said: "Our opinion is that, under the circumstances, the plaintiff [the depositor] was chargeable with the facts within the knowledge of his agent and clerk at the time of the examination of the pass book and vouchers, and which should have been communicated to the principal or the bank." In this case, also, it appeared that the forgeries would have been disclosed by an examination made by the depositor himself, or by an honest and competent employee without the intervention of posit alleged to be due it from the bank. This alleged balance was brought about by the bank having paid a number of checks, the amount of which had been raised after being signed by the plaintiff.

It appears that the plaintiff had in its employ a clerk named Woodall. Once a week the electric company issued its check for a sum sufficient to cover its weekly pay roll, payable "to the order of pay roll." Its clerk and cashier, Woodall, presented these checks to the bank for payment. In July, 1903, the plaintiff discovered that Woodall had, since December, 1901, a period of about eighteen months, been defrauding it by raising 26 of these pay-roll checks by the sum of $100 each. Upon this discovery Woodall became a fugitive from justice and has not since been apprehended. The bank resisted a demand upon it for the amount of these fraudulent alterations, upon the ground that the account of the electric company with it had been settled monthly during the eighteen months, its pass book written up, and the fraudulently altered checks returned with the book, and no report of the fraud had ever been made to the bank. Inquiry developed the fact that, after being returned, Woodall had destroyed all of the altered checks except two, which had not been returned by the bank at the time of his flight. It further appears that Woodall, in order to conceal his fraud, would make false additions of the checks given, on the stubs of the plaintiff's check book, thereby making the aggregate there the dishonest employee. It would seem, therefore, that this case, also, upon its facts, might have been brought within the fourth view; and it is to be noted, in this connection, that the court relied in part upon the case of Dana v. National Bank, 132 Mass. 156, infra, which does sustain the latter view.

The first view was repudiated by the court in Kenneth Invest. Co. v. National Bank, 103 Mo. App. 613, 77 S. W. 1002, as is apparent from its approval of an instruction to the effect that the depositor is not chargeable with the knowledge gained by his bookkeeper in the commission of the forgeries of the checks, or in handling the bank book and vouchers returned by the bank.

The second view is supported by the case of August v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 15 N. Y. S. R. 956, 1 N. Y. Supp. 139, which denied a recovery by the depositors of the amount of their checks paid upon indorsements forged by their bookkeeper, who drew, but did not sign, the checks, and to whom the duty of examining the vouchers was intrusted. The court said: "The knowledge of Fischel [the bookkeeper who forged the indorsements] was the knowledge of the plaintiffs [the depositors] in respect to the existence of these fraudulent checks; and the same rule is to be applied as though the checks had been returned to the plaintiffs personally, and they had negligently omitted to examine the account." It would seem from the facts in this case, however, that the plaintiffs' right to recover might have been denied, even under the fourth or fifth view above stated.

The second view was presented by counsel for the bank in the case of Kenneth Invest. Co. v. National Bank, supra, in the form of a request to charge that if, at the time of the examination of the pass book by the employee who forged the checks, it contained any of his forged checks, the depositor was in no better position than if it had made no examination whatever, and for that reason could not recover from the bank. The trial court refused so to declare, and its refusal seems to have been approved by the appellate court. At all events, the judgment in favor of the depositor was affirmed.

The third view receives at least implied support from the decision in Frank v. Chemical Nat. Bank, 84 N. Y. 209, 38 Am. Rep. 501, holding that a depositor could recover from the bank the amount of checks forged by his bookkeeper, who abstracted the forged vouchers, and by false balances and readings deceived the depositor and prevented him from ascertaining the forgeries by means of the examination of the vouchers. As the court held, in effect, that the depositor owed to the bank the duty of making a reasonable examination of the vouchers with a view to the discovery of forgeries; and as it is expressly stated in the opinion that it was only because the bookkeeper who assisted the depositor in the examination of the vouchers was the criminal that the examination did not disclose the forgeries,—it would seem that the decision must have rested upon the theory that the negligence, fraud, or omission of an employee to whom the duty in whole or in part of examining the vouchers is intrusted is not imputable to the depositor.

The third view is also sustained by Kenneth Invest. Co. v. National Bank, supra, holding that the depositor could recover the amount of checks forged by his bookkeeper and paid by the bank, notwithstanding that the examination of the pass book and the vouchers was intrusted to the bookkeeper. That this decision involves the third view is apparent from the court's approval of instructions to the effect that the depositor (a corporation) was not wanting in proper care in the examination of its accounts if it intrusted to some competent person the duty of making that examination for it; and that if, in selecting its bookkeeper to have charge of its pass book, check book, and returned checks, it used ordinary care, it was not guilty of negligence; nor was it required, after imposing such duty upon him, to go further and make a personal inspection through its officers of such books and checks. These instructions seem plainly to imply that the duty to verify the account and examine the vouchers is one shown correspond with the pass book. Such examination of its pass book as was made by the plaintiff consisted of the president of the company, together with Woodall, comparing at times the pass book with the stubs of the check book. In doing this Woodall would sometimes hold the pass book and sometimes the check book, while the president would hold the other, thus enabling Woodall to call out, in either case, from the book held by him the figures so as to make the amount correspond with the book held by the president. In this way, every time the examination took place, the pass book as balanced and the check book were made to agree. It further appears that the fraud could have been instantly discovered by verifying the additions made by Woodall on the stubs of the check book, or by the president looking at both the pass book and the check book on any one of the occasions when the examination was made by Woodall and himself together.

That banks, in their relations with depositors, are held to a rigid responsibility, is a proposition established by practically an unbroken current of authority. National Bank v. Nolting, 94 Va. 263, 26 S. E. 826. Some of the earlier cases seemed to go to the extent of holding that a depositor was under no duty to the bank to examine periodical statements of his account, with the vouchers, and give notice to the bank within a reasonable time of errors discovered therein. Modern adjudications, however, of the highest authority, do not which the depositor may delegate to an employee selected with due care, and thus absolve himself from all responsibility for the fraud, negligence, or omission of the latter in the performance of that duty.

The third view is also sustained by Wachsmann v. Columbia Bank, 8 Misc. 280, 28 N. Y. Supp. 711, holding that a depositor was not estopped by intrusting the examination of the vouchers to the clerk who committed the forgeries. In support of its decision, the court said that, if the depositor, in the ordinary course of business, committed the examination of the bank account and vouchers to a clerk, who was the criminal and failed to disclose the forged checks, the duty of the depositor to the bank was discharged, although, if he had made the examination personally, he would have detected them; that the duty of the depositor, at most, is to exercise ordinary care, and this was performed when, in the ordinary course, he intrusted the duty of examination to the usual agent.

As sustaining the third view, the case of Clark v. National Shoe & Leather Bank, 32 App. Div. 316, 52 N. Y. Supp. 1064, Affirmed in 164 N. Y. 504, 58 N. E. 659, may also be referred to, although in that case the duty of examining the vouchers was not intrusted to the bookkeeper who committed the forgeries, but to an expert employed to examine the account. The court, however, after stating that, if the depositor shall negligently omit to make any examination of the account and vouchers, and such an examination would have disclosed the forgery, he would be estopped to question the accounts and vouchers, said: "This duty, however, to examine accounts and vouchers returned by the bank calls for no more than the exercise of ordinary care. There is no duty resting upon the depositor to personally examine the vouchers and accounts; he may intrust the matter to employees who have proved themselves competent and trustworthy, and it may be to the person who has committed the forgery, if there exists no knowledge of his wrongdoing, and the depositor is justified in reposing confidence in him. . . . And when the plaintiff [the depositor] had taken steps, by the employment of competent persons, to apprise him of the true state of his business and accounts, we do not think that he can be charged with negligence or the omission of ordinary care, even though the examination by the employee was not carried as far as it might have been." This, however, was obiter, as the examination in this case was made with all due care, though it failed to disclose the forgery.

The fourth, and, as it seems to the annotator, the correct, view, is clearly presented by the opinion in Critten v. Chemical Nat. Bank, 171 N. Y. 219, 57 L.R.A. 529, 63 N. E. 969. In that case it appeared that the verification of canceled checks returned as vouchers by the bank was intrusted by the depositor to the clerk who had altered some of the checks by raising the amount and making them payable to "cash" instead of the payees originally named. The court, after stating that it was clear that at all times a comparison of the returned checks with the stubs in the check book would have disclosed the alterations, said: "Of course, the knowledge of the forgeries that [the clerk] . . . possessed from the fact that he himself was the forger was in no respect to be attributed to the . . . [depositors]. But we see no reason why they were not chargeable with such information as a comparison of the checks with the check book would have imparted to an innocent party previously unaware of the forgeries. The plaintiffs' position may be no worse because they intrusted the examination to . . . [the clerk], instead of to a third person; but they can be no better off on that account. It they would have been chargeable with the negligence or failure of another clerk in the verification of the accounts, they must be equally so for the default of . . . [the fraudulent clerk] so far as the examination itself would have disclosed the facts." The court accordingly held that the finding of the referee that the depositors were not negligent in the examination of the pass book and vouchers could not be sustained.

sanction this broad proposition. Leather Mfrs. Nat. Bank v. Morgan, 117 U. S. 96, 29 L. ed. 811, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 657; First Nat. Bank v. Allen, 100 Ala. 476, 27 L.R.A. 426, 46 Am. St. Rep. 80, 14 So. 335; Dana v. National Bank, 132 Mass. 156; Myers v. Southwestern Nat. Bank, 193 Pa. 1, 74 Am. St. Rep. 672, 44 Atl. 280; Scanlon-Gipson Lumber Co. v. Germania Bank, 90 Minn. 478, 97 N. W. 390. The facts in most of the cases cited are very similar to those in the case at bar, in some of them almost identical.

Mr. Justice Harlan, delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court in Leather Mfrs. Nat. Bank v. Morgan, supra, says: "The court below, as shown by its opinion, proceeded upon the ground that Cooper was under no duty whatever to the bank to examine his pass book and the vouchers returned with it, in order to ascertain whether his account was correctly kept. For this reason, it is contended, the bank, even if without fault itself, has no legal cause of complaint, although it may have been misled to its prejudice by the failure of the depositor to give timely notice of the fact—which, by ordinary diligence, he might have discovered on the occasion of the several balancings of the account—that the checks in question had been fraudulently altered. This view of his obligations does not seem to the court to be consistent with the relations of the parties, or with principles of justice." This learned jurist further says: "While it is true that the relation of a

The court added: "If any duty rested on the . . . [depositors], we do not see why the ordinary rule of principal and agent, or master and servant, that the principal or master is liable for the fault of his servant or agent in the master's business, did not apply."

The fourth view is also sustained by the case of Dana v. National Bank, 132 Mass. 156. In that case the depositors' clerk erased the name of the payee upon a check drawn by the former, and obtained the money thereon from the bank. On the first day of the following month the check was returned with others to the depositors with a monthly statement which included the check as paid. The court said that there was evidence that the depositors examined the statements and checks returned by the bank so far as to see that the checks returned corresponded with the amounts in the stub of the check book, and that they were affected with the knowledge that such examination would give them, though it was in fact made by the clerk who altered the check, he being their agent for that purpose. Again, the court said: "If the examination made by . . . [the fraudulent clerk] as agent for the . . . [depositors], and the information which came to him within the scope of his agency, were sufficient to have given him notice of the forgery of the check of November 20, it does not lie in the mouth of the plaintiffs to say that he did not acquire that knowledge as their agent so as to affect them with it. If such examinations would have given them notice if made by an honest agent, they cannot affect ignorance because they were made by a dishonest agent who had fraudulent knowledge of the fact." Under the facts of this case it was held, in effect, that the question whether an examination by an honest agent of the statements and vouchers returned by the bank would have disclosed facts which would have called for a further examination and led to the discovery of the fraud should have been submitted to the jury.

The fourth view is also supported by Myers v. Southwestern Nat. Bank, 193 Pa. 1, 74 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Am. St. Rep. 672, 44 Atl. 280, holding that, while the depositor was not chargeable with the knowledge of his clerk that the latter had forged a check, he was responsible for the acts and omissions of the clerk in the course of the duties with which he was intrusted; viz., to receive the checks from the bank, take them to his employer's office, and compare the amount thereof with the amounts in the bank book. It appeared by the uncontradicted evidence in this case that if, at the time of each settlement with the bank, the forged checks had been examined by the depositor; or if the number and amount of the checks had been compared with the number and amount of the checks separately entered in the bank book; or if the checks had been compared with the stubs of the check book; or if the additions of the deposits and checks on the check book had been examined,—the forgery would have been disclosed; but that neither of these things was done, for the reason that the clerk who was guilty of the forgeries, and who was deputed by the depositor to receive the checks from the bank, and take them to the office and compare the amounts with the bank book, abstracted and destroyed the forged checks, and failed to call his employer's attention to the discrepancies, which, as the court said, would undoubtedly have been disclosed by a proper comparison and examination. In view of this uncontradicted evidence, the court held that it plainly appeared that the depositor had failed to perform the duty which he owed to the bank, and that there was no question for submission to the jury; and accordingly the judgment in favor of the bank was affirmed.

The fifth view which, as already said, is but a slight variation from the fourth, is sustained by the opinion and decision of the United States Supreme Court in Leather Mfrs. Nat. Bank v. Morgan, 117 U. S. 96, 29 L. ed. 811, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 657. In that case the clerk who committed the forgeries was intrusted with the duty of examining the pass book and vouchers. The court said: "Nor do we mean to hold that the depositor bank and its depositor is one simply of debtor and creditor, . . . and that the depositor is not chargeable with any payments except such as are made in conformity with his orders, it is within common knowledge that the object of a pass book is to inform the depositor from time to time of the condition of his account as it appears upon the books of the bank. It not only enables him to discover errors to his prejudice, but supplies evidence in his favor in the event of litigation or dispute with the bank. In this way it operates to protect him against the carelessness or fraud of the bank. The sending of his pass book to be written up and returned with the vouchers is therefore, in effect, a demand to know what the bank claims to be the state of his account. And the return of the book, with the vouchers, is the answer to that demand, and, in effect, imports a request by the bank that the depositor will, in proper time, examine the account so rendered, and either sanction or repudiate it. . . . The depositor cannot, therefore, without injustice to the bank, omit all examination of his account when thus rendered at his request. His failure to make it, or to have it made, within a reasonable time after opportunity given for that purpose, is inconsistent with the object for which he obtains and uses a pass book."

In Dana v. National Bank, 132 Mass. 158, the supreme court of Massachusetts says: "The plaintiffs owed to the defendant the duty of exercising due diligence to give it information that the payment was unauthorized, and this included not only due diligence in giving notice after knowledge of the forgery, but also due diligence in discovering it. If the plaintiffs knew of the mistake, or if they had that notice of it which consists in the knowledge of facts which, by the exercise of due care and diligence, will disclose it, they failed in their duty, and adoption of the check and ratification of the payment will be implied. They cannot now require the defendant to cor-is wanting in proper care when he imposes upon some competent person the duty of making that examination and of giving timely notice to the bank of objections to the account. If the examination is made by such an agent or clerk in good faith and with ordinary diligence, and due notice given of any error in the account, the depositor discharges his duty to the bank. But when, as in this case, the agent commits the forgeries which misled the bank and injured the depositor, and therefore has an interest in concealing the facts, the principal occupies no better position than he would have done had no one been designated by him to make the required examination,—without at least showing that he exercised reasonable diligence in supervising the conduct of the agent while the latter was discharging the trust committed to him. In the absence of such supervision, the mere designation of an agent to discharge a duty resting primarily upon the principal cannot be deemed the equivalent of performance by the latter." In this case it was held error to direct a verdict for the plaintiff, it appearing from the testimony of the depositor's agent, who finally discovered the forgery, that if, on any of the several balancings, he had personally made such an examination of the check book and pass book as was done on the occasion of the discovery of the fraud, he would have "easily discovered" that the account had been charged with altered checks.

The fifth view seems to be supported, also, by Hardy v. Chesapeake Bank, 51 Md. 562, 34 Am. Rep. 325. It appeared in that case that a confidential clerk intrusted to make the entry of all checks in his employers' bank book made fraudulent entries of checks forged by him. In an action by the depositors against the bank to recover the amount of the forged checks which had been paid by the bank, it was insisted that, as the clerk was intrusted with the duty of making the entry of all checks in the bank book, and did make the entries of the forged check as well as all others, he acted as the agent of the depositors, and his acts and knowledge in respect to those entries were to be taken as the acts and knowledge of the depositors themselves. The court, however, said that, it being conceded that the clerk did not act as agent in drawing the checks, it was unable to perceive upon what principle they could be bound or made liable in respect to the fraudulent entry of those checks in the bank book; that the clerk was not an agent for any such purpose. The court therefore concluded that the jury should have been required to find either that the depositors had knowledge in fact that the forgeries had been committed, or that from carelessness and indifference to the rights of others they failed to inform themselves from sources of information readily accessible to them, and which, by the exercise of ordinary diligence as business men, would have disclosed to them the fact that the forgeries had been committed.

It is obvious, of course, that the practical application of the fourth view will often involve the question, which is beyond the scope of this note, as to the nature and extent of the examination which the depositor must make or have made in order to perform his duty to the bank. So assuming that there has been a breach of that duty, the ultimate liability may be affected by the questions, likewise beyond the scope of this note, as to the bank's negligence in paying the forged or altered checks, or as to whether it was prejudiced by the delay in discovering the fraud.

rect a mistake to its injury, from which it might have protected itself but for the negligence."

The other cases cited are equally conclusive upon the proposition that the depositor is under obligations to the bank to examine within a reasonable time and with ordinary care the account rendered in the pass book and the vouchers returned by the bank to the depositor, and to report any errors discovered, without unreasonable delay. Upon this point the conclusion reached by these cases is, in our judgment, both reasonable and just, and the principle announced should be applied in determining the rights of the parties in the present controversy.

"In their relations with depositors, banks are held, as they ought to be, to rigid responsibility. But the principles governing those relations ought not to be so extended as to invite or encourage such negligence by depositors in the examination of their bank accounts as is inconsistent with the relations of the parties or with those established rules and usages sanctioned by business men of ordinary prudence and sagacity, which are or ought to be known to depositors. We must not be understood as holding that the examination, by the depositor, of his account, must be so close and thorough as to exclude the possibility of any error whatever being overlooked by him. Nor do we mean to hold that the depositor is wanting in proper care when he imposes upon some competent person the duty of making that examination and of giving timely notice to the bank of objections to the account. If the examination is made by such an agent or clerk in good faith and with ordinary diligence, and due notice given of any error in the account, the depositor discharges his duty to the bank. But when, as in this case, the agent commits the forgeries which misled the bank and injured the depositor, and therefore has an interest in concealing the facts, the principal occupies no better position than he would have done had no one been designated by him to make the required examination, without, at least, showing that he exercised reasonable diligence in supervising the conduct of the agent while the latter was discharging the trust committed to him. In the absence of such supervision, the mere designation of an agent to discharge a duty resting primarily upon the principal cannot be deemed the equivalent of performance by the latter. While no rule can be laid down that will cover every transaction between a bank and its depositor, it is sufficient to say that the latter's duty is discharged when he exercises such diligence as is required by the circumstances of the particular case, including the relations of the parties and the established or known usages of banking business." Leather Mfrs. Nat. Bank v. Morgan, supra.

"Of course, if the defendant's officers, before paying the altered checks, could by proper care and skill have detected the forgeries, then it cannot receive a credit for the amount of those checks, even if the depositor omitted all examination of his account." Ibid.

In the case at bar there was evidence tending to show that the plaintiff did not examine its pass book and the vouchers returned therewith with reasonable care and diligence, and did not exercise reasonable care and diligence in supervising the conduct of its agent while the latter was examining such pass book and vouchers. Whether he did so exercise reasonable care and diligence was, under proper instructions, a question to be determined by the jury.

We are of opinion that the circuit court erred in refusing the following instruction asked for by the defendant:

"No. 3. The jury are instructed that the plaintiff is charged with such knowledge as Woodall had in making the examination of its bank book and the inspection of returned checks and comparison of the same with the stubs of plaintiff's check book."

As already seen, such examination of its pass book as was made by the plaintiff was together with Woodall as its agent. Woodall had, at the time these examinations were made, full knowledge of the forgeries, as he had himself been guilty of the wrongdoing.

In the commission of a forgery the employee is not the agent of his principal, and his knowledge cannot be imputed to the principal. But, after the forged checks have been paid and returned to the depositor as vouchers, with the bank account written up and balanced according to the usual business methods, if the depositor assigns the duty of examining such vouchers and account to this same clerk who has had an opportunity of committing a fraud and has done so, then such employee, in the discharge of this duty is the agent of the depositor, and such depositor is chargeable with his agent's knowledge of the fraud. Dana v. National Bank, supra; First Nat. Bank v. Allen, 100 Ala. 476, 27 L.R.A. 426, 46 Am. St. Rep. 80, 14 So. 335; Myers v. Southwestern Nat. Bank, 193 Pa. 1, 74 Am. St. Rep. 672, 44 Atl. 280; Critten v. Chemical Nat. Bank, 171 N. Y. 219, 57 L.R.A. 529, 63 N. E. 969; Leather Mfrs. Nat. Bank v. Morgan, 117 U. S. 96, 29 L. ed. 811, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 657.

In First Nat. Bank v. Allen, supra, it is said: "The evidence shows that on each occasion after the return of the pass book and checks, the plaintiff, with the assistance of his clerk, Tomlin, the forger, examined the account as rendered and the checks or vouchers. We may conclude the evidence shows that the plaintiff himself personally was without fault in this respect, and but for the fact that his clerk, Tomlin, was the forger, the false checks would have been discovered by the examinations which were in fact made. The evidence shows that in these examinations Tomlin either called from the pass book and the plaintiff the checks, or vice versa, and Tomlin, knowing when a forged entry or check was reached, answered in such a way as to deceive the plaintiff. Tomlin, the clerk and forger, had knowledge of the forged checks. Was such knowledge of the agent chargeable to his principal? The case in 132 Mass., supra, holds that the principal is chargeable with notice under such circumstances; and we are of opinion the conclusion is supported by reason and sound principles of law."

In Critten v. Chemical Nat. Bank, supra, it is said: "Of course, the knowledge of the forgeries that Davis possessed, from the fact that he was the forger, was in no respect to be attributed to the plaintiffs. But we see no reason why they were not chargeable with such information as a comparison of the checks with the check book would have imparted to an innocent party previously unaware of the forgeries. The plaintiffs' position may be no worse because they intrusted the examination to Davis, instead of to a third person, but they can be no better off on that account. If they would have been chargeable with the negligence or failure of another clerk in the verification of the accounts, they must be equally so for the default of Davis, so far as the examination itself would have disclosed the facts."

In the case of Myers v. Southwestern Nat. Bank, supra, it is said: "While the plaintiff was not chargeable with the knowledge of his clerk that the latter had committed the forgery, he was clearly responsible for the acts and omissions of his clerk in the course of the duties with which he was intrusted; viz., to receive the checks from the bank, take them to his employer's office, compare the amounts thereof with the amounts in the bank book, and check book," etc.

In the case at bar the instruction under consideration was supported by the evidence, and the authorities cited show that it correctly stated the law.

We are inclined to think there was no error in the action of the circuit court with respect to other instructions; but, as its 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

judgment must be reversed for the error pointed out in refusing instruction No. 3, asked for by the defendant, we will not comment upon the other instructions objected to, but will leave the court, upon the evidence adduced at another trial, to give such instructions as to it may seem proper in the light of the principles herein announced.

The judgment complained of must be reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the case remanded for further proceedings not in conflict with the views herein expressed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

MERCHANTS' NATIONAL BANK OF PEORIA, Appt.,
v.

NICHOLS & SHEPARD COMPANY.

(223 Ill. 41, 79 N. E. 38.)

Agent—power to borrow money.

1. Placing one in charge of a sales agency of a manufacturing concern with supervision of sales and local agents does not confer the implied power to borrow money for the concern; and it is immaterial that the principal is a corporation.

Bank—overdraft—agent—failure to examine pass book.

2. A bank which has paid an overdraft of a local agent upon the bank account of his principal, who resides in another state, without ascertaining the authority of the agent, cannot assert failure of the principal to examine the pass book and returned vouchers after the balancing of the account, as an estoppel upon the principal to deny liability for the overdraft.

Same—notice.

3. Knowledge by one in charge of the sales agency of another, who resides in another state, that he is overdrawing the bank account of the agency, is not notice to the principal.

Same—acceptance of benefit.

4. That the proceeds of overdrafts drawn by an agent without authority upon his principal's bank account went to pay expenses of the principal's business does not entitle the bank to charge them against the account, if the proceeds were used merely to replace money which had been misappropriated by the agent.

(October 23, 1906.)

Note.—The effect upon the depositor's right, as against the bank, of intrusting the verification of the bank account and the examination of vouchers to the employee, by whose fraud the bank was induced to make right, as against the bank, of intrusting the case note to First Nat. Bank v. Richmond Electric Co. ante, 744.

Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Barnes, 65 Ill. 69, 16 Am. Rep. 576.

Cartwright, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant brought this suit in the circuit court of Peoria county against appellee, a corporation of Battle Creek, Michigan, engaged in the manufacture and sale of threshing machinery at that place, to recover $1,023.60, the aggregate of 24 checks, which created an overdraft of that amount in appellee's bank account. The declaration was in the common counts with an itemized account showing the amount of each check, and the plea was the general issue. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and there was a finding and judgment for the appellee, which was affirmed by the appellate court for the second district. From the judgment of the appellate court this appeal was prosecuted.

The checks which created the overdraft were signed with the name of the defendant, "by W. H. Harte, Manager," and Harte was defendant's agent at Peoria. At the trial the plaintiff presented to the court propositions to be held as the law, to the effect: First, that the agency was of such a nature that the agent had lawful authority to borrow from the plaintiff the money in question by drawing the checks in the name of the defendant; second, that the defendant was estopped to deny its liability for the amount of the overdraft on account of its failure to perform an alleged duty to the plaintiff to examine its account as shown by the pass book, which had been written up and balanced monthly while the account was running, and to examine the returned checks and to give notice to plaintiff that overdrafts were not authorized; third, that plaintiff was entitled to recover on the ground that the defendant had the benefit of the overdraft. The propositions were refused, and consistent propositions requested by the defendant were held to be the law.

The facts were not in dispute, and were as follows: The defendant sold its threshing machinery and threshing outfits through 11 agencies, established in various states, for different districts. One of these agencies for Illinois and a part of Missouri was located at Bloomington and afterward at Peoria. Harte was placed in charge of the agency at Bloomington in 1900, and remained there until January, 1902, when the agency was transferred to Peoria, and Harte then opened a banking account with the plaintiff, with defendant's knowledge, in its name. The account continued until the discharge of Harte, in June, 1904. Harte had entire charge of the agency at

Peoria, rented a building for the business, employed assistants, fixed and paid their salaries, had charge of about 15 traveling salesmen and 100 local agents for the sale of machinery, paid the bills for all expenses incurred in the business in his district, and made sales, collections, and settlements therein. He was authorized to collect any money due the defendant in his territory, and he received checks and drafts from customers payable to defendant, which he indorsed in its name and deposited the proceeds in plaintiff's bank. The funds with which he carried on the business were received from sales and settlements, or were sent to him by defendant from Battle Creek. Written contracts for sale of threshing outfits were made by him in defendant's name and were to be submitted to the defendant for approval. They were generally so submitted and were always approved, but sometimes sales were made without submitting them, and no objection was made. He made remittances from time to time to the defendant by checks drawn on its account payable to its order. He kept books showing the sales of machinery and repairs, and notes and collections. He signed the checks the same as the checks in controversy in this case, and each month the bank wrote up the account on the pass book and returned the book, with the canceled checks, to him. He kept it in his office at Peoria, and it was never sent to Battle Creek nor seen by any officer of the defendant. In May, 1902, he overdraw the account, and the passbook, when balanced on June 30th, showed a charge of 30 cents for interest. Overdrafts occurred several times thereafter, and in each case there was a small charge for interest. There was no other indication of an overdraft in the pass book, and it showed balances to defendant's credit from time to time. The overdrafts were all covered by deposits, except the last one, created by the 24 checks, which were paid in July, 1904. During his agency Harte made monthly reports to the defendant showing the cash received and paid out in each month, and these statements always showed a cash balance on hand. The statements were generally false, and Harte had appropriated money of the defendant from time to time so that he did not have the cash balance shown by his statements, either in plaintiff's bank or elsewhere. Plaintiff never gave any notice to the defendant of any overdraft, and the defendant never knew of any. On June 30, 1904, Harte reported in his monthly account a cash balance of $926.72 which had no existence, and he drew on defendant for money to pay current expenses. This led to an investigation, and he reported his shortage to the defendant, the total amount 7 L.R.A. (N. S.) of which, excluding the overdraft, was $2,225.57. The 24 checks were drawn by Harte in the ordinary course of the business, and the proceeds were paid for the expenses of the defendant in the business, except four checks, aggregating $95.52, which Harte received personally.

The payment of the checks when there were no funds of the defendant in the bank constituted a loan of the money paid, and defendant never gave Harte any authority to borrow money on its account by that method or any other. He was supplied by the defendant with the necessary funds to execute the duties imposed upon him, and the only occasion for overdrawing the account was his appropriation of defendant's money. There is no claim that the power was expressly given, but the argument is that the power arose out of the nature of the agency, and that plaintiff had a right to assume that the power existed. It is to be remembered that persons dealing with an assumed agent are bound, at their peril, to ascertain, not only the fact of the agency, but the extent of the agent's authority. They are put upon their guard by the very fact that they are dealing with an agent, and must, at their peril, see to it that the act done by him is within his power. It is their right and duty to ascertain the extent of his power, and to determine whether his act comes within the power and is such as to bind his principal. Mechem, Agency, § 276; Reynolds v. Ferree, 86 Ill. 570; 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 987. An agent cannot confer power upon himself, and therefore his agency or authority cannot be established by showing either what he said or did. Proctor v. Tows, 115 Ill. 138, 3 N. E. 569; Mullanphy Sav. Bank v. Schott, 135 Ill. 655, 25 Am. St. Rep. 401, 26 N. E. 640. The source of authority is the principal, and the power of the agent can only be proved by tracing it to that source in some word or act of the alleged principal. In this case there was no evidence tending to prove that the power to borrow money was an incident of the agency. For such an act as that an agent must have express authority, or some power must be expressly conferred upon him which cannot be otherwise executed. The fact that the defendant carried on the sale of its products through the medium of agencies distributed over the country would be no ground for a conclusion that the various agents for making sales of machinery and collecting the proceeds were clothed with authority to borrow money. We held, in the case of Jackson Paper Co. v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 199 Ill. 151, 59 L.R.A. 657, 93 Am. St. Rep. 113, 65 N. E. 136, that proof that an agent was the superintendent and manager of a mill, having charge of buying material, hiring men, and manufacturing and selling paper, did not justify an inference that he had authority to indorse checks; and surely the same facts or the facts in this case would not justify an inference that Harte had the more unusual power to borrow money and pledge the credit of the defendant.

It is argued, however, that Harte would be presumed to have the power which he exercised for the reason that he was agent of a corporation, and corporations act through agents. Under the same circumstances and in like business, an individual would necessarily act through agents; and we do not understand that the presumptions are any different in the case of a corporation than an individual. When an act pertaining to the business of a corporation, which is not foreign to the corporate powers, is done by an officer within his department, it will be presumed to have been done with the consent of the corporation. Bank of Minneapolis v. Griffin, 168 Ill. 314, 48 N. E. 154; Anderson Transfer Co. v. Fuller, 174 Ill. 221, 51 N. E. 251. But that is the extent of the doctrine. A principal may be bound to the extent of the apparent authority which he has conferred upon his agent, but that is because he has held the agent out to the public as possessing the power which the agent exercises. In such a case the principal may bind himself by causing others to believe the powers of the agent to be greater than those actually conferred (Maxey v. Heckethorn, 44 Ill. 437), but the acts which amount to such representation of the agent's authority must be known to the party setting them up, if he intends to avail himself of them. Rawson v. Curtiss, 19 Ill. 456. A party dealing with an agent must prove that the facts giving color to the agency were known to him when he dealt with the agent. If he has no knowledge of such facts, he does not act in reliance upon them, and is in no position to claim anything on account of them. In this case the defendant never knew, nor had any reason to suspect, that Harte was overdrawing the account, and it never led plaintiff to suppose that he had authority to do so. There is no ground upon which it can be said that the power existed.

It is next contended that the defendant was estopped to deny its liability to plaintiff by its failure to examine the pass book, canceled checks, and check stubs in the hands of Harte at Peoria. The pass book was balanced monthly and showed several small items of interest; and it is said that an examination would have led to information that Harte was overdrawing the account at times, and, if defendant had given timely notice that overdrafts were unauthorized, the overdraft for which this suit was brought would not have been permitted. In support of that argument a number of cases are cited where there were successive forgeries of checks which were paid, and it was held that where there was no negligence on the part of the bank, and the depositor was negligent in failing to examine his account and returned checks, thereby enabling the forger to repeat his fraud, or depriving the bank of an opportunity to obtain restitution, the depositor should be held responsible for the damages caused by his want of ordinary care. In the case of Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Barnes, 65 Ill. 69, 16 Am. Rep. 576, the principal had given a clerk, who was bookkeeper and cashier, a power of attorney authorizing him to draw checks on the bank for fifteen days, and this power of attorney was lodged with the bank. After the expiration of that time the clerk continued to draw occasional checks, and appropriated the proceeds, with the exception of a part which were used in paying debts of the firm. There was judgment for the amount of the checks drawn, less the sum applied to such debts, for which the firm gave the bank credit. The pass book had been several times written up, and the paid checks returned, and this had been attended to by the same clerk; the principal not making any personal examination of the account. The bank had notice of the extent of the authority, and it was held guilty of great negligence in paying the unauthorized checks, and not to have been excused for its negligence by a failure of the depositor to examine the checks which had been returned. The court approved of the decision in Weisser v. Denison, 10 N. Y. 68, 61 Am. Dec. 731, that the balancing of a pass book and the return of the checks are for the protection of the depositor, and not for that of the bank; and that the failure of the depositor to examine the checks is not such negligence on his part as to exonerate the bank from liability for checks improperly drawn. Those decisions are not necessarily inconsistent with the doctrine that a bank which has been guilty of no negligence may hold a depositor responsible for damages caused by a want of ordinary care under all the circumstances of a particular case. This is clearly shown by the cases relied upon as sustaining that doctrine. In the case of Critten v. Chemical Nat. Bank, 171 N. Y. 219, 57 L.R.A. 529, 63 N. E. 906, the court of appeals of New York said that the authority of Weisser v. Denison had stood for nearly fifty years, and they would not feel justified in overruling it; and furthermore, if the question were an open one in that state, they would not deem the rule of estoppel and ratification a just one. That was a case of forged checks, and in such a case a bank may be unable to detect the forgery and be guilty of no negligence. It was held that a depositor who fails to use ordinary care may become liable for the consequences of his negligence to a bank which has been guilty of no negligence; but the bank was held to have been negligent in the payment of one of the checks, and on that account not entitled to claim anything, as to that check, on account of the depositor's negligence. By these authorities the claim of a bank on account of the depositor's negligence is defeated by its own contributory negligence. In the case of Leather Mfrs. Nat. Bank v. Morgan, 117 U. S. 96, 29 L. ed. 811, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 657, upon which great reliance is placed, it was held that a depositor's duty is discharged when he exercises such diligence as is required by the circumstances of the particular case; that, if a bank has been guilty of negligence in paying forged checks, the doctrine of ratification and estoppel does not apply; and that, if the bank, before paying such checks, could, by proper care and skill have detected the forgery, it could not receive a credit for the amount of the checks, even if the depositor omitted all examination of his account. It is not necessary that a depositor should personally examine his account unless ordinary prudence on his part demands it; and he may be guilty of no negligence in committing the examination of his bank account or checks, in the ordinary course of business, to clerks or agents. Frank v. Chemical Nat. Bank, 84 N. Y. 209, 38 Am. Rep. 501. Even if the plaintiff in this case had not been negligent, the defendant performed any supposed duty to the bank if it did not omit anything which ordinary prudence required. The conclusive answer, however, to the claim of the plaintiff, was that it was itself negligent in not ascertaining the authority of Harte and in paying the checks. The overdraft was not permitted because the plaintiff relied upon an examination of the account by the defendant. There was no reason to suppose that the pass book would be sent to Battle Creek, or that it or the paid checks would come under the inspection of defendant's officers. The defendant knew nothing about the account in the pass book, and notice to Harte was not notice to the defendant of what he was doing. To the general rule that notice to the agent is notice to the principal, there is a well-defined exception that notice will not be imputed to the principal where the facts authorize the inference that the agent will conceal the information. That is the presumption where it would be detrimental to the agent's 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

interests to disclose the facts. Cowan v. Curran, 216 Ill. 598, 75 N. E. 322; Mechem, Agency, § 723; Critten v. Chemical Nat. Bank, supra.

The last proposition of law contended for is that the defendant is liable because the checks which created the overdraft were given in the business of the defendant, with the exception of $95.52, which went to Harte. In the case of First Nat. Bank v. Oberne, 121 Ill. 25, 7 N. E. 85, the principal was permitted to deny the authority of the agent to execute a guaranty, but only upon restoring the money received as the result of the agent's act; but in this case the defendant was the loser to the amount of Harte's defalcation after crediting the proceeds of the checks. While most of the checks creating the overdraft were given by him for expenses, they were, in fact, to replace money which he had misappropriated. He was short in his account to the amount of $2,225.57, and we do not think that justice required the defendant to add to its loss the amount sued for.

The rulings of the trial court on the propositions submitted to it were in substantial accord with what we have said, and the appellate court did not err in affirming the judgment.

The judgment of the Appellate Court is affirmed.

Farmer and Vickers, JJ., took no part in the decision of this case.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

JOHN TOPOLEWSKI, Plff. in Err.,

v.

STATE OF WISCONSIN.

(— Wis. —, 109 N. W. 1037.)

Appeal—improper evidence—reversal.

1. A conviction in a case tried without a jury will not be reversed on appeal for admission of improper evidence, unless the court can see that the accused was prejudiced by the error.

Larceny—consent.

2. The trespass necessary to constitute larceny is absent where a property owner, upon being informed of a design to steal

Case Note.—Larceny; effect of owner's conduct in intentionally facilitating the taking: — In Lowe v. State, 44 Fla. 449, 103 Am. St. Rep. 171, 32 So. 956, it was held that, where the criminal design to steal originates with the accused, and the owner of the property does not in person, or by his agent or servant, suggest the design, nor actively urge the accused on to the commission of the crime, the mere fact that his property, places it upon a platform where the intending thief is planning to get it, with instructions to his servant in charge of the platform to deliver it to the one who will call for it, so that when the intended thief arrives he is treated as having a right to the property,—especially where another agent of the owner, sent to arrange for the taking of the property, has agreed to the place proposed by the thief under circumstances which involve a promise of assistance in carrying out the plan.

ERROR to the Municipal Court of Milwaukee County to review a judgment convicting defendant of larceny. Reversed.

such owner, suspecting that the accused intends to steal his property, in person, or through his agent or servant, exposes it, or neglects to protect it, or furnishes facilities for the execution of the criminal design under the expectation that the accused will take the property, or avail himself of the facilities furnished, will not, in law, amount to a consent to the taking, even though the agent or servant of such owner, by his instructions, appears to cooperate in the execution of the crime.

In Alexander v. State, 12 Tex. 540. it appeared that a slave owner, having discovered the defendant's intention to steal a slave, interposed no obstacle, and perhaps directed the slave to encourage the theft. The owner having no intention that the theft should be consummated, it was held that, so long as he did not induce the original intent in the mind of the thief, but only provided for its discovery after it was formed, the criminality of the thief was not destroyed by the owner's directing the slave to appear to encourage the thief's design, and lead him on until the offense was complete.

In State v. Duncan, 8 Rob. (La.) 562, it was held that if, when the prisoner took the horse, he thought he was stealing him, he was guilty of larceny, though the owner had permitted his servant to take the horse and place him where the prisoner could, with greater facility, steal him.

In McAdams v. State, 8 Lea, 456, it was held that, if the owner directs his servant to deliver property to a supposed thief, who has not formed the design to steal it, and the latter takes it, there is no larceny, even if the taking is with felonious intent; but he does not so consent to the taking as to excuse the crime where the design originates with the thief, and upon learning of it, he merely directs his servant to appear to encourage and lead the thief on until the offense is complete.

In Varner v. State, 72 Ga. 745, defendant was held properly convicted of an attempt to commit larceny where the owner, upon being informed that accused had applied to another for a wagon to be used in hauling

Statement by Marshall, J.:

The accused was charged with having stolen three barrels of meat, the property of the Plankinton Packing Company, of the value of $55.20, and was found guilty. The cause was appealed to and tried in the municipal court of Milwaukee county on evidence taken in the lower court, a jury being waived. The accused was again convicted and sentenced as before to pay a fine of $100, and $42.84, costs of prosecution, and to be committed to the house of correction of Milwaukee county, until such payment should be made. There was a motion to set aside the conviction and for a new trial, and also a motion in arrest of judgment.

the cotton which he intended to steal, instructed the other to let the accused have it, and to go with him so that he could catch him; and with the wagon, so procured, the accused drove up to the gin house, and was arrested when he placed his hands on the cotton.

In People v. Hanselman, 76 Cal. 460, 9 Am. St. Rep. 238, 18 Pac. 425, it was held that the prosecutor, by feigning drunkenness, staggering around the streets, lying down in an alley, pretending to be in a drunken stupor, and, though perfectly conscious, permitting the defendant to approach him and take money from his pocket without resistance, and without previous suspicion of the defendant, did not consent to the taking.

In People v. Mills, 178 N. Y. 274, 67 L.R.A. 131, 70 N. E. 786, it was held that, if an individual owner voluntarily delivers his property to one who wishes to steal it, there is no trespass; but, when the property of the state is delivered by anyone, under any circumstances, to any person for the purpose of having him steal it, and he takes it into his possession with intent to steal it, there is a trespass, and the attempt is a crime. It appeared in this case that the district attorney, under permission of a judge of the court, removed certain indictments from the files and placed them in the custody of a public officer, who was instructed to, and actually did, hand them over to the defendant. Conviction was affirmed on the ground that the records were the property of the state, and its officers could not lawfully give them away, or permit them to be taken by the defendant.

In Dodge v. Brittain, Meigs, 84, it was held not larceny to receive goods from a servant with the owner's consent, it being of the essence of the offense that the goods be taken against the will of the owner. The court said: "A man may direct a servant to appear to encourage the design of the thieves, and lead them on until the offense is complete, so long as he did not induce the original intent, but only provided for its discovery after it was formed; that a servant, by the desire of his master may

Both motions were denied. The fine and costs were paid under protest, to avoid the consequences as to imprisonment.

The evidence was to this effect: The Plankinton Packing Company suspected the accused of having by criminal means possessed himself of some of its property and of having a purpose to make further efforts to that end. A short time before the 14th day of October, 1906, one Mat Dolan, who was indebted to the accused in the sum of upwards of $100, was discharged from the company's employ. Shortly theretofore the accused pressed Dolan for payment of the aforesaid indebtedness, and, the latter being unable to respond, the former conceived the idea of solving the difficulty by obtaining some of the company's meat products through Dolan's aid and by criminal means, Dolan to participate in the benefits of the transaction by having the value of the property credited upon his indebtedness. A plan was accordingly laid by the two to that end, which Dolan disclosed to the company. Such plan was abandoned. Thereafter various methods were discussed of carrying out the idea of the accused, Dolan participating with the knowledge and sanction of the company. Finally a meeting was arranged between Dolan and the accused to consider the subject, the packing company requesting the former to bring it about, and with show thieves breaking into the house for plunder where the plate is kept, and, if they remove it, they are guilty of larceny; and that, if a man is suspected of an intent to steal, and another, to try him, leaves property in his way, which he takes, he is guilty of larceny. In all these cases the possession of the property remains with the owner, and a trespass is committed in the taking, by the thief. But such would not be the case if the master had directed the servant to deliver the property to the thief, instead of directing him to furnish facilities for his arriving at the place where it was kept."

In State v. Adams, 115 N. C. 775, 20 S. E. 722, the owner of cotton, being informed that defendant designed stealing it from his cotton house, employed an agent to do whatever he might think was necessary to catch the thief. After watching the house two nights, and defendant not coming, the agent, on the third night, filled two sacks with cotton and sent one to the defendant's house by a servant, who told defendant where he could get the other sack. Defendant then went to the cotton house and took and carried away the other sack of cotton. It was held error to tell the jury that, if there was the previous intent to steal, the defendant would be guilty notwithstanding the owner's agent had told a servant to go to the defendant's house and persuade him to come and steal the sack.

In Pigg v. State, 43 Tex. 108, it was held proper, under the facts, to charge the jury that, if the owner, or someone acting for him, induced the original intent, and acted as one of the parties throughout,—that is, in the original intent to steal and in the acts resulting in theft,—the want of the owner's consent would not be established, and the defendant should be acquitted.

In Dodd v. Hamilton, 4 N. C. (Term Rep.) 31, where a slave was sent with money in a bag to a place where the owner of the money and others were lying in wait, and the slave was approached by a third person, who was seized by the owner, and the money was found lying on the ground, without any evidence to show that such person intended to take it, it was held that, even if the money had been found in the possession of the third person, it would not have been larceny because cause the owner had consented to its passing into his possession.

In State v. Waghalter, 177 Mo. 676, 76 S. W. 1028, it was held that where the owner consents, or, by his agent, assists, in a taking contrived by himself it is not larceny.

In Connor v. People, 18 Colo. 373, 25 L.R.A. 341, 36 Am. St. Rep. 295, 33 Pac. 159, it was held that persons cannot be convicted of conspiracy to commit larceny if they merely adopt a scheme which is suggested to them by a detective and which has received the approval of the owner of the property.

If they know, or reasonably believe, that the detective who induced them to join in the taking has the express or implied consent of the owner, they are not guilty. McGee v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 66 S. W. 562.

In Reg. v. Williams, 1 Car. & K. 105, a conviction of larceny was held right where it appeared that the prisoner tried to induce a bartender to join him in a plan to steal money from the barkeeper. The bartender refused and reported the matter to his master, who, some two months later, directed him to request the prisoner to call at the barroom, whereupon he called, bought gin, put down a shilling, and the bartender, by his master's direction, gave the prisoner four marked shillings, which he immediately took from the counter and put in his pocket. The only apparent distinction between this case and TOPOLEWSKI v. STATE seems to lie in the fact that in the latter the servant, who was directed to stand by and permit the taking, was ignorant of the plan of entrapment and of the thief's guilty intent, while in the former he had knowledge of them. The fact that the ignorant servant also assisted in arranging the wagon after the asportation was complete has no bearing, for it could not operate to excuse the crime already committed.

Williams v. State and King v. Egginton, cases in point, are sufficiently set out in TOPOLEWSKI v. STATE.

Upon the general subject of instigation or consent to crime for the purpose of detecting criminal as a defense to prosecution, see 25 L.R.A. 341.

knowledge of Dolan causing one of its employees to be in hiding where he could overhear whatever might be said, the arrangement being made on the part of the company by Mr. Layer the person in charge of its wholesale department. At such interview the accused proposed that Dolan should procure some packages of the company's meat to be placed on their loading platform, as was customary in delivering meat to customers, and that he should drive to such platform, ostensibly as a customer, and remove such packages. Dolan agreed to the proposition, and it was decided that the same should be consummated early the next morning, all of which was reported to Mr. Layer. He thereupon caused four barrels of meat to be packed and put in the accustomed condition for delivery to customers and placed on the platform in readiness for the accused to take them. He set a watch over the property and notified the person in charge of the platform, who was ignorant of the reason for so placing the barrels, upon his inquiring what they were placed there for, to let them go; that they were for a man who would call for them. About the time appointed for the accused to appear he drove to the platform and commenced putting the barrels in his wagon. The platform boss supposing, as the fact was, that the accused was the man Mr. Layer said was to come for the property, assumed the attitude of consenting to the taking. He did not actually help load the barrels onto the wagon, but he was by, consented by his manner, and when the accused was ready to go, helped him arrange his wagon and inquired what was to be done with the fourth barrel. The accused replied that he wanted it marked and sent up to him with a bill. He told the platform boss that he ordered the stuff the night before through Dolan. He took full possession of the three barrels of meat with intent to deprive the owner permanently thereof and without compensating it therefor, wholly in ignorance, however, of the fact that Dolan had acted in the matter on behalf of such owner and that it had knowingly aided in carrying out the plan for obtaining the meat.

Where the owner, by his agent or otherwise, solicits a person suspected of an intention of stealing to come forward and commit the criminal act, the taking is with the consent of the owner, and therefore does not constitute larceny.

Larceny is the fraudulent taking and carrying away of a thing without claim of right, with the intention of converting it to a use other than that of the owner, without his consent.

1 Wharton, Crim. Law, § 862.

Setting out the meats upon the platform merely to facilitate a plan the defendant had previously devised for getting hold of the property did not amount to a consent to the taking of them.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Evidence was allowed of a hearsay character, that the accused, prior to the occurrence in question, had been a party to criminally appropriating property of the packing company. Mr. Layer was permitted to testify that the accused at one time conspired with Peter Juston to so obtain some of its property, and succeeded in that regard as said Juston informed the witness, and as was indicated by the books kept by Juston and papers manipulated by the latter. Juston was permitted to testify to such unlawful appropriation of property so far as the purpose of the accused had to do with the transaction. Mere hearsay evidence, subject to some exceptions not important here, is never allowable, and the admission of it is presumed to be prejudicial, unless the contrary clearly appears. Again, on the trial of a person for a particular offense, evidence tending to prove that he has committed other distinct offenses is incompetent and generally prejudicial. Albricht v. State, 6 Wis. 74; Fossdahl v. State, 89 Wis. 482, 62 N. W. 185; Boldt v. State, 72 Wis. 7, 38 N. W. 177; Paulson v. State, 118 Wis. 89-98, 94 N. W. 771; Barton v. Bruley, 119 Wis. 326, 96 N. W. 15; Holmes v. State, 124 Wis. 133, 102 N. W. 321.

When a person is charged with being guilty of a particular offense he has a right, which should not be trespassed upon at all, to have the evidence in support of such charge confined to that particular offense. That, of course, has nothing to do with the rule allowing evidence of a former conviction as bearing on the subject of credibility of the accused in case of his offering himself as a witness, nor the rule permitting proof of other offenses so intimately connected with the one charged as to be evidentiary of the intent essential. Cases of the latter character too often lead to the improper admission of evidence contrary to the general rule above stated.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, the admission of the improper evidence does not give cause for a reversal here. In a case tried by the court the admission of improper evidence is to be regarded on appeal as having been harmless, unless it clearly appears that but therefor the finding would probably have been different. Harrigan v. Gilchrist, 121 Wis. 314, 99 N. W. 909. We are unable to see any clear indication that the plaintiff in error was prejudiced by the error in this case. If the judgment is fatally tainted with error the fault lies in a misconception of the law as regards trespass being essential to the crime of larceny, or as to under what circumstances, in regard to the conduct of the owner of the subject of the larceny, such element does not exist.

It was frankly conceded on the oral argument by the learned attorney general that, if the plaintiff in error committed the crime of larceny, Dolan, the decoy of the packing company, was a guilty participant in the matter, unless the element of guilt on his part was absent, because, while in the transaction he acted ostensibly as an accomplice of the accused, his acts were in fact those of the packing company. So, in the circumstances characterizing the taking of the barrels of meat from the loading platform the case comes down to this: If a person procures another to arrange with a third person for the latter to consummate, as he supposes, larceny of the goods of such person, and such third person, in the course of negotiations so sanctioned by such person, suggests the plan to be followed, which is agreed upon between the two, each to be an actor in the matter; and subsequently that is sanctioned secretly by such person, the purpose on the part of the latter being to entrap and bring to justice one thought to be disposed to commit the offense of larceny; and such person carries out a part of such plan necessary to its consummation assigned to such other in the agreement aforesaid, such third person not knowing that such person is advised of the impending offense; and at the finality causes one of its employees to, tacitly at least, consent to the taking of the goods, not knowing of the real nature of the transaction,—is such third person guilty of the crime of larceny, or does the conduct of such person take from the transaction the element of trespass or non-consent essential to such crime?

It will be noted that the plan for depriving the packing company of its property originated with the accused, but that it was wholly impracticable of accomplishment without the property being placed on the loading platform and the accused not being interfered with when he attempted to take it. When Dolan agreed to procure such placing the packing company in legal effect agreed thereto. Dolan did not expressly consent, nor did the agreement he had with the packing company authorize him to do so, to the misappropriation of the property. Did the agreement in legal effect with the accused, to place the property of the packing company on the loading platform, where it could be appropriated by the accused, if he was so disposed and was not interfered with in so doing, though his movements in that regard were known to the packing company, and his taking of the property, his efforts to that end being facilitated as suggested, constitute consent to such appropriation?

The case is very near the border line, if not across it, between consent and nonconsent to the taking of the property. In Reg. v. Lawrance, 4 Cox, C. C. 438, it was held that, if the property was delivered by a servant to the defendant by the master's direction, the offense cannot be larceny, regardless of the purpose of the defendant. In this case the property was not only placed on the loading platform, as was usual in delivering such goods to customers, with knowledge that the accused would soon arrive, having a formed design to take it, but the packing company's employee in charge of the platform, Ernst Klotz, was instructed that the property was placed there for a man who would call for it. Klotz from such statement had every reason to infer, when the accused arrived and claimed the right to take the property, that he was the one referred to and that it was proper to make delivery to him, and he acted accordingly. While he did not physically place the property, or assist in doing so, in the wagon, his standing by, witnessing such placing by the accused, and then assisting him in arranging the wagon, as the evidence shows he did, and taking the order, in the usual way, from the accused as to the disposition of the fourth barrel, and his conduct in respect thereto, amounted, practically, to a delivery of the three barrels to the accused.

In King v. Egginton, 2 Bos. & P. 508, we have a very instructive case on the subject under discussion here. A servant informed his master that he had been solicited to aid in robbing the latter's house. By the master's direction the servant opened the house, gave the would-be thieves access thereto, and took them to the place where the intended subject of the larceny had been laid in order that they might take it. All this was done with a view to the apprehension of the guilty parties after the accomplishment of their purpose. The servant, by direction of the master, not only gave access to the house, but afforded the would-be thieves every facility for taking the property; and yet the court held that the crime of larceny was complete, because there was no direction to the servant to deliver the property to the intruders or consent to their taking it. They were left free to commit the larceny, as they had purposed doing, and the way was made easy for them to do so; but they were neither induced to commit the crime, nor was any act essential to the offense done by anyone but themselves.

In harmony with the case last discussed, in Williams v. State, 55 Ga. 391, cited by counsel for the plaintiff in error, it was held that the owner of property may make everything ready and easy for a larceny thereof by one purposing to steal the same, and then remain passive, allowing the would-be criminal to perpetrate the offense of larceny as to every essential part of such offense, without sacrificing the element of trespass or nonconsent; but, if one ostensibly acting as an accomplice, but really for the owner of the property, for the purpose of entrapping the would-be criminal, does acts amounting to the constituents of the crime of larceny, although the accused concurred in and supposed he prompted the act, he is not guilty of larceny. The circumstances of that case were these: The would-be criminal, when he took the property, supposed he was committing the offense of larceny, and that his associate was criminally participating therein; but because, as a fact, such person was acting by direction of the owner, and actually placed the property in the hands of the taker, the element of nonconsent essential to larceny did not characterize the transaction. A distinction was drawn between one person inducing another to commit the crime of larceny of the former's goods, or such person aiding in the commission of the offense, so far as the mental attitude of such other is concerned, by doing some act essential to such an offense, and merely setting a trap to catch a would-be criminal by affording him the freest opportunity to commit the offense. The latter does not sacrifice the element of nonconsent. State v. Jansen, 22 Kan. 498; Varner v. State, 72 Ga. 745; State v. Duncan, 8 Rob. (La.) 562; Reg. v. Williams, 1 Car. & K. 195; King v. Egginton, supra.
